FOREWORD

The country reports on human rights practices contained herein were prepared by the Department of State in accordance with sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. They also fulfill the legislative requirements of section 31 of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and section 505(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended.

The reports cover the human rights practices of all nations that receive U.S. foreign assistance as well as those nations that do not but are members of the United Nations. They are printed to assist Members of Congress in the consideration of legislation.

DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CLAIBORNE PELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations.

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, DC, January 31, 1990.

HON. CLAIBORNE PELL,

COUNTRY REPORTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS PRACTICES

INTRODUCTION

1989 Human Rights Report

This report is submitted to the Congress by the Department of State in compliance with Sections 116(d)(1) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended.* The legislation requires human rights reports on all countries that receive aid from the United States and all countries that are members of the United Nations. In the belief that the information would be useful to the Congress and other readers, we have also included reports on the few countries which do not fall into either of these categories and which thus are not covered by the Congressional requirement.

Congress amended the Foreign Assistance Act with the foregoing sections of law so as to be able to consult these reports when considering assistance programs for specific foreign countries. One of the very important consequences--perhaps unintended--of these legislative provisions is that they have made human rights concerns an integral part of the State Department's daily reporting and daily decisionmaking. A human rights officer in an Embassy overseas who wants to write a good annual human rights report on the country in which he or she works must carefully monitor and observe human rights developments throughout the year on a daily basis. As a consequence he or she will report on such developments whenever something of human rights significance happens in the country of assignment. In the past 12 years, the State Department has become decidedly better informed on and sensitized to human rights violations as they occur around the globe.

* Section 116(d)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act provides as follows:

"The Secretary of State shall transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, by January 31 of each year, a full and complete report regarding...

"(1) the status of internationally recognized human rights, within the meaning of subsection (a)...

(A) in countries that received assistance under this part, and

(B) in all other foreign countries which are members of the United Nations and which are not otherwise the subject of a human rights report under this Act."

Section 502(B)(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act provides as follows:

"The Secretary of State shall transmit to Congress, as part of the presentation materials for security assistance programs proposed for each fiscal year, a full and complete report, prepared with the assistance of the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, with respect to practices regarding the observance of and respect for internationally recognized human rights in each country proposed as a recipient of security assistance."

The year 1989 may very well go down in history books as a watershed year regarding the worldwide cause of human rights. The revolutionary changes in Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, and Romania left Albania as the only totalitarian regime left intact in Europe by year's end. In Poland's elections, Solidarity won nearly all contested seats and saw one of its members installed as Prime Minister. Constitutional reforms in Hungary should lead to the installation of a government by consent of the governed in 1990. Free elections are promised in Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the GDR, and Romania.

What was striking about these dramatic changes in Eastern Europe was that, except for those in Romania, they occurred almost without bloodshed. The Soviet Union's acceptance of these changes was undoubtedly a significant factor in the peaceful character of the transition, as was the orderly and democratic spirit of the popular movements themselves.

The spectacular events in what were once known as the Soviet satellites tended to overshadow remarkable steps taken by the Soviet Union in the direction of an open society. Elections to the Congress of Peoples' Deputies, though rigged in some areas, were genuine contests in others, and resulted in the election of numerous opponents of the old order. The Supreme Soviet, chosen from members of the Congress, became a legislative branch relatively independent of the executive. There was further progress regarding freedom of expression, of association, of assembly, and of religion. Many restrictions on emigration were relaxed.

Though reformers strengthened their hold on the top echelon of the Soviet Government, "new thinking" has failed to penetrate many parts of the Soviet bureaucracy. Incidents of the autocratic use of power continue to be reported. The absence of a legal tradition and of legal institutions empowered to protect the rights of individuals add to the leadership's difficulty in getting its reform policies fully enforced. The creation of an independent judiciary remains critically important for the enhancement of respect for human rights in the Soviet Union.

In the Western hemisphere, democratic processes and human rights gained considerable ground. The year 1989 marked the end of the Stroessner dictatorship in Paraguay, election of the leader of the democratic opposition as President of Chile, and peaceful elections in Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, El Salvador, and Honduras. Elsewhere in the world, human rights progress was recorded in southern Africa, where U.N.-supervised elections took place in Namibia. The newly elected constituent assembly began drafting a new constitution, and we expect independence day to be in the early part of 1990. Newly elected President de Klerk of South Africa has taken some encouraging steps leading to dialogue with the black opposition.

Around the globe, the positive trends are unmistakable, making the setbacks all the more stark. After having moved in the direction of a freer society for more than a decade, China reversed course last June with its suppression of student protests, large-scale arrests, renewed prohibition of the expression of dissenting views, and a renewed commitment to totalitarian governance and indoctrination. Severe repression of all forms of political opposition continued in Burma, and North Korea remained one of the most repressive totalitarian regimes.

Going against the prevailing trend in the Western Hemisphere was Cuba, which once again sharpened repression, particularly of human rights activists, many of whom had cooperated with the 1988-89 U.N. Human Rights Commission investigation. The Government staged a show-trial and then executed a group of military officers who might have been a threat to Castro. Also of concern was the serious setback in Haiti in January 1990 involving the suspension of civil liberties and the arrest, beating, and/or deportation of prominent opposition politicians.

Ethnic violence in Senegal and Mauritania took scores of lives in both countries and resulted in the displacement of at least 200,000 people. In Liberia, unknown numbers of persons were killed, and thousands sought refuge in neighboring countries during fighting between dissidents and units of the army.

Ethnic strife and insurgency took at least 8,500 lives in Sri Lanka and more than 1,000 lives in Sudan. Repressive measures and clan warfare in Somalia caused the deaths of perhaps several thousand persons, and repression and civil war resulted in thousands of casualties in Ethiopia.

Other areas plagued by insurgency, civil unrest, terrorism, and countermeasures taken by governments include Colombia, El Salvador, Guatemala, India, the Israeli-occupied territories, Northern Ireland, Peru, and the Philippines, as well as long-suffering Lebanon. Elsewhere armed conflicts continue to be waged in Angola, Mozambique, Cambodia, and Afghanistan.

As we look to 1990, the questions before us and before the world community are whether the human rights gains of 1989 in Eastern Europe and other parts of the world will be lasting achievements. Is there a danger of relapse? Will human rights problems stemming from domestic rather than international conflicts increasingly draw our attention?

For our part, the United States remains committed to the worldwide promotion and consolidation of human rights and democracy. We see these goals as principal foreign policy challenges. We actively champion them abroad because they reflect the best that is in ourselves. And we do so because we have found that in those countries where human rights and democratic values have taken hold, we find friends--not enemies. These are the world's most stable governments, the most dynamic societies, the bulwarks of freedom, respectful of the rights of their citizens and of their neighbors, and the most responsible contributors to the well-being of the world community.

This year, as last, there are 169 separate reports. The guidelines followed in preparing the reports are explained in detail in Appendix A. In Appendix B is a discussion of reporting on worker rights, as required by Section 505(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended by Title V of the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984 (Generalized System of Preferences Renewal Act of 1984).*

Although the legislation requires reports on worker rights only in developing countries that have been beneficiaries

* Section 505 (c) of the Trade Act provides as follows:

"The President shall submit an annual report to the Congress on the status of internationally recognized worker rights within each beneficiary developing country."

under the Generalized System of Preferences, in the interest of uniformity, and to provide a ready basis for comparison, we have here applied the same reporting standards that we have applied to all countries on which we prepare reports. Appendix C contains a list of 12 international human rights covenants and agreements and indicates which countries have ratified them. Appendix D contains explanatory notes on the statistical table in Appendix E, which shows the amounts obligated for U.S. economic and military assistance for fiscal year 1989.

Definition of Human Rights

Human rights, as defined in Section 116(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act, include freedom from torture or other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment; prolonged detention without charges; disappearance due to abduction or clandestine detention; and other flagrant denial of the rights to life, liberty, and the security of the person. Internationally recognized worker rights, as defined in Section 502(a) of the Trade Act, include (A) the right of association; (B) the right to organize and bargain collectively; (C) prohibition on the use of any form of forced or compulsory labor; (D) a minimum age for the employment of children; and (E) acceptable conditions of work with respect to minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health.

In addition to discussing the topics specified in the legislation, our reports, as in previous years, cover other internationally recognized political and civil rights and describe the political system of each country.

In applying these internationally recognized standards, we seek to be objective. But the reports unashamedly reflect the U.S. view that the right of self-government is a basic political right, that government is legitimate only when grounded on the consent of the governed, and that government thus grounded should not be used to deny life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Individuals in a society have the inalienable right to be free from governmental violations of the integrity of the person; to enjoy civil liberties such as freedom of expression, assembly, religion, and movement, without discrimination based on race, ancestry, or sex; and to change their government by peaceful means. The reports also take into account the fact that terrorists and guerrilla groups often kill, torture, or maim citizens or deprive them of their liberties; such violations are no less reprehensible if committed by violent opponents of the government than if committed by the government itself.

We have found that the concept of economic, social, and cultural rights is often confused, sometimes willfully, by repressive governments claiming that, in order to promote these "rights," they may deny their citizens the right to integrity of the person as well as political and civil rights. There exists a profound connection between human rights and economic development. Experience demonstrates that it is individual freedom that sets the stage for economic and social development; it is repression that stifles it. Those who try to justify subordinating political and civil rights on the ground that they are concentrating on economic aspirations invariably deliver neither. That is why we consider it imperative to focus urgent attention on violations of basic political and civil rights. If these basic rights are not secured, experience has shown, the goals of economic development are not reached either. This is a point which the Soviet Union's reformers seem to have recognized.

United States Human Rights Policy

From this premise, that basic human rights may not be abridged or denied, it follows that our human rights policy is concerned with the limitations on the powers of government that are required to protect the integrity and dignity of the individual. Further, it is in our national interest to promote democratic processes in order to help build a world environment more favorable to respect for human rights and hence more conducive to stability and peace. We have developed, therefore, a dual policy, reactive in the sense that we continue to oppose specific human rights violations wherever they occur, but at the same time active in working over the long term to strengthen democracy.

In much of the world, the United States has a variety of means at its disposal to respond to human rights violations. We engage in traditional diplomacy, particularly with friendly governments, where frank diplomatic exchanges are possible and productive. Where we find limited opportunities for the United States to exert significant influence through bilateral relations, we resort to public statements of our concerns, calling attention to countries where respect for human rights is lacking. In a number of instances, we employ a mixture of traditional diplomacy and public affirmation of American interest in the issue.

The United States also employs a variety of means to encourage greater respect for human rights over the long term. Since 1983 the National Endowment for Democracy has been carrying out programs designed to promote democratic practices abroad, involving the two major United States political parties, labor unions, business groups, and many private institutions. Also, through Section 116(e) of the Foreign Assistance Act, funds are disbursed by the Agency for International Development for programs designed to promote civil and political rights abroad. We also seek greater international commitment to the protection of human rights and respect for democracy through our efforts in the United Nations and other international organizations, and in the process devised by the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Preparation of these annual reports constitutes an important element of our human rights policy. The process, since it involves continuous and well-publicized attention to human rights, has contributed to the strengthening of an international human rights agenda. Many countries that are strong supporters of human rights are taking steps of their own to engage in human rights reporting and have established offices specifically responsible for international human rights policy. Even among countries without strong human rights records, sensitivity to these reports increasingly takes the form of constructive response, or at least a willingness to engage in a discussion of human rights policy. In calling upon the Department of State to prepare these reports, Congress has created a useful instrument for advancing the cause of human rights.

AFRICA

ANGOLA*

The People's Republic of Angola (PRA) is ruled by the sole legal political party, the Marxist-Leninist Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). President Jose Eduardo Dos Santos is both Head of State and chief of the MPLA. His rule was reconfirmed by the MPLA's Second Party Congress in December 1985. All major policy decisions are made by a small elite in the MPLA, which also controls all means of mass communication. Open political dissension is not tolerated.

The Angolan armed forces (FAPLA) total approximately 100,000. FAPLA is backed by a lightly armed People's Militia, which is used for counterinsurgency and defensive duties at the local level. The armed opposition, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), is estimated to have a regular force of about 30,000, as well as a comparable number of irregular troops. It has the allegiance of a substantial portion of the population, especially among Angola's largest ethnic group, the Ovimbundu.

UNITA controls the southeastern quarter of Angola's territory. The United States supports UNITA in the Angolan conflict and has provided it with assistance. The PRA receives extensive military assistance from the Soviet Union. As of November 1, 1989, half of the estimated 50,000 Cuban troops who were stationed in the country had been withdrawn in accordance with the New York accords of December 22, 1988. Under these agreements, Cuba is obligated to withdraw a total of 33,000 troops by April 1990, and all Cuban troops are to be out of Angola by July 1, 1991.

A civil war, combined with a Communist command-style economy, has devastated the country's infrastructure, forced a return to barter in some areas, and led the PRA to divert much of its revenues to the military, including payments to the Soviet Union for military equipment and to Cuba for combat troops. Although the PRA receives substantial foreign exchange earnings from oil exports, the expenditure of hard currency for weapons and the impact of war on the productivity and distribution networks of Angolan agriculture appear to have created a chronic food shortage in both the cities and the countryside. The PRA, in response to the generally critical economic situation, announced in 1987 its intention to institute some market-oriented economic reforms. By the end of 1989, little progress had been made, although the International Monetary Fund voted in midyear to admit the PRA.

The civil war between the PRA and UNITA has ravaged Angola since 1975 and has resulted in widespread human rights abuses on both sides with many civilian casualties. A regional conflict on Angolan and Namibian territory has added further destruction and violence. On December 22, 1988, the Republic of Cuba, the People's Republic of Angola, and the Republic of South Africa signed a series of agreements (the New York accords) under U.S. mediation which are leading to independence for Namibia in accordance with the U.N. Settlement Plan and the phased and total withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola. This has significantly reduced regional

*The United States does not recognize or maintain diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of Angola and has no diplomatic personnel there to monitor human rights conditions or evaluate allegations of abuses.

ANGOLA

tensions. In June 1989, at Gbadolite, Zaire, President Dos Santos and Dr. Savimbi, leader of UNITA, agreed to a ceasefire and committed themselves to achieving national reconciliation. In the months that followed, the cease-fire broke down and fighting resumed with new charges of human rights abuses. In December the PRA, with the help of Soviet advisers, launched a new military offensive into UNITA-controlled areas of southeastern Angola. As the year ended, the U.S., Zaire, and other countries in the region were working to reestablish the cease-fire and get negotiations started to end the civil war.

One human rights group, Africa Watch, has estimated total civil war victims at 200,000 Angolans killed, more than 20,000 children orphaned, and 20,000 to 50,000 Angolans left as amputees due to the widespread use of land mines by both sides. In addition to extensive violence against civilians, human rights remained restricted across the board with problems of mistreatment of prisoners, arbitrary detentions, lack of fair trial, and restrictions on freedom of speech, press, association, movement, worker rights, and the right of citizens to change their government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Reports of political killings on the part of PRA forces and UNITA, both in combat areas and in the form of summary executions of prisoners, persisted in 1989. It is difficult to evaluate the various claims and counterclaims. The fighting also resulted in many civilian deaths. While some of these deaths were inadvertently caused by military operations, others may have been deliberately perpetrated by opposing forces to intimidate civilian populations. The PRA and UNITA publicly and repeatedly accused each other of practicing terrorism against their respective opponents, including killing or maiming civilians.

UNITA has charged that Cuban forces have been involved in attacks on civilians. In addition, UNITA has asserted that FAPLA and Cuban forces used aerial chemical warfare against military and civilian opponents in 1989. Tests carried out by American forensic experts, however, did not yield positive results.

b. Disappearance

There is no information either to confirm or deny that secret arrests or clandestine detentions are practiced by PRA security agencies or by UNITA, although each side has accused the other of such practices.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Allegations of torture and mistreatment made by both sides appear to have some basis in fact, but torture of opponents does not appear to be a generalized systematic practice of either PRA organizations or UNITA. The number of torture allegations against UNITA increased in 1989. Little information is available on the administrative structure and practices within UNITA-held areas. Reports that UNITA mistreats some prisoners could neither be confirmed nor disproved.

PRA prison authorities reportedly have wide latitude in the treatment of prisoners. Treatment of political detainees in the prisons controlled by the PRA Ministry of State Security appears to be harsher than treatment in the regular prisons. There are reports of sexual torture of UNITA prisoners and mistreatment, including beatings, threats, and prolonged interrogation with the use of force. Family visits appear to be arbitrarily restricted in many instances. In 1989 foreign advisers, including Cubans and East Germans, continued to assist PRA state security services and may have helped operate the state security prisons. AI's 1989 Report notes that three former security officials were convicted of ill-treating prisoners during 1988 (nine were tried).

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under laws enacted by the PRA, persons suspected of committing serious acts against "state security" may be held by the Ministry of State Security without charge for an initial period of 3 months, renewable for a further period of 3 months. Such detainees need not be presented to a judge within 48 hours of their arrest, as stipulated in the Code of Criminal Procedure for persons suspected of other kinds of crime, and apparently have no right to challenge the grounds of their detention. After 6 months in detention without charge, the detainee must be informed of the accusations, with the State Security Service either informing the public prosecutor of the charges or releasing the suspect. Once the case is presented to the public prosecutor, there does not appear to be a specific time limit within which a suspect must be brought to trial.

The deterioration of the security situation has exacerbated the general decline in judicial safeguards and due process. The PRA has established regional military councils throughout much of Angola. They are responsible directly to President Dos Santos and have broad authority to restrict the movement of people and goods, to requisition people and goods without compensation, and to try crimes against "state security." The MPLA has also created "People's Vigilance Brigades" for urban areas, whose powers are not clear but which include general administration and "protecting the people and ensuring public order and stability."

Press accounts alleged that UNITA had detained or executed Pedro "Tito" Chingunji, a former UNITA representative in the United States, at the beginning of the year. Chingunji was later seen alive and apparently well in Jamba, UNITA's headquarters in southeastern Angola.

The number of political detainees and prisoners held by the PRA at the end of 1989 was not known. However, the PRA claimed to have released 700 political prisoners during the first 6 months of the year. If this figure is correct, it appears that the MPLA has been holding many more regime opponents than previously believed.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

ANGOLA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although the PRA Constitution provides for an independent judiciary, in practice the judiciary follows MPLA party guidelines. The Constitution also states that no citizen shall be arrested and brought to trial except under the terms of the law, which includes a public trial and the right of the accused to legal counsel. There is, however, insufficient information to determine if, or to what extent, these rights are observed in practice in regular criminal and civil cases.

In the past, AI has expressed concern that trials of political opponents of the PRA, notably in military tribunals, do not conform to internationally recognized standards. AI's 1989 report notes that 20 defendants convicted in 1988 for ties to UNITA were not given adequate opportunity to present their defense or to appeal their cases. AI also reported the 1989 conviction of two military pilots on espionage charges. They were sentenced to death and not permitted to appeal.

Judicial lines of authority are unclear, especially since the PRA's regional military councils have been given responsibility for the trial of offenses against "state security," including "economic crimes." It is not known which trials are open to the public and under what rules of procedure the various military and civilian courts operate. The PRA Constitution also provides for a People's Supreme Court, but no information is available about its jurisdiction.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although the Constitution provides for the inviolability of the home and privacy of correspondence, the PRA conducts arbitrary searches of homes, censors private correspondence, and monitors private communications.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

The resumption of the conflict in August, after the breakdown of the June cease-fire, led to some of the most violent fighting in 1989. Displaced persons interviewed in UNITA territory have stated that FAPLA forces capture escaping civilians, particularly children, and send them to special camps within PRA territory or to Communist countries such as Cuba and East Germany for "reeducation."

New York Times reporter Kenneth Noble visited Samba Caju (180 miles east of Luanda) as part of a group of reporters taken to the town by PRA authorities. There he conducted interviews with townspeople under PRA auspices. He wrote that UNITA soldiers invaded the town on September 17, 1989, shooting civilians (at least 15 were killed and 40 wounded) and destroying shops, houses, and a medical clinic.

Africa Watch reports that some of the refugees interviewed by its representatives stated that UNITA captured civilians, transported them to UNITA territory, and forced them to farm.

The PRA and UNITA have accused each other of placing land mines in footpaths to agricultural fields as part of a strategy to deny food to civilians in contested areas. Thousands of civilians have lost limbs as a result of the widespread use of land mines. According to the Africa Watch study, mines placed by FAPLA forces accounted for most civilian casualties in northern Angola, while UNITA-placed mines were blamed for civilian casualties in eastern Angola.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The PRA Constitution provides for freedom of expression, but the Angolan people live under censorship, intimidation, and control of the media. Opposition views are not tolerated, and critics such as Bartolomeu Dias Fernandes, who was accused of "insulting the Head of State," have been sentenced to long prison terms.

Although the PRA is especially sensitive to criticism in the foreign press, in 1986 it began to allow the controlled travel of foreign correspondents to Angola, a practice which continued in 1989. The circulation of Western journals and periodicals in PRA-controlled Angola is tightly restricted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the PRA Constitution calls for freedom of assembly, it is denied to any political group or movement other than the MPLA or its associated mass organizations. All other political movements have been banned. There are numerous unconfirmed reports of arrests of people who voice support for opposition movements or alternative political systems. The People's Vigilance Brigades, which have some law enforcement authority in urban areas, and the martial law climate throughout the country tend further to restrict freedom of assembly and association.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the PRA Constitution provides for the inviolability of freedom of conscience and belief and for separation of church and state, the PRA authorities publicly emphasize the importance of propagating atheism and have been critical of religious activities. Approximately 85 percent of the Angolan population is either Roman Catholic or Protestant, while the remainder practice a variety of animist beliefs. Systematic persecution of priests, pastors, and catechists and confiscation of Church property occurred in PRA-controlled areas between 1975 and 1979, but since then the PRA has eased its antireligious stance and has not moved to close down officially recognized churches. Church services are held regularly, and there is wide attendance.

Foreign and Angolan missionaries are allowed to carry out their normal activities. UNITA respects freedom of religion in the areas it controls and provides limited administrative support to both Catholic and Protestant churches. In the past, UNITA has captured foreign missionaries in contested areas and released them unharmed after publicly warning them of the dangers of being caught in the combat zone.

The PRA refuses to recognize smaller religious sects that it deems subversive, such as the Jehovah's Witnesses. The most recent known case of repression concerns the Tocoist Church, founded in Angola in 1949, which has a syncretic blend of Christian beliefs and indigenous religious practices. The Government banned the Church in 1977, and, in early 1987, approximately 60 Tocoists were killed in a confrontation with irregular units of the MPLA military and state security forces. Although this ban was lifted in 1988, there were reports of more arrests of members in that year.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

As a result of the fighting and the widespread use of land mines by both sides, travel by road in most areas of Angola is dangerous. The PRA is acutely sensitive about security and has tightly restricted travel. It has also instituted a pass system within Angola, and foreigners are generally prohibited from traveling outside the principal cities. UNITA has publicly warned that it considers all of Angola to be a war zone and that it cannot guarantee the safety of persons traveling there.

Angolan citizens are allowed to travel abroad, but this travel is carefully controlled by the PRA's restrictions on issuance of passports and exit visas and by currency restrictions. Emigration is restricted. The PRA limits travel to Angola through a selective and stringent visa policy.

An estimated 670,000 persons, and probably a greater proportion of the Angolan population of 8 to 9 million, have been displaced internally. Africa Watch reports that the PRA authorities have forcibly displaced thousands of civilians, in part to deny UNITA a social base, and that UNITA has captured thousands of civilians and forced them to work on UNITA farms.

There are some 400,000 Angolan refugees resident in neighboring countries. Approximately 300,000 Angolans are still refugees in Zaire, and an estimated 94,000 are in Zambia. There are approximately 11,000 Zairian refugees or displaced persons in Angola. Namibian refugees have been repatriated as a result of the New York accords, which also led to the departure of a large contingent of South African nationals affiliated with the African National Congress.

By the end of September 1989, approximately 2,100 Angolan refugees were repatriated from Zaire to the PRA and nearly 1,900 Zairian refugees returned home from the PRA. This repatriation, sponsored by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, was intended to return 5,000 refugees to their homes--2,500 from each country--by late November 1989. A new registration for other refugees wishing to return home was expected to begin in January 1990.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Angolans do not have the right to change their government. Most of Angola is ruled by a small group of officials within the party apparatus of the ruling MPLA. The PRA Constitution provides for popular participation in the political process, but political activity is limited to participation in the MPLA or in one of its controlled and sanctioned organizations such as its youth wing, the Angolan Women's Organization, or the trade union movement. Political power is centered in the elite membership of the Politburo and the somewhat larger Central Committee. Party membership is very restricted, with fewer than 30,000 members.

ANGOLA

The PRA Constitution provides for a popularly elected National People's Assembly, established in 1981, and people's assemblies at the provincial and local level. However, despite recent suggestions from President Dos Santos that the powers and membership of the National People's Assembly be broadened, only candidates chosen and endorsed by the MPLA have been elected. Key members of the party also hold leadership positions in the provincial and local assemblies. A new round of elections is planned for 1990 under the existing restrictions, but depending upon progress in the negotiations between the MPLA and UNITA, this may be subject to change.

Both the MPLA and UNITA have primarily ethnic bases of support--the MPLA among the Mbundu, and UNITA among the Ovimbundu, Ganguela, and Lunda-Chokwe. The National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA) has its base among the Bakongo, but the FNLA is no longer a major force in Angolan politics and has in part been integrated into the MPLA. Members of all of Angola's ethnic groups and religions participate in both organizations, some at high levels of the party. However, non-Mbundu groups are greatly underrepresented in the small group within the ruling PRA Central Committee and Politburo. Mestizos (Angolans of mixed racial background numbering only about 1 percent of the population) remain the most highly skilled and educated group in Angola and are influential--politically, culturally, and economically--beyond their numbers in the PRA.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The PRA did not respond to AI's 1987 appeal for information concerning numerous political detainees, and neither the PRA nor UNITA would let Africa Watch researchers into the country in 1989 (Africa Watch's report was based on interviews with 87 Angolan refugees in camps in Zaire and Zambia). The PRA has allowed the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the United Nations Children's Fund, and Catholic Relief Services to provide food assistance in areas it controls. UNITA allows the ICRC, Medicins Sans Frontieres, and Operation Handicapped International to conduct similar operations in areas under its control. Neither the PRA nor UNITA have yet responded to ICRC requests for access to all persons arrested in connection with internal events and the military situation in the country.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Because of the disturbed situation prevailing in most of Angola, there is little information available on the existence or extent of discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religion, language, or social status. There is also no information available on the extent of violence against women in Angola. Given the country's 500-year colonial legacy, Portuguese is the official language of Angola.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Angolan workers do not have the right to form independent trade unions. The sole, legally recognized, trade union organization in the PRA is the National Union of Angolan Workers (UNTA), which was formed in the late 1950's as an appendage of the MPLA and became the ruling party's official labor wing after Angolan independence in 1975. The preindependence labor centers of rival liberation organizations ceased to exist soon after the MPLA took control of most of the country. The monopoly situation of the UNTA is ensured by the statutory basis of the single-union structure. In addition, the activities of the labor central and its affiliates are tightly controlled by the MPLA. Strikes are illegal and considered to be a crime against "state security."

The PRA has ratified ILO Conventions 87 and 98 regarding freedom of association and collective bargaining. The UNTA is affiliated with the continent-wide Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers do not have the right to bargain collectively. The PRA, through its Ministry of Labor and Social Security, controls the process of setting wages and benefits, but it coordinates its actions with UNTA and employers. There are no export processing zones in Angola. As far as is known, labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the PRA.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Existing PRA legislation authorizes compulsory labor for breaches of labor discipline and participation in strikes. On the basis of this legislation, the International Labor Organization (ILO) in 1984 cited the PRA for being in violation of ILO Convention 105, which prohibits forced labor. Also, in 1988 the ILO Committee of Experts cited the PRA for its failure to bring its legislation into conformity with ILO Convention 105, which the PRA had ratified in 1976.

During 1989, both the PRA and UNITA accused each other of relying on forced conscription of young males for recruitment into the military forces.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no information available on this subject.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is also no information available on this subject.

BENIN

The People's Republic of Benin is a single-party state headed by President Mathieu Kerekou, who came to power in a military coup in 1972. In 1974 President Kerekou declared Benin to be a Marxist-Leninist state under the direction of a single political party, the People's Revolutionary Party of Benin. However, on December 7, 1989, the party's Central Committee, the standing committee of the National Revolutionary Assembly, and the National Executive Council (cabinet ministers plus the six provincial governors), under the chairmanship of the President, announced that Marxism-Leninism was no longer the State's official ideology.

Benin's Armed Forces number approximately 4,000 personnel. In addition to the regular army, there are small navy, air force, and militia contingents. The army is the main internal security force, backed by the paramilitary gendarmerie, regular police units, the presidential guard, and the Documentation and Information Service, the Government's intelligence agency.

Benin's underdeveloped economy is largely based on subsistence agriculture, cotton production, regional trade, and a low level of offshore oil production. In June the Government signed agreements with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund which included austerity reforms, e.g., reducing the number of state enterprises, cutting wasteful fiscal expenditures, deregulating trade, and encouraging private-sector activity. Benin's small modern economy, however, remained depressed in 1989 due to falling world prices for local exports, relatively high debt service charges, and widespread unemployment.

Human rights continued to be circumscribed in 1989. In the face of social unrest and strikes by students, teachers, civil servants, and even some military personnel over the deteriorating economic situation and alleged corruption, the Government cracked down hard on demonstrators in January, February, and December 1989, killing one worker and two youths, including a 12-year-old, and detaining a number of persons. On August 29, 1989, the President granted a general amnesty and clemency to 133 political detainees, to another 30 persons accused of coup-plotting, and to 29 persons in exile. He also stressed the importance of human rights by: approving a visit from an Amnesty International (AI) mission in April; authorizing the establishment of a nongovernmental National Commission on Human Rights; and personally visiting the military Camp Guezo Detention Center in June to discuss with security officials the problem of arbitrary detention. Major human rights concerns included mistreatment of prisoners and detainees, arbitrary detentions, restrictions on freedoms of speech, press, assembly, and the right of citizens to change their government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or other extrajudicial killings in Benin in 1989, but the Government's use of lethal force in countering public disturbances and strikes in 1989 led to the deaths by gunfire of at least one striking factory worker at Save in January and two young demonstrators in Cotonou in December.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Beninese penal code requires that prisoners be treated consistent with "prison discipline and security." Mistreatment of prisoners and detainees occurs. Cases of prisoner death from torture (primarily beatings), disease, or poor prison conditions were reported by private sources and by AI in its 1989 Report.

There were credible reports that two prisoners died after having been tortured in 1989. Serge Gnimadi, a 21-year-old member of the National Union of High School Teachers, was arrested on January 23 for allegedly engaging in vandalism and other activities threatening public order during strikes in Porto Novo. He died in prison at the end of February; the Government stated tetanus was the cause of death. Luc Togbadja, a student arrested for transporting antigovernment tracts on March 3, was detained at Cotonou's Camp Guezo until May 6. He was then moved to the Petit Palais, a security forces installation, and reportedly beaten to death there. President Kerekou visited Camp Guezo shortly thereafter to investigate allegations of human rights abuses, but at the end of 1989 there had been no report or formal investigation, and no disciplinary action had been taken against responsible persons.

Prison conditions in Benin are very poor. Sanitation and medical facilities are deficient, and the prison diet is inadequate unless supplemented by food from friends or relatives. Much public attention has centered on conditions at two remote detention centers: the civil prison in Segbana, where there had been protests in 1988, and Sero Kpera military camp in Parakou. The amnesty in August reportedly eased significantly the overcrowding in several prisons, including Segbana, where members of the Dahomey Communist Party had been detained.

While Benin's legal system requires judicial review of detention, this is not always observed in political cases. The Constitution states that no citizen may be arrested without an arrest order authorized by an established judicial body. However, there is no time limit with respect to charging a defendant or bringing the accused to trial. In practice, persons have been detained incommunicado, some for extended periods, without charge and without recourse to legal assistance or judicial hearing. Outside the judicial system, the Government has used an administrative body, the Permanent National Commission of Inquiry, to question political detainees about their activities and to decide whether they should remain in custody.

The President publicly addressed the question of arbitrary arrest and detention in 1989. On June 20, he visited Camp Guezo (Benin's military and security headquarters) to discuss military personnel involvement in arbitrary arrests. President Kerekou asked security officials for a complete accounting of all prisoners being held at the camp and warned against arbitrary detention. Kerekou then organized a June 22 working session with a number of security and judiciary personnel and ordered them to settle quickly all proven cases of arbitrary arrest. By year's end, this was accomplished. There was no evidence of further investigation of, or actions taken against, security officials.

At the beginning of 1989, over 200 Beninese were believed detained in various prisons for political reasons. During the January-February 1989 strikes, 68 persons were arrested for vandalism or otherwise disturbing public order. On April 1, 40 detainees were released from Camp Sero Kpera in Parakou. Among these was Dr. Afolabi Biauou, who had been arrested in 1985 and detained since then without charge. Both AI and the American Association for the Advancement of Science had made appeals in his case. An unknown number of persons were also arrested during antigovernment demonstrations in early December. Most are believed to have been released.

The August amnesty freed 133 political detainees, including several whose cases had been noted by AI, the International Human Rights Law Group, and the American Association for the Advancement of Science. They included: Anselme Agbanoundo, a geological engineer arrested in October 1985; Thomas Houedete, an economist and professor at the University of Benin, arrested in October 1985; Didier D'Almeida, arrested in November 1984; Yako Toko Chabi, in detention since 1985; and Jonas Gnimagnon, Chairman of the Committee of Wives and Relatives of Prisoners of Conscience, arrested in May 1989. The Government had reportedly suspected these persons of ties to the banned Dahomey Communist Party.

The August amnesty also freed 30 persons suspected of coup plotting in 1975 and 1977. At the end of 1989, as many as 20 others remained imprisoned for alleged involvement in more recent conspiracies to overthrow the Government. One group, allegedly involved in a March 1988 plot, is still awaiting trial. A second group, implicated in a Libyan-backed plan to overthrow President Kerekou, was tried and sentenced in February 1989.

There was no use of forced exile in Benin as a means of political control in 1989. The August amnesty also included an invitation for 29 voluntary exiles to return to Benin, although it is not confirmed that any had accepted the amnesty by the end of the year.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Benin's legal system is based on French civil and customary law. In recent years, a civilian court system organized on provincial and national levels has operated, with the People's Central Court as the highest regular court of appeal. In September 1988, the Government held elections for civilians to sit on local tribunals for the first time. Defendants have both the right to be present at their trial and the right to an attorney (at public expense, if needed).

In the past, the Government rarely brought security cases to the trial stage. However, in 1988 a new law established the State Security Court, and in 1989, as noted above, a number of political opponents charged with involvement in a Libyan-backed plot were tried before this Court in an open trial and sentenced in February. Their testimony, including segments critical of government policy, was broadcast on public television.

Benin's Constitution provides for the inviolability of the home and requires a warrant from a judge before the police can enter a residence. In practice, authorities enter homes without a warrant in suspected security cases. Reports indicated that the security police also monitor telephones and the mail of persons suspected of antigovernment activities.

Section 2 Respect For Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Public expression of political opinion is controlled, and open criticism of the Government, as occurred during the 1989 strikes and disturbances, is not permitted. However, some negative coverage of the Government and its policies appeared in the independent press during 1989. Most Beninese appear willing to discuss politics freely in private or in small groups, even in the presence of foreigners.

The Government owns and operates the local radio and television stations and one daily newspaper. The Beninese media also includes three independent private newspapers (La Gazette du Golfe, Tam-Tam Express, and La Recade), as well as La Croix, a weekly paper published by the Catholic Church, and Echo, a monthly journal of opinion circulated throughout West Africa. The official media generally carry those stories that are approved by, or serve the interests of, the State.

Private newspapers treat controversial political issues with circumspection, but many articles appeared in the private press in 1989 mildly criticizing President Kerekou and the party on various domestic political and economic issues. There are limits to such criticism, however, as in March the Government arrested and briefly held Parfait Agbele, a journalist with the Gazette du Golfe, reportedly after he had begun research for a story on Luc Togbadja's death. In September the Government confiscated a number of copies of the Gazette after it had published a controversial opinion poll on the Government, and in October it suspended the paper "until further notice." The suspension was canceled on December 8 but with the caveat that future editions be submitted to the Government for prior censorship.

There is normally no censorship of foreign books or artistic works. Foreign periodicals are widely displayed on newsstands, and foreign radio broadcasts are readily available to much of the population through shortwave radio. No attempt is made to interfere with foreign radio broadcasts.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

In recent years, the Government has permitted the formation of a number of nonpolitical, private, social, service, and professional organizations. All meetings of a political nature, however, must be approved by the State. The Government used gunfire against alleged stone-throwers participating in antigovernment demonstrations in 1989.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Christianity, Islam, and traditional religions all coexist in Benin, and adherence to a particular faith does not confer any special status or benefit. There are no restrictions on religious ceremonies, teachings, or foreign clergy, and religious conversion is freely permitted.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Domestic movement is not restricted. Passport and exit permits are necessary for travel outside West African countries but are usually not difficult to obtain. Emigration is common; many Beninese move to neighboring countries to earn a living and do so without jeopardizing their citizenship. The Government encourages the repatriation of its citizens living abroad but with only limited success to date.

According to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, there were 869 identified refugees in Benin as of August 1989, 808 of whom were Chadians who had fled the fighting in their country. Although some settled in Benin, many now were in the process of returning to Chad. The Government imposes no restriction on the return of refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right to change their government through democratic means. Political leadership is exercised by President Kerekou and a small group of senior officials, many of whom are military officers. The Cabinet and Political Bureau are made up of persons from a variety of ethnic groups and geographic areas. The People's Revolutionary Party, the sole recognized political party, controls the selection of candidates for the National Revolutionary Assembly and local government bodies. While party membership is not a requisite for holding office or for civil service employment, it can be helpful for political and career advancement. The National Revolutionary Assembly itself rarely takes issue with policies formulated by the President. In the June elections for the National Revolutionary Assembly Beninese citizens voted "yes" or "no" for a single slate of candidates, chosen in advance. There were reports of soldiers intimidating voters, and at a number of polling stations the principle of the secret ballot was not honored. The Assembly, which has little influence on policymaking, reelected Kerekou without opposition to the Presidency 2 months later.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In the past, the Government considered any attempt to investigate human rights practices to be interference in its internal affairs. However, 1988-1989 saw a change in that policy. In 1988 the International Committee of the Red Cross was permitted to visit Benin and investigate prison conditions. In April 1989, AI representatives visited Benin to discuss the organization's concerns on a number of human rights issues.

In April the National Revolutionary Assembly passed a law creating the Beninese Commission on Human Rights. The Commission, which at the end of 1989 was still in the process of being organized, is a nongovernmental entity designed to promote human rights and review complaints forwarded by private citizens. It will be comprised of 45 members, including lawyers, representatives of nongovernmental organizations, and government officials.

There is no evidence that discrimination based on race, sex, religion, language, or social status exists in Benin.

The Constitution states that women are by law the equals of men in the political, economic, cultural, and social spheres, and the Government officially encourages opportunities for women. The Constitution also notes that the State "protects the family, in particular, the mother and child" and calls for the development of maternity hospitals and childcare facilities. Female employees have the right to paid maternity leave, although the actual enjoyment of this benefit is limited mostly to civil servants, teachers, and other professionals. Beninese women play a major role in the commercial sector as well as in small-scale family farming, but they have not traditionally had the same educational opportunities as men.

Violence against women, such as wife beating, has been given little attention by the Government. Civil penalties may be applied in cases of domestic violence, but the police and courts are often reluctant to intervene, considering such affairs to be "family matters." The Organization of Revolutionary Women of Benin serves to transmit government and party policy on such issues and make known women's views to the leadership.

According to several local medical practitioners, the practice of female circumcision is not widespread in Benin. However, published reports in the United States suggest about 20 percent of the female population is subject to this practice, mostly in the northern part of the country. The Government is making efforts to eradicate this practice through an education campaign conducted by government-employed health workers, and there are signs that the practice is diminishing, especially in urban areas.

Section 6 Workers Rights

a. The Right of Association

Benin's Constitution states that "union activities are guaranteed to workers," and workers are free to join the union of their choosing. However, the National Workers' Union of Benin (UNSTB), which is closely linked to the Government and party (the President of the National Assembly acts as head of the UNSTB), is the only legally recognized trade union federation in the country. Approximately 75 percent of wage earners belong to organized labor unions. Civil servants are obligated to join the UNSTB as a condition of their employment. In August Benin's National Union of High School Teachers declared its independence from the UNSTB and 2 weeks later held a widely publicized and cordial meeting with President Kerekou.

While the right to strike is not explicitly denied or protected in the Beninese labor code, the last labor strike prior to 1989 occurred in 1975 and was forcibly suppressed by the Government after 3 days. However, at various times during 1989 civil service employees at all 15 government ministries, teachers, and professors went on strike for nonpayment of salary arrears. Given such broad opposition, the Government did not interfere with the strikes, but it arrested several persons who allegedly engaged in vandalism or other activities causing public disturbances during the strikes. Also, during a strike by workers at the sugar cane factory at Save in January 1989, soldiers reportedly opened fire into the crowd in an attempt to restore order, killing at least one worker.

The UNSTB is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is provided for under the Beninese labor code. Individual labor unions negotiate with employers on labor matters and represent workers' grievances to employers and to the Government. The Government often acts as arbiter. Until the National Union of High School Teachers became independent in August, all labor organizing and collective bargaining took place under the umbrella of the government-controlled UNSTB. The Beninese labor code prohibits employers from taking union membership or activity into account when making decisions on hiring, work distribution, professional or vocational training, or dismissals. Benin's labor laws apply throughout the country, including in the export processing zone.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited under Article 3 of the Beninese labor code and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age For Employment of Children

The Beninese labor code prohibits the employment or apprenticeship of children under the age of 18 in any enterprise. However, enforcement is erratic at best, and child labor does occur, especially in the subsistence economy, where children below the age of 14 often work on family farms.

Benin's labor force of 1.9 million (out of a population of 4.5 million) is primarily employed in agriculture (80 percent), with less than 2 percent of the population involved in the industrial (wage) sector. For the wage sector, the Beninese labor code establishes a 40-hour workweek and sets a minimum wage of approximately $40 per month. In many instances, however, the Government's ability to enforce labor laws and regulations in the wage sector is limited by a shortage of administrative and financial resources and a difficult economic environment in which unemployment is high. The minimum wage level normally provides for a degree of food and housing for a family, but in order to provide a decent living it usually has to be supplemented by other means, such as subsistence farming.

The Government has given vigorous support to policies designed to improve the conditions of workers in both the agricultural and industrial sectors. It has, for example, committed itself to the provision of free or low-cost medical care and social services and set occupational safety standards. The labor code sets stringent health and safety standards, but again the resources needed to enforce these regulations are limited.

BOTSWANA

Botswana is a multiparty democracy. The Constitution vests executive power in the President, currently Quett K. J. Masire, who was elected in 1984. The President selects the Cabinet from the 38-member unicameral National Assembly. While there are several political parties in Botswana, in practice the country's politics are dominated by the ruling Botswana Democratic Party (BDP), which has held a large parliamentary majority since independence in 1966. All citizens, including whites, are free to participate fully in the economic and political life of Botswana.

Botswana's small army, the Botswana Defense Force (BDF), consists of 6,200 soldiers. The national police force numbers about 2,900. Both the BDF and the police are subordinate to civilian authority. The army is still being expanded to help resist incursions by the South African Defense Force (SADF) against suspected ANC (African National Congress) targets in Botswana. There were no cross-border raids by South African defense forces in 1989. However, there were continued bomb threats and minor explosions (believed by local observers to be engineered by South Africa) which reinforced Botswana's security worries.

Botswana has a mixed economy and strongly encourages private enterprise. Fueled by the development of mineral resources, especially diamonds, the country's economy has grown at a rapid rate, with real growth in gross domestic product (GDP) averaging 11 percent since 1979. Since independence in 1966, per capita GDP has increased from $69 to approximately $1,500 in 1988. However, some 75 percent of Botswana's population lives in rural areas and remains partially dependent for its livelihood on subsistence farming and animal husbandry.

Botswana's human rights record remained good in most respects. The legal rights of citizens are provided for by law and respected in practice. Political violence is virtually unknown, and there is a wide range of public expression. However, violence against women is a persistent problem in a male-dominated society, and mistreatment of detainees, though not condoned by the Government, persists.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reported killings instigated either by the Government or opposition groups. Unlike previous years, there were no casualties from alleged South African incursions against suspected ANC targets in 1989.

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are continuing reports of police improperly treating persons in custody. Some lawyers report that the police often beat up suspects and detainees, although the practice is not universal or condoned by political leaders or government officials. Penalties for police abuses can range from internal police disciplinary action to regular criminal prosecution, as in a recent case where a constable was prosecuted for unlawful wounding of a suspect. Police may also be sued in civil court if they abuse arrestees.

Flogging is commonly used as a sentence for men for a variety of offenses, including violation of prison rules, rape, armed robbery, burglary, and related offenses.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Citizens are protected from arbitrary arrest under the Constitution. After an arrest, a suspect must be charged before a magistrate within 48 hours. Once a suspect has appeared before a magistrate, he can be detained only if the magistrate issues a writ of detention, which is valid for 14 days. The detention writ must be renewed every 14 days thereafter. There are complaints that police and rangers from the Department of Wildlife sometimes hold people longer than the prescribed 48 hours, but it is not a general practice and offending officers are punished or sued successfully in civil actions. Persons charged under the National Security Act must be arraigned before a magistrate within 96 hours. Under this Act, suspects, once arraigned, may be held indefinitely, but this Act has rarely been invoked in practice. There are no reported abuses of these detention procedures. There is a functioning system of bail, and arrestees have access to attorneys of their choice, although there is no functioning system of public defenders for those unable to afford a lawyer.

There is no practice of incommunicado detention in Botswana. However, Botswana does not promptly or automatically notify embassies when foreign citizens are detained or arrested.

The Constitution allows the President to declare a person a prohibited immigrant and deport him from the country. No explanation is required, nor is any normally given, and the order is not subject to judicial review. A prohibited immigrant can reenter Botswana only with the permission of the President or his designated representative. In 1989 one person, a British journalist, was deported under this provision, reportedly for maintaining a relationship with African National Congress supporters.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

Botswana's judiciary is independent of the executive and legislative branches of government in both law and actual practice. Botswana has two court systems, the regular courts and the customary (traditional) courts.

In the regular courts, the defendant's rights to due process are guaranteed by law and largely honored in practice. Trials are held in public, and court records are public. Trials under the National Security Act (NSA) may be held in camera, but no trials took place in 1989 under the NSA. Defendants have the right to be represented by an attorney, but the courts as a rule only appoint public defenders for those charged with capital crimes (murder and treason); the lawyers in these cases serve on a pro bono basis. Thus, those charged with noncapital crimes are often tried without legal representation if they cannot afford an attorney. Defendants can confront witnesses and present evidence. While the burden of proving guilt lies with the prosecution in ordinary criminal cases, some provisions of the National Security Act appear to shift the burden of proof to the accused. However, these provisions have yet to be tested because the Government has not yet brought charges under the National Security Act.

The customary courts usually handle land, marital, and property disputes as well as minor crimes. There are clearly defined appeal procedures and appeal courts in both systems, with the possibility of appeals to the highest court in Botswana, the High Court. Customary courts are open only to members of a tribe. The chief presides over the court, and there are no attorneys for either side.

There were no political prisoners in Botswana at the end of 1989. Two South African commandos, who were convicted of treason in October 1988 for their participation in a bloody commando raid inside Botswana, remained in prison. (Botswana's law, which is based on Roman-Dutch law, allows even noncitizens to be charged with treason.) The High Court turned down the commandos' appeal in July 1989, although it did set aside the sentence of corporal punishment.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

These rights are safeguarded by law and respected in practice. A search warrant issued by a magistrate is required for an official to enter a private residence, except in cases of suspected diamond theft, drug trafficking, or national security matters. There were no reported instances where this exceptional authority was exercised in 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press:

Freedom of speech and press are provided for in the Constitution and are respected in practice. Opposition viewpoints and criticism of the Government are freely expressed, as was evident during the campaigning for the October parliamentary elections. In two instances the police videotaped political rallies, but a public outcry forced them to cease this practice.

Although the Botswana Press Agency (BOPA) is part of the Department of Information and Broadcasting, it functions with a great deal of autonomy, and its editorials do not always reflect the Government's view. However, both the Government and the independent press follow unwritten rules against criticizing senior officials directly or discussing the personal lives or financial affairs of important figures. Moreover, one independent newspaper which printed a story critical of the Government soon found few advertisers and attributed this action to government pressure. In addition, access to government officials is difficult for the independent press as civil servants reportedly prefer the "tame" reporters from BOPA.

There is an ongoing debate on the proper coverage of national security issues, which has, in the past, brought the independent press under strong government criticism. Controversy arose in 1988 when the Government barred reporters and seized their notes during the court-martial trial of a Botswana Defense Force (BDF) corporal, claiming "national security" would be compromised by coverage of the trial. The press insisted that the Government was using "national security" to mask politically embarrassing facts.

Books and publications are not censored. Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Botswana has a long history of peaceful assembly which is integral to their traditional village life and is exemplified in the village meeting, the kgotla. During kgotla meetings, people freely question leaders and voice opinions on local politics. Permits are required for public meetings and demonstrations and are usually granted as long as the police believe public order will be maintained.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is practiced and encouraged. There is no state religion in Botswana, although the majority of the population claim a denomination of Christianity as their belief. Active groups of Hindus, Muslims, Baha'is, and others practice their faiths freely. There are no restrictions on religious groups, their places of worship, the training of members of clergy, religious publishing, religious education, conversion, or participation in charitable activity. Missionaries are allowed to enter the country and proselytize, and foreign clergy can enter and serve expatriate congregations. There is no discrimination based on religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens of Botswana are not restricted in their movements within the country, in their foreign travel, emigration, or their right to return. Passports are easily obtained. Refugees documented by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) are readily accepted into Botswana, although they are required to live in the refugee settlement at Dukwe. Refugees may be authorized to live elsewhere for documented reasons. Due to allegations from neighboring countries that refugees are using Botswana as a launching area for operations against their home countries, Botswana has declared that Dukwe refugees found off the settlement without permission will have abandoned refugee status and will be repatriated.

Although the Government revoked the refugee status of Zimbabweans remaining in Botswana in July 1989, the Government, in cooperation with the UNHCR, has been remarkably understanding regarding their plight. The Government has given special consideration to integrating selected persons, including students and employed workers.

Citizens have the right peacefully to change their government through democratic means, although in practice one party, the BDP, has dominated Parliament since independence. The President and Members of Parliament are elected by universal suffrage and secret ballot. Thirty-four of the 38 members of the National Assembly are elected every 5 years; the remaining 4 are appointed by the President. Following the October elections, the BDP holds 28 of the 34 elective seats in the National Assembly. At present there are eight political parties. Two of the parties were established just prior to the deadline for registering parties for the October elections. At the end of 1989, three of the parties were represented in Parliament.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no international investigations of human rights in Botswana in 1989, and the Government continued to permit international organizations involved in humanitarian affairs to operate in the country. In general, the Government rarely comments on human rights violations in other countries though it frequently denounces South Africa's apartheid.

There are no active human rights organizations in Botswana which focus specifically on domestic issues, but a national-level, nongovernmental human rights watch group, the Botswana Association for Human Rights, was in the process of organization at the end of 1989. The goals of the Association are to focus national attention on those laws which need to be amended, to make recommendations to the national law reform committee, to heighten public awareness about human rights, and to pressure the Government to ratify more of the existing international instruments on human rights.

The Tswana majority comprises an estimated 95 percent of the population. Although ethnic differences are not entirely absent, no ethnic or other group suffers from serious discrimination. Groups that live in remote areas, including the Kgalagadi and the San (formerly called bushmen), are becoming increasingly integrated into social service programs, but still lag behind the rest of the population in terms of educational and economic development and continue to be poorly represented in the political arena.

Women make up 53.9 percent of the population, and almost 50 percent of female Batswana are heads of households. Political, social, and economic opportunities for women are limited by a series of laws, and women have no legal recourse to challenge sex discrimination cases.

Women married under either common law or customary (tribal) law are subject to practices in which wives assume a legal status equivalent to the husband's child. Essentially, this means that a woman cannot make a legally binding agreement without her husband's consent or assistance. A woman can enter a binding transaction as a public trader, but she can become a trader only with the consent of her husband. Under customary law the husband is permitted to have other wives after consulting with the first wife and the families. Deference to the husband's wishes also carries over into the health field where a woman is required to obtain her husband's permission for the use of contraceptives or for such operations as a hysterectomy.

Many observers believe that domestic violence is common in Botswana and is increasing. Under customary marital practices, men have traditionally held the right to physically "chastise" their wives, although this attitude is gradually changing. Because marital problems are considered to be a problem to be dealt with between the husband and the wife, the police are reluctant to intervene. Frequently problems are settled through the extended families, and as a result, few cases of domestic violence ever come before the courts. The incidence of rape is also increasing in Botswana. The maximum penalty is life imprisonment with mandatory corporal punishment; the average sentence is 4 years with corporal punishment. A form of female circumcision exists in Botswana, but is rarely performed and only by traditional doctors.

The Government has been slow to introduce reforms to improve the status of women. The governing party only established a women's wing in 1987 to focus on women's issues. There has been, since 1981, in the Ministry of Home Affairs, a women's affairs unit, which has published a woman's guide to the law and information on the citizenship law and undertaken research on maternity leave problems, teenage pregnancy, and various laws affecting women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers are free to establish or join labor unions. Government workers who are pensionable may not join unions, although they may have associations that function as quasi-unions. Unions are well developed in the mineral sector and also among railway workers and bank employees, but other sectors are less well organized by trade unions. There is one major confederation of unions, the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU).

Trade unions in Botswana are independent of government control or party affiliation, and they actively seek to represent the interests of their members. However, union leadership is severely restricted by a government regulation that requires all elected union officials to work full time in the industry their union represents. This practice has been criticized by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), which has also noted that "the dissolution of trade union organizations by government is possible under the law at all times."

Botswana also severely restricts the unions' right to strike. Legal strikes are theoretically possible, but only after an exhaustive arbitration process, so that there has never been a legal strike in Botswana's history. However, illegal wildcat strikes were common in 1989, including major job stoppages by teachers and bank employees. Once a strike has been declared illegal by the Government, management has the right to dismiss employees, and strikers can be jailed. The Government has yet to employ such extreme measures against strikers, although the Government did withhold prestrike pay from striking teachers.

Unions may freely join international organizations and labor representatives regularly attend international conferences. BFTU is affiliated with the ICFTU. In addition, the Botswana Mine Workers Union belongs to a regional mine workers' union federation. However, unions have chafed under government regulations which prohibit unions from receiving financial contributions from outside Botswana.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Although employers are required under the Trade Union Act to bargain with any trade union that has organized at least 25 percent of the work force, the actual frequency of collective bargaining varies depending upon the organizing strength of the union in a particular industry. Collective bargaining is common in sectors such as mining and railways where the trade unions are relatively strong, but virtually nonexistent in other sectors. Collective bargaining is also limited by the Government's incomes policy, which sets public sector salaries as a benchmark for private sector wage settlements.

Although there are laws in Botswana which prohibit employers from dismissing workers for union activities, there is some dispute as to how well they are enforced. Other reasons are always given for such dismissals, so it is difficult for the dismissed employee to prove that union activities were the real reason. Dismissals can be appealed to labor officers or the civil courts, but labor officers rarely do much more than order 2 months' severance pay, and most workers cannot afford civil litigation. There are no export processing zones in Botswana. Labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is not practiced in Botswana and is specifically forbidden in the Constitution.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Botswana law prohibits the employment of children under 12 years of age by anyone except members of the child's immediate family. No juvenile under the age of 15 may be employed in any industry, and only those over 16 may be employed in night work. No person 16 or younger is permitted to work in hazardous jobs, including mining. Botswana law also protects young people from recruiters for jobs outside the country. There are reports that some scattered violations of these standards do occur, especially in small-scale enterprises, in large part because the Department of Labor in the Ministry of Labor is insufficiently staffed to enforce full compliance. Although education is not yet compulsory, it is almost universally available, and most children attend school at least through the primary grades. The Government has indicated it hopes to make 9 years of education compulsory by 1992.

Botswana requires a minimum wage of approximately $80 per month. The minimum wage is generally enforced. This amount is barely adequate for one person to maintain a decent standard of living, and, in most cases, workers must supplement this amount through other means, such as subsistence farming. Most Botswana families have more than one wage earner.

Botswana law mandates a maximum 48-hour workweek, with provisions for overtime pay (time and a half) for work over 48 hours. Most major employers adhere to the workweek laws, but some smaller firms refuse to pay overtime, and no action is taken against them.

The Government sets job health and safety standards, and these regulations appear to be generally observed, although the Department of Labor lacks personnel to ensure enforcement.

BURKINA FASO

Burkina Faso is ruled by a military regime headed by Captain Blaise Compaore, who took power from Thomas Sankara on October 15, 1987 in the country's fourth military coup since 1980. The new military regime continued the ban on political parties and activities and gave no indication that the country will return to constitutional rule. Instead, President Compaore moved to firm up a narrow political base by forming a "popular front" of various leftwing and centrist groups, military officers, and miscellaneous civilians to assist in running the Government. He has also formed a network of Revolutionary Committees (CR's), loosely organized at national, regional, and local levels, to mobilize the population and promote revolutionary goals.

The Burkina Faso armed forces number about 7,500 members, including 5,200 in the army, 100 in the air force, and 2,200 in the paramilitary gendarmerie and the police. All police and internal security forces are controlled by the Ministry of Defense.

Burkina Faso, one of the world's poorer countries, is overwhelmingly tied to subsistence agriculture, with 90 percent of the population living in rural areas. Agriculture is, however, highly vulnerable to fluctuations in rainfall. Frequent drought, lack of communications and other infrastructure, a low literacy rate, and a stagnant economy are all longstanding problems. The country has a per capita income of about $180 per year.

Human rights continued to be circumscribed in 1989. Problem areas were extrajudicial killings, arbitrary detentions, mistreatment of detainees, and restrictions on press, speech, assembly, and the right of citizens to change their government through peaceful means. The Government did allow the establishment of a local human rights organization (which intervened in some specific cases), permitted some political groupings to form and distribute pamphlets discreetly, and released all political opponents held in prison.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Four members of the armed forces were summarily executed without trial in September 1989 after allegedly plotting a coup d'etat. The four were Minister of Defense Major Jean-Baptiste Lengani, Minister of Economic Promotion Captain Henri Zongo, the officer in charge of the communications unit, Captain Sabyamba Koundaba, and an unidentified bodyguard of the Minister of Defense. After the coup attempt of Christmas 1989, the Government made a point of denying rumors that 7 people had been executed and said all arrestees would receive trials.

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearance.

BURKINA FASO

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and mistreatment of detainees have been persistent problems for a number of years. Amnesty International published a special report in 1988, "Burkina Faso, Political Imprisonment and the Use of Torture from 1983 to 1988," giving accounts of the imprisonment of political opponents and torture under the present and preceding governments. Police brutality continued in 1989, although there were fewer credible reports, usually involving severe beatings, often at the time of apprehension. A Catholic Church-sponsored organization has alleged that the police and gendarmerie beat and tortured at least 15 people arrested for political reasons in 1989. The Government denied that anyone has been tortured.

Prison conditions are poor, with most prisons holding double their design capacity, and are characterized by the lack of sufficient food, minimum hygiene, and medical support.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were continuing reports in 1989 of arbitrary arrest. The law permits preventive detention without charge for a maximum of 72 hours, renewable for a single 72-hour period in criminal cases. In practice, there are frequent violations of this restriction in cases involving both Burkinabe and foreign nationals, especially in political cases. Several schoolchildren, for example, were held in detention without charge for a number of months in 1988. In addition, in cases of emergency or national security, the military code, which provides for indefinite detention, overrides the civil code. Access to lawyers is not normally permitted in security cases, although it is provided for by law.

The Government detained several persons for political reasons during 1989, but by the end of the year all had been released, many within a few days of their arrest. Immediately following the discovery of the alleged coup plot on September 18, three or four government officials were arrested and held briefly for questioning. These persons were later released, but four others were summarily executed without trial. The Government also released a number of persons detained since the overthrow of the Sankara government in 1987, including former Interior Minister Ernest Nongria Ouedraogo. In this connection, 23 junior military personnel, detained at various times since Sankara's overthrow on suspicion of coup-plotting, were released August 4, 1989. An unknown number of people were arrested as a result of a coup attempt over Christmas 1989. Numbers rumored range from 5 to 30 prisoners, including military personnel. They were still being held at year's end, and the Government had provided no names or other information, despite requests.

Some intellectuals, ex-military officers, and former government officials remain in self-imposed exile abroad, partly due to fear for their safety should they return. Captain Boukary Kabore, leader of resistance at Koudougou airforce base against Compoare's coup in 1987, is now exiled in Ghana. He charged in 1989 that the popular front Government is attempting to liquidate all remaining Sankara loyalists. The Government has encouraged opponents of the Sankara regime to return home, but few have done so. Kabore stated in an interview in November that if he had the chance to seize power in Burkina, he would do so.

BURKINA FASO

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The regular judiciary, patterned after the French system, has continued to function for most criminal and civil cases. Defendants traditionally receive a fair trial and are represented by counsel. In 1987 the Government began the practice of appointing civil service attorneys to represent those who do not wish to retain, or are unable to afford, a private attorney.

The people's revolutionary courts begun under Sankara continued to hear cases primarily involving public corruption. The president of each people's court is a magistrate appointed by the Government to head a tribunal composed of magistrates, military personnel, and members of the CR's. The court president asks questions directly of the defendant.

In December 1988, seven soldiers were convicted by a military court in Bobo Dioulasso. The trial was held in secret, and the seven were executed the day after conviction without an opportunity to appeal. In the 1989 case of the four persons summarily executed, there was no known trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government authorities generally do not interfere in the daily lives of ordinary citizens, and there is no general monitoring of private correspondence or telephones. Under the law, homes may be searched only under authority of a warrant issued by the attorney general. An exception exists, however, in national security cases, where a special law permits surveillance, searches, and monitoring of telephones and correspondence without a warrant. This law is used against persons suspected of opposition to the Government.

The Government encourages participation in the CR's and also in organizations being formed to support the Popular Front. However, it was still not clear in 1989 if lack of participation will result in dismissals from civil service positions, as was the case in previous regimes.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While there is no formal government censorship, the Government employs intimidating methods to limit freedom of speech and press. For example, repeated references by the regime to enemies of the State at home and abroad inhibit both government-employed journalists and ordinary citizens from expressing critical views. Similarly, it uses occasional dismissals from government service and arbitrary arrest to quash debate on political topics. In 1989 several persons were arrested and held briefly for distributing political leaflets.

Under the control of the Minister of Information, the media, which consists of a daily newspaper, a weekly magazine, a monthly magazine, and radio and television stations, are all government owned, and all journalists are civil servants. The media do not engage in serious criticism of the Government and reflects government positions on both international and national issues. Journalists who try to report stories without political bias may be replaced for failing to support sufficiently the political views of the Government. In 1989 a private newspaper, L'Observateur, attempted to publish its first edition since it was burned down in 1984. The Government quickly cut off the electricity and stationed police at the doors, ostensibly because the newspaper did not have the proper permits. It subsequently made it clear that no permit will be granted. A small, private all-music radio station authorized to broadcast in the last days of the Sankara administration remains closed as well, after being shut down in the first days of the Compaore Government.

A new information code has been pending for more than a year. A number of proposed provisions involve insuring government control of any means of communication, publicly or privately owned, and government licensing of journalists. It would also institute prison terms or fines for violation of the code.

Foreign newspapers and magazines entered the country freely during 1989. For the most part, foreign journalists traveled freely and filed stories without censorship and enjoyed access to government officials. Films are subject to censorship by a review board which includes religious authorities as well as government officials. There were no known instances of political censorship of movies. There is no interference with international radio broadcasts.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Under both the Sankara and Compaore Governments, political parties as such have been banned, and administrative permission is generally required for assemblies of any kind. However, in 1989 the Government permitted several small political groupings to meet more or less openly, with the more centrist groups invited to join the Government's popular front. Nonpolitical associations for business, religious, cultural, and other purposes exist and experience no difficulty in obtaining permission to meet or in associating with international bodies in their fields.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Burkina Faso is a secular state, and there is no official discrimination on religious grounds. Islam and Christianity exist side by side, with about 40 percent of the population Muslim and about 15 percent Christian. The remainder of the population practices traditional African religions. Muslim and Christian holidays are recognized as national holidays. Social mobility and access to modern sector jobs are neither linked to, nor restricted by, religious affiliations.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travelers within Burkina Faso are routinely stopped at police and military checkpoints. There appears to be little restriction on foreign travel for business and tourism. Exit permits, once used to limit movements of workers to neighboring countries, particularly to Cote d'Ivoire where 2 million or more Burkinabe continue to reside and work, are no longer required.

BURKINA FASO

Refugees are accepted freely in Burkina Faso, and attempts are made to provide for their care in cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. There were approximately 270 refugees and displaced persons in Burkina Faso at the end of 1989, mainly from Chad.

Citizens do not have the right to change their government through democratic procedures. The military have dominated the political process since 1980 through four changes in leadership. To bolster his popular front, President Compaore has taken some steps to create an opening to small conservative and centrist political forces, but he has not publicly indicated any movement toward a constitution, national elections, or political parties in the future. He relies on an amorphous grouping of people, including military officers, to help run the Government and has a loose network of Revolutionary Committees throughout the country to mobilize support.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no known international investigations of Burkina in 1989. A new, local human rights organization, the Burkina Movement for Human Rights and Rights of Peoples (MBDHP), was formed, led publicly by the President, Administrative Chamber of the Superior Court. While the MBDHP has not directly publicly criticized the Government on specific human rights issues, after the September executions it publicly reaffirmed its opposition to the death penalty and the need in Burkina for fair public trials. Privately, it has brought a number of specific issues to the attention of the Government, such as the treatment of prisoners immediately after the September 1989 coup plot. Members were not harassed in 1989.

Minority ethnic groups are as likely to be represented in the inner circles of the Government as are the dominant Mossi, who comprise 50 percent of the population. Government decisions do not favor one ethnic group over another.

In the largely rural African society of Burkina Faso, women still occupy a subordinate position. Women supply much of the labor in family farming and are active in the market economy. The Government is committed to expanding opportunities for women, including in cabinet and civil service positions.

Women make up one-fourth of the government work force, which represents one-third of the total salaried work force in the country. Women make up approximately one-third of the total student population in the primary, secondary, and advanced school systems. While there is no known discrimination against women in the granting of scholarships for advanced study, schools in rural areas have disproportionately fewer girls than schools in urban areas.

Violence against women, especially wife beating, occurs fairly frequently in the rural areas, less often in the urban areas. The Government is attempting through the National Women's Association (UFB) to educate people on the subject. Specific cases can be brought to the UFB which attempts to offer protection and counsel. Such cases are sometimes brought before a "popular conciliation tribunal" for mediation. The Government also sponsors campaigns against female genital mutilation, which still occurs in many rural areas, although it is becoming less common in urban centers. Another form of mutilation is by scarring the face of both boys and girls of certain ethnic groups, which is rapidly disappearing. The UFB also takes the leadership in these campaigns.

BURKINA FASO

a. The Right of Association

Workers have traditionally had the legal right to associate. There are a number of autonomous unions and five labor federations. Organized labor continues to be an important force in Burkina Faso. All unions jealously guard their limited independence from the Government. However, despite legal rights, the unions have been prevented from engaging in activities the Government opposes. Under the previous regime, many labor leaders were arrested and held for long periods. Some were reportedly tortured. One former trade union official was detained briefly in September 1989, allegedly in connection with a nonunion dispute.

Organized labor has the legal right to strike, but the Sankara government eliminated this right in practice. The Compaore Government has not faced major labor unrest, and its attitude has yet to be tested. There were several minor strikes in 1989. The International Labor Organization's (ILO) Committee of Experts noted with satisfaction in 1989 that all the teachers dismissed following a strike in 1989 had been reinstated, that sanctions against officials had been lifted, and that all political prisoners and administrative detainees had been freed.

The largest federation, the National Organization of Free Trade Unions, is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Another federation is affiliated with the World Confederation of Labor, and a third is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. The other two federations are unaffiliated. The five federations take turns representing labor at the ILO meetings and participate in African regional labor meetings as well.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions have the right to bargain for wages and other benefits within a specific bargaining unit, such as a company or factory, but cannot bargain industry-wide. They represent the interests of their members in the private and public sectors, as well as before the labor inspection service of the Government and before the courts.

There are no export processing zones in Burkina Faso.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is not employed and is prohibited by law.

BURKINA FASO

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The labor code sets the minimum age for employment at 14, the average age for completion of basic secondary school. However, the Government lacks the means to enforce this provision adequately, even in the small-wage sector. Most children actually begin work at an earlier age owing to the large number of small, family subsistence farms and the traditional apprenticeship system.

A minimum monthly wage of about $75 and a maximum workweek of 48 hours are stipulated by the labor code, as are safety and health provisions. This minimum wage is not adequate for a worker to support a family, and wage workers usually must rely on supplementing income through the extended family and subsistence agriculture. A system of government inspections and labor courts ensures that these provisions are applied in the small industrial and commercial sectors, but they have been impossible to enforce in the dominant subsistence agriculture sector which involves 90 percent of the population.

BURUNDI

The Republic of Burundi is a one-party, military-controlled state led by President Pierre Buyoya, an army major who came to power in a bloodless coup in September 1987. The executive power is held by a 30-member Military Committee for National Salvation. The 22-member Cabinet appointed by the Military Committee is composed of 20 civilians and 2 military officers. While the Military Committee is the ultimate decisionmaking body, the Cabinet formulates and proposes policies and manages the day-to-day business of government. The National Party for Unity and Progress (UPRONA) is the only political entity in Burundi. As President of the Republic and head of the Military Committee, Buyoya plays a dominant policy role. With the Constitution suspended officially, President Buyoya exercises legislative and regulatory powers as well. After assuming power in 1987, Buyoya embarked upon a slow but steady campaign to promote ethnic justice. The dominance of the minority Tutsi over the majority Hutu ethnic group remains the overriding social and political issue in Burundi. It was an underlying cause of a serious outbreak of interethnic violence in northern Burundi in August 1988, in which at least 5,000 people lost their lives after Hutu peasants began killing local Tutsis, followed by a bloody military intervention to restore order. In the wake of the violence, the Government accelerated its policies of ethnic conciliation. This helped lead to the rapid repatriation of the approximately 50,000 refugees who had fled to neighboring Rwanda and the thousands of others who had sought refuge elsewhere in Burundi.

The Burundian armed forces, dominated by the Tutsi, are small in number but well equipped and well trained to maintain law and order. In addition, there is a regular police force responsible for public order and a separate force of security police responsible primarily for internal state security, including the monitoring of dissent. The State Security Police have the same powers of arrest as the regular police and are subject to the same process of judicial review.

Burundi is a poor country with one of the highest population densities in Africa. The AIDS epidemic has made serious inroads among its 5 million people, and it is expected to adversely affect economic activity in coming years. Most Burundians (90 percent) earn their livelihood as subsistence farmers working small, privately owned plots. The small monetary economy is based on coffee, which accounts for nearly 90 percent of foreign exchange earnings, and other cash crops. Burundi is one of the highest per capita recipients of foreign assistance in Africa.

While human rights continued to be restricted in several key areas in 1989, President Buyoya accelerated efforts to achieve ethnic reconciliation in the wake of the August 1988 violence. By the early months of 1989, the repatriation and resettlement of nearly all of the 50,000 refugees under the auspices of the Quadrilateral Commission of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire had been completed efficiently and without serious incident. Throughout 1989 the Government and party undertook an extensive public education campaign based on dialog between Hutus and Tutsis. In May the National Unity Commission, a high-level assembly of representatives of both ethnic communities charged by President Buyoya with recommending long-term solutions to the ethnic problem, released its report. The Commission called for sweeping changes, including the reestablishment of democratic institutions, the elimination of discriminatory employment practices, educational reform, and the creation of a national body to oversee the operations of the security services. By year's end, considerable progress had been made in the areas of education and employment, but progress was slow in integrating Hutus into the military forces. Major human rights concerns in 1989 included mistreatment of prisoners (one detainee died of beatings while in custody in 1989) and restrictions on freedom of press, assembly, and the right of citizens to change their government by democratic means.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no confirmed instances of politically motivated or government-instigated killings in 1989. From the evidence that emerged in late 1988 and early 1989, including house-to-house censuses in the affected communes coordinated by international organizations, most outside observers are now in agreement that the August 1988 ethnic violence resulted in between 5,000 and 10,000 deaths. The Government acknowledged that innocent civilians were among the victims of the Army intervention, but it denied vengeance killings took place. There is no public information that the Government has taken any action to punish soldiers who may have exceeded their orders in using force against innocent civilians.

There were occasional reports by exile opposition groups of disappearances in Burundi during 1989, but international relief and human rights organizations have not been able to confirm any such cases. It is likely that several cases of disappearance connected with the ethnic violence in August 1988 will never be resolved, given the uncertainty over the number of deaths and the large population flows that occurred in the affected areas in the following months.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden by law, but cruel treatment of suspects or detainees has occasionally occurred in the form of beatings at the time of arrest or interrogation. A September 1989 incident in which a detainee in Bujumbura died following a beating was documented in the government-owned newspaper, which reported that the officer in question was being prosecuted.

Since coming to power, the Buyoya regime has allowed regular inspection of prison conditions by the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). ICRC access to individuals detained following the ethnic violence in 1988 was restricted for nearly 3 months, and access to a dozen detainees suspected of participating in a coup plot was restricted briefly in early 1989. In both instances, full access was restored. Prison conditions remain severe due to lack of adequate hygiene, medical care, and food; but the Government has begun a program of improving conditions.

BURUNDI

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Police officers are empowered to detain suspects without an arrest warrant but must submit a written report to the public prosecutor's office within 24 hours. The public prosecutor examines the report and can either order the release of the detainee or issue an arrest warrant valid for 5 days. The public prosecutor then must state the charges before a magistrate in the presence of the detainee. The magistrate either releases the detainee or issues orders confirming the detention, initially for 15 days and subsequently for 30-day periods as necessary to prepare the case for trial. Bail is set only in cases of embezzlement or similar crimes involving financial wrongdoing. In general, the prescribed procedures for arrest and imprisonment are followed. However, time limits for issuance of arrest warrants and appearance before a magistrate are often exceeded, usually due to a shortage of magistrates and prosecutors. The Government has begun to address this problem by increasing the number of magistrates.

There were no known political detainees at the end of 1989. Approximately 40 persons arrested in the wake of the August 1988 violence remained in custody at the end of 1989 pending completion of investigations. A dozen individuals, including two military officers and several prominent businessmen, were detained in March in connection with an alleged coup and have not yet been brought to trial. Six signatories (among 27) of an open letter to the President criticizing the Army's role in the ethnic violence were released in January 1989 and allowed to return to their former jobs. Two other signatories were detained briefly in 1988. Of the others, several fled the country, while those who remained of this group were not detained. The signatory students were readmitted to the university.

In June between 10 and 20 local members of the Jehovah's Witnesses were detained for acts of civil disobedience, such as refusing to salute the flag. According to reliable sources, all those detained were released by early fall.

The Government does not exile its nationals as a means of political control. Since his ouster, Ex-President Bagaza and his wife have been denied permission to return to Burundi, but the Buyoya Government has said it is willing to negotiate the conditions of their return. Citizens of other countries suspected of criminal activity or lacking proper residency documents are often expelled. This occurred in April when the entire Libyan community, including resident diplomats, was expelled in the wake of an alleged coup plot.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary's independence is limited by the requirement that it adhere to the guidance and recommendations of the party, the Government, and the President. Judges are appointed by and serve at the pleasure of the President. In general, there is a high degree of autonomy in the court's daily administration of justice. The President has the power to pardon or reduce sentences. In cases of major political interest, the Government has occasionally interfered with the judiciary.

BURUNDI

Burundi has separate court systems to deal with military, civil/criminal, and state security cases. In early 1989, a new court, the Cour des Comptes (Court of Accounts), was established to investigate and prosecute cases of official corruption. While little is known about this Court's proceedings, it became important in 1989 in prosecuting high-level officials. Military tribunals have jurisdiction only over military personnel. The State Security Court has jurisdiction over both civilian and military personnel, and its proceedings need not be made public. To date, this Court has been used only once, in prosecuting ex-President Micombero in the mid-1970's. Burundi law provides the right to counsel, and indigents are provided defense counsel by the State. Pretrial proceedings may involve lengthy investigations. The courts are hampered by a lack of trained legal personnel and by heavy case loads.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The inviolability of the home and of private correspondence were provided for in the suspended Constitution and are still respected in practice. A judicial warrant is required for a law enforcement official to enter and search a private residence. The State Security Office monitors political dissent through the State Security Police and by employing informers who report on discontent and dissent as well as on criminal activity. Membership in the sole legal party is not required by law. There is no coercive population control.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While there are significant restrictions on speech and press freedoms, since the beginning of the Buyoya regime there has been an unprecedented outpouring of public debate and questioning on formerly taboo subjects, such as ethnic relations and official corruption. The debate on ethnic relations intensified following the 1988 ethnic violence, and throughout 1989 party meetings were held in every province to discuss the ethnic issue. Political debate is largely confined to UPRONA party meetings, the forum for dialog officially encouraged by the Government. The Government's tolerance for public criticism outside party forums is limited. Possession of opposition political tracts is a punishable offense, e.g., the arrest, after the August 1988 ethnic killings, of a number of Hutu intellectuals and students, signatories of an open letter critical of the army's role, (see Section 1.d.).

The Government controls all domestic print and broadcast media. The French-language daily and Kirundi-language weekly newspapers are published by the Ministry of Information, which also operates the domestic radio and television stations. The media are traditionally required to support the fundamental policies of the party and the Government. Some criticism of the Government is permitted in the printed press, but journalists are state employees and subject to disciplinary action if their criticism goes beyond what is considered tolerable. The Government has interfered on occasion with the distribution of foreign news publications but has never interfered with radio reception from foreign sources. Public censorship occurs only in the case of sexually explicit foreign film material or publications

Academic freedom is limited. Primary and secondary school teachers are expected to support government policies. At the university, professors come from many different countries, both East and West, and are generally permitted to lecture freely in their subject areas, conduct research, and draw independent conclusions. However, two university professors were among the six signatories of the August 1988 open letter to President Buyoya who were detained for several months.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

In the aftermath of the August 1988 ethnic violence, a ban on public assemblies of more than five persons and a nationwide curfew were in effect for 2 1/2 months. No such measures were instituted in the spring of 1989 following the discovery of two coup plots. However, no political meetings or associations other than those tied to the ruling party are permitted. The Government permits nonpolitical private associations, but requires that they be registered and accorded legal recognition before they may function.

c. Freedom of Religion

Since coming to power, President Buyoya has made sweeping changes in Burundi's policies toward organized religion, reversing the repression of religious expression under the Bagaza regime. President Buyoya freed all religious prisoners, reopened the closed churches, returned confiscated church properties, including houses and schools, authorized weekday religious services, reinstituted the activities of catechists, and authorized church schools (including seminaries and literacy/catechism classes), publications, and radio broadcasts. Most of the missionaries who were expelled under President Bagaza are being allowed to return, and there are no restrictions on new missionaries.

Organized religion, in particular the Catholic Church, plays a key role in the development of the country and the lives of both rural and urban Burundians.

Religious expression continues to be regulated by civil laws and regulations. Religious organizations are subject to the same rules and restrictions which apply to secular organizations. All religious associations must receive approval from the Government to operate in Burundi, and a Burundian citizen must be appointed as legal representative of each association. Religious groups may not engage in political activity critical of the Government. During the Bagaza regime, two religions were banned: the Seventh-Day Adventists and the Jehovah's Witnesses. The Buyoya Government has since legally recognized the Adventist Church and returned all of its confiscated properties. It has, however, continued the ban on the Jehovah's Witnesses, allegedly because of their refusal to recognize the authority of the State (see Section 1.d.). There are no barriers to the maintenance of links with coreligionists in other countries. Participation in religious groups does not exclude individuals from membership in the UPRONA party or from receiving social benefits.

BURUNDI

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government has not instituted restrictions on internal travel since the aftermath of the August 1988 ethnic violence in the north, when nationwide restrictions were enforced for a period of 2 1/2 months.

Some 50,000 Burundian citizens fled to Rwanda following the 1988 ethnic violence in northern Burundi. Under the terms of an agreement negotiated in November 1988 by the Governments of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the Government of Burundi agreed inter alia to grant a general amnesty to those who had fled. All but a few hundred of the refugees had returned voluntarily to their homes by early 1989, and on May 31 voluntary repatriation ended. As with past returning refugees, this group of repatriated Burundians was accorded full rights as citizens.

The UNHCR reported that during the period September through November 1989, approximately 300 new refugees crossed from Burundi to the Muhero camp in Rwanda. This new outflow reflects residual fears in the areas affected by the events of August 1988. It was also probably prompted in part by police movements following a large-scale prison escape in the region in September.

Burundi claims to host some 260,000 refugees, most of whom are Rwandan Tutsis who have resided in Burundi since the 1960's. The Government works closely with the UNHCR in refugee matters and does not force resettlement. However, it has periodically repatriated Zairians and Rwandans who lack residence permits or who have been arrested on suspicion of criminal activities.

The Government continues to discourage migration to urban areas through an active public education campaign. Foreign travel and emigration are relatively free, though travelers must explain the reason for their trip and must surrender their passports to the Immigration Office on their return to Burundi. Prospective Burundian travelers must have exit visas as well as passports.

No mechanism exists in Burundi that allows citizens to change their government through democratic procedures. Since independence, there have been three changes of government, all by military coups. When he took office, President Buyoya promised a new constitution and a return to civilian rule within 2 years, but progress towards these goals has been slow. When it released its report in May, the government-appointed National Unity Commission called for increased democratization as a means of promoting ethnic conciliation, including the reinstatement of the constitution and the national legislature.

Political participation takes place only within the one-party structure, and voters can express dissatisfaction only by voting against incumbents for party positions. The party is open to all Burundian citizens supporting its principles, and both men and women are active members and officeholders. The UPRONA party, together with its affiliated youth, women's, and labor movements, claims a membership of approximately 1.4 million persons, over three-quarters of the adult population.

The party regularly holds local and regional meetings, where party members discuss issues and make recommendations. Formerly, the slate of candidates for local and national party offices was selected by government cadres and voted upon by party membership. Since President Buyoya came to power, any party member wishing to run for office can have his or her name on the ballot. Allegations that Hutus were discriminated against in this process are thought to have contributed to the unrest prior to the outbreak of ethnic violence in August 1988. Voting is secret in localities where members are literate, but in some rural areas where members are illiterate, voting is accomplished by a show of hands.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

After initially rejecting calls for an international investigation into the August 1988 ethnic violence, the Buyoya Government stated that it would permit the United Nations Secretary General to dispatch a U.N. Information Mission to examine ethnic tensions and the refugee problem. This mission, organized by local U.N. representatives, took place in late 1988 and reported positively on relevant developments. In addition, the Government permitted extensive visits by outside observers, including the ICRC, journalists, diplomats, and historians.

An Amnesty International delegation that visited Burundi in June urged the Government to ensure that all current detainees be brought to trial promptly and fairly if they face criminal charges, or else be released.

Burundi is a party to several United Nations' instruments on human rights. In July 1989 it ratified the Human Rights Charter of the Organization of African Unity.

Historically, the minority Tutsi have dominated the majority Hutu people. Civil strife has erupted between the two groups several times in the modern era, most recently in 1972 and 1988. In both instances, a Hutu uprising that left many Tutsi dead was followed by military intervention that resulted in massive killings of Hutus. The violence was followed in both cases by thousands of Hutu refugees fleeing Burundi, and in both cases after the violence had subsided the refugees were encouraged by the Government to return. Unlike in 1988, large numbers of those who fled in 1972 remained outside the country. Another important dissimilarity was that the 1988 killings were limited in area and duration, and the Government moved rapidly to restore ethnic confidence with the support of the international community. In the aftermath of the 1988 violence, President Buyoya stepped up the pace of reform, appointing a Hutu Prime Minister, an ethnically balanced Cabinet, and a National Unity Commission to recommend fundamental reforms.

De facto discrimination by Tutsis against Hutus, however, remains in many areas of society, although it is not condoned by law. There are few Hutus in the Army, and the majority of civil service jobs, as well as university places, are held by Tutsis. As a result of President Buyoya's ethnic reform efforts, Hutus made substantial inroads into the civil service in 1989, and the number of Hutus entering secondary school exceeded the number of Tutsis for the first time in recent years. However, the pace of integration in the military remained slow. Tutsis dominate the modern economic sector, while in rural areas economic opportunities are roughly equivalent for both ethnic groups.

Women hold a secondary position in society, although their status is changing slowly from traditional patterns. The suspended Constitution, respected in practice, provides for legal equality. The current legal code prohibits polygamy and a dowry requirement, allows women some control over family matters, and provides for land inheritance by women. Women in Burundi are able to obtain divorces, but there is strong social pressure against divorce.

Traditional practices continue to prevail in many of these and other areas of social conduct, however. In the preponderant rural sector, women perform the bulk of field labor, while cattle raising and wage labor are generally reserved for men. Although fewer women than men obtain a formal education, once a degree is obtained women can generally find suitable employment. The Government has not discriminated against women in hiring, and the civil service pay scale makes no distinction between men and women. Women are not significantly represented in business, the professions, and at higher levels of government, although the situation has improved in recent years.

Violence against women, especially wife beating, is known to take place, but as there are not studies available, the extent of the violence is difficult to quantify. Police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes. Severe cases are dealt with by the legal system. The Government officially discourages violence against women but addresses the problem largely through the Burundi Women's Union which provides counseling and, when deemed necessary, referral to legal authorities.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Burundian workers do not have the right of association as defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO). The UPRONA party controls the National Trade Union Confederation (UTB) and has institutionalized this single trade union structure by means of legislation. No other unions are allowed by law. The present head of the UTB was named by President Buyoya, but all other officeholders were elected by the UTB membership. The principal role of the UTB, to which virtually the entire salaried work force belongs, is to serve as an intermediary between workers and employers in labor matters. The UTB formulates its programs and policies in concert with the Ministry of Labor. Unauthorized advocacy of a strike or lockout is a criminal offense. Although they are technically permissible, there have been no strikes in recent years. The UTB is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

BURUNDI

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers do not have the right to organize outside the UTB. Within the UTB, they have the right to bargain individually and collectively in labor disputes. In practice, the UTB has often forced employers to revise their practices. This has usually come after implementation of one or more steps of the official three-step process of dispute resolution: direct employer-employee discussions under the auspices of the UTB; an administrative hearing before a government labor inspector; and a legal proceeding before the labor court in which the UTB represents the employee. There is almost universal membership in UTB among salaried employees, and antiunion discrimination is not a problem in practice. There are no export processing zones in Burundi, and labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

While forced or compulsory labor is not permitted under Burundi law, the ILO Committee of Experts has noted that provisions of ordinances concerning the conservation and utilization of soils and the creation and maintenance of minimum areas of food crops are in violation of ILO Convention No. 29. It has urged the Government to bring the texts into conformity with the Convention and into line with what the Government asserts is actual practice. The Committee also noted that the various legislative provisions which call for imprisonment and an obligation to work as punishment for expressions of political views contrary to those of the party are not in compliance with ILO Convention 105. The Government has indicated that it intends to examine the possibility of revising the prison legislation, but it has not yet taken any action.

In the modern, urban section of the economy, children under the age of 12 may not be employed in any capacity, nor may children under the age of 16 be engaged in dangerous or strenuous work. However, as a practical matter in this poor, largely rural country, many children are obliged by custom and circumstance to help their families in subsistence agriculture.

Over 90 percent of the population of Burundi is engaged in subsistence agriculture. Worker rights are prescribed by the Burundi Labor Code and by the UTB, but these rights have relevance primarily for workers in the small, wage sector of the economy. The established minimum wage is the equivalent of approximately $1.03 per day in Bujumbura, and $0.90 per day in rural areas; this wage level is inadequate to provide a decent living for urban families, who frequently supplement their income through family gardening or small commerce. Wages are higher for workers in the few private sector businesses and in skilled jobs. Working hours vary between 40 and 45 hours per week. Saturday afternoons, Sundays, and holidays are times of rest. In the modern economic sector, minimum health and safety standards are monitored by the Ministry of Labor. The enforcement of these standards is limited.

CAMEROON

Political power in Cameroon is concentrated in the Presidency and a single party, the Cameroon People's Democratic Movement (CPDM). President Paul Biya is Head of State and head of the CPDM. The President makes all major decisions and appoints all government and party officials, although key parliamentarians have some behind-the-scenes influence. The National Assembly generally approves measures proposed by the Government. Although the Assembly has the right to propose legislation, it does so rarely. Cameroon's political system is influenced by its ethnic and linguistic diversity, which includes 230 languages and 3 separate European colonial traditions (German, French, and British). French and English are official languages. A careful balancing act among the various groups within the Government and party is required to maintain political cohesion, and this acts as a check on government power.

Internal security responsibilities are shared by the National Police (Surete Nationale), the National Intelligence Service (CENER), the Ministry of Territorial Administration, Military Intelligence, and, to a lesser extent, the Presidential Security Service. The Ministry of Territorial Administration is in charge of prisons, and the National Police has the dominant role in enforcing internal security laws.

Cameroon's per capita gross domestic product (GDP) of about $970 in 1987 placed it among the middle-income developing countries. However, the declining prices of Cameroon's key commodities, including coffee, cocoa, and petroleum, and the rigors of structural adjustment are likely to reduce 1989 per capita gross domestic product to an estimated $850. Cameroon's diversified agricultural base, food self-sufficiency, and government policies aimed at promoting private-sector growth help mitigate the effects of declining terms of trade and other external difficulties.

Human rights remained restricted in Cameroon in 1989. Positive developments included the release of dissident author Albert Mukong and more openness in addressing human rights issues. In March a senior official responded publicly to Amnesty International's (AI) concerns about political prisoners, admitting that some persons remained in detention despite the expiration of their sentences. President Biya has officially advocated greater democratization, and modest steps have been taken to expand popular political participation. Major human rights concerns in 1989 included the abuse of detainees, use of arbitrary arrest and detention powers, harsh prison conditions, and restrictions on freedoms of speech, press, assembly, women's rights, worker rights, and the right of citizens to change their government through democratic means.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance.

CAMEROON

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although the penal code proscribes torture, renders inadmissible in court evidence obtained thereby, and prohibits public servants from using force against any person, there were credible reports of severe beatings of suspects while in custody in 1989. On one occasion, witnesses observed security officers publicly punching and beating a man. Inside prisons, poor conditions are common. Prisoners suffer from serious malnutrition unless provided food by friends or family. Brutal treatment of inmates may have led to violent uprisings in at least two Cameroonian prisons in 1989. Persons under "administrative detention" (e.g., political detainees) are kept in special camps or prisons to which access by families and friends is severely restricted.

AI's 1989 Report stresses the harsh conditions in Nkondengui Prison in Yaounde and New Bell Prison in Douala. Overcrowding, the lack of medical care, and malnutrition may have contributed to a high death rate in both prisons in 1988, according to AI.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Cameroonian law, a person arrested on suspicion of having committed a nonpolitical offense may be held in custody up to 24 hours before being charged. The period of custody may be renewed up to three times with the express agreement of the Attorney-General. However, after an investigating magistrate has determined the case should be brought to trial and has issued a warrant to that effect, there is no limitation on how long the detainee may be held in "preventive detention" pending trial.

Accused persons awaiting trial constitute the majority of persons in the prisons at Yaounde and Douala. Release on bail is permitted by law only in the Anglophone provinces, whose legal system retains features of British common law. Even there, bail is granted infrequently. There have been cases of local or provincial authorities ordering the continued detention of persons even after a court ordered their release. CENER and Military Security do not implement fully the penal code requirement that detainees be brought before a magistrate for investigation of possible offenses. They have held detainees incommunicado.

Persons may also be held in "administrative detention" under legislation pertaining to subversion. The penal code defines administrative detention as "the loss of liberty for a political felony or misdemeanor." Such detention by regional authorities is initially for 1 month, renewable twice, and may be extended up to an additional 6 months by the Minister of Territorial Administration. Those arrested and placed in administrative detention do not disappear. Their families are told where they are, though not always promptly. They are released eventually, though the detention may be lengthy, in some cases exceeding the theoretical maximum of 9 months.

State of emergency provisions, invoked following the 1984 coup attempt, were allowed to lapse in 1989. There is, therefore, no longer a legal rationale for unlimited administrative detention. Government of Cameroon authorities state that they are working to ensure that officials who have had delegated authority to order such detention are made aware of the changed circumstances.

Albert Mukong, a well-known critic of the Government who had been held for nearly a year, was released on May 5 after the Government dropped charges against him. It is widely believed that Mukong was arrested for having condemned, during a British Broadcasting Corporation broadcast, frequent constitutional changes and attributing Cameroon's economic difficulties to embezzlement of state funds by senior public officials. The legal justification for his detention remains unclear but was apparently an old ordinance which proscribes conduct "likely to bring to contempt or ridicule any public authority or (which) incites hatred against the government."

Frederic Batoum and Samuel Zeze remained in prison without charge at the end of 1989, apparently for supporting the banned opposition party, the Union of Cameroonian People (UPC). They had first been arrested in 1985, released in 1986, and then detained again shortly afterwards. Abdoulaye Mazou, a former senior official of the Ministry of Education, was sentenced to 5 years for having assisted his brother to escape after the 1984 coup attempt. Although his sentence has expired, he remains in prison and is reportedly ill.

An estimated 40 political detainees, including Moussa Mahmonde and Mohamadou Djidji, who were not released in 1986 at the end of their sentence, reportedly remained in detention at the end of 1989. Most of these were apprehended around the time of the 1984 coup attempt.

Cameroon does not engage in the practice of forced exile. Early in his first term, President Biya publicly encouraged all those living abroad for political reasons to return to Cameroon without fear of reprisal.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trial by a presiding magistrate is provided for in law, and this practice is followed except in the case of persons held under administrative detention or state of emergency regulations. Public trials are also guaranteed by law, although exceptions are allowed for the public good or for national security reasons. Trials which involve prominent persons or which are controversial have sometimes been held in private.

Magistrates in Cameroon are career civil servants responsible to the Minister of Justice and are required to have law degrees. Their decisions are not usually subject to government interference, and they generally are considered to conduct fair trials. The Minister of Justice has publicly cautioned magistrates against awarding "excessive" damages against the State, and there have been reported cases of the Government refusing to pay damages where a court has found against it. Defendants in felony cases are provided attorneys if they cannot afford to engage their own.

Crimes involving subversion or illegal use of weapons, as well as crimes involving the military, are tried by military tribunals. Each tribunal has three members, and its presiding officer must be a magistrate. In some cases, the magistrate is a civilian, in others a military officer. As in felony cases tried in the regular court system, defendants are entitled to counsel.

In a March 1989 press conference, Cameroon's Ambassador to France answered publicly a question from AI about political prisoners held in Cameroon. According to AI, he indicated that most of them are military officers implicated in the 1984 coup attempt. Some of them were never brought to trial, and others have been held past the end of their sentences. Those trials were conducted in secret by military tribunals and did not conform to internationally recognized standards of fairness. Lawyers were given little time to prepare a defense, and defendants had no right of appeal. The Ambassador admitted that coup-plotters were still held under administrative internment and asserted that their continued detention was necessary in view of the danger they pose to public safety. This is the first time in years that a government official has publicly addressed the issue of political prisoners/detainees held without trial in Cameroon.

Traditional courts continue to play an important role in Cameroon, particularly in rural areas. Their authority varies by region and by ethnic group, but they are often the arbiters of property and domestic disputes and may serve a probate function as well. Most systems permit appeal of first-instance decisions to traditional authorities of higher rank.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Both invasions of the home and tampering with correspondence are violations of Cameroonian law. There have been frequent reports of police harassing citizens and entering homes without warrants during periodic searches for criminals. Police officials also sometimes enter homes and demand to see receipts for household property as a customs law enforcement measure. Surveillance of suspected dissidents and the monitoring of their mail and telephone conversations are common practices.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution of 1972 provides for freedom of expression and of the press, but Cameroonian law and practice restrict these freedoms. While there is no evidence anyone is punished for privately criticizing the Government, there are definite limits to public speech.

The Government's official position is that it "supervises" but does not "control" the press. However, officials working with the media have referred to television, radio, and the press as instruments of national policy to be used by the State in furtherance of its aims. The Government publishes two official newspapers, the English and French editions of the Cameroon Tribune, and controls radio (the most important medium) and television. Most official journalists are civil servants who may be transferred to less desirable positions if they do not practice self-censorship.

Media criticism of the Government invites detention. There have been several cases of print or broadcast journalists being detained after pursuing stories critical of the Government in recent years. Early in 1989, for example, two journalists from the independent press were detained after publishing a story recounting the reasons for a local town council's vote of no-confidence in its Mayor. AI noted in its 1989 Report that there seems to be a pattern in the official use of detention powers as a means of intimidating journalists. Despite this, the number and frequency of private publications rebounded somewhat in late 1989. No written ground rules for publication exist. The independent press enjoys greater latitude in covering issues than the government-owned press, but all publications are still subject to official censorship.

Although many periodicals carrying articles critical of Cameroon's Government circulated in 1989, toward the end of the year the Government seized one edition of a foreign newsmagazine.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are provided for in the Constitution but are restricted in law and practice. The penal code prohibits public meetings, demonstrations, or processions without prior government approval. While there have been no reports that such permits have been denied, large public meetings in which the Government plays no role are virtually unknown. On short notice, authorities canceled this year's traditional May Day parade because they were concerned that the unemployed might demonstrate. Organizations must register with the Government; any form of opposition political organization is effectively prohibited.

c. Freedom of Religion

Cameroon is a secular state. There is no established religion. Roughly 20 percent of Cameroonians are Muslims, 30 percent are Christians, and the rest follow traditional beliefs. Officials of the Government and the CPDM include members of all three groups. Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution, but for a religious group to exist and to function legally, it must be approved and registered with the Ministry of Territorial Administration. There have been cases in the past of a small group's application being rejected on the grounds that it was too nearly identical to an existing group. The Jehovah's Witnesses were banned in 1970 and have been periodic targets of harassment since that time.

The Government does not discourage the practice of traditional religions. Acts of witchcraft, divination, or magic "liable to disrupt public order or tranquility, or to harm persons or property" are outlawed, with potential penalties of up to 10 years' imprisonment.

Missionaries played a major role in the development of Cameroon and continue to be active. Foreign clergy suffer no ill-treatment. There are no particular restrictions on places of worship, training of clergy, conversion, religious education, or religious participation in charitable activities. The literacy and Bible translation organization, SIL, operates freely and plans to expand. Independent Christian and Muslim publications exist in Cameroon, and there is no evidence they are more heavily censored than is the secular press.

CAMEROON

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within the country is not restricted by law. Police continue to stop travelers to check identification documents, vehicle registrations, and tax receipts as a security and immigration control measure, though use of the practice declined sharply in 1989.

Exit visas are required to leave the country and are sometimes obtained only after long delays. The Government has been known to refuse issuance of a passport or to confiscate a passport in order to control someone it considers a real or potential threat. Married women must obtain written consent from their husbands before the Government will issue an exit visa. There are no restrictions on voluntary repatriation, and there is no forced resettlement.

Over the years, Cameroon has served as a safe haven for thousands of displaced persons and refugees. Approximately 35,000 refugees remain in Cameroon, the majority of them Chadian. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) recognizes about 4,100, most of them Chadian or Namibian. With the Chadian conflict largely over, many Chadians have returned. As of September 30, 1989, there were 3,622 Chadian refugees at the Poli-Faro camp, down from 6,346 at the beginning of the year. Many of the Chadians living outside Poli-Faro have integrated into the Cameroonian economy and do not receive government or international assistance. Though Cameroon occasionally returns illegal Chadian immigrants, there were no confirmed reports of forced repatriation of recognized Chadian refugees in 1989. Cameroon is also host to 67 Namibian students and 400 other refugees of various nationalities.

Because Cameroon continues to be a one-party state with political power and administrative responsibility concentrated in the Presidency, citizens do not have the right to change the Government through the electoral process. The President appoints all cabinet ministers, governors, and prefects. President Biya succeeded constitutionally to the office of President upon the resignation of former President Ahidjo, and was elected unopposed in 1984 and 1988.

While the Constitution does not explicitly exclude the existence of other political parties, in fact only the CPDM is permitted to operate. Membership in the CPDM is open to all religious and ethnic groups and is strongly encouraged. No one attempted to gain legal recognition for a second political party in 1989. The UPC was rebuffed in 1985 when it sought such legal recognition. Opposition groups, including the UPC and the Cameroon Democratic Party, periodically send letters or pamphlets into the country (usually seized by customs officials) or are heard on foreign radio broadcasts. A number of former UPC members are now active in the CPDM.

Some within the CPDM have begun to advocate greater pluralism, but it is unclear whether they wish to make room for other parties or are merely seeking opportunities for broader debate or greater influence within the CPDM.

All members of the 180-seat National Assembly must be members of the CPDM. National Assembly elections with multiple candidacies were held for the first time in 1988, but the CPDM limited the number of candidates per constituency to two. The next elections are due in 1993. Voting is by universal suffrage and secret ballot. The 1988 elections took place with few irregularities and no allegations of fraud.

Debate in the National Assembly usually remains within fairly narrow parameters. The National Assembly has not formally rejected a major government initiative in recent years. However, the behind-the-scenes power of key National Assembly representatives limits the Government's freedom of action. Some government proposals are shelved before reaching the stage where they are subject to formal rejection.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government does not usually respond publicly or privately to inquiries from any human rights organization. However, in 1989 a government official responded publicly to AI's charge that Cameroon holds political prisoners (see Section 1.e.). The Constitution affirms support for the freedoms guaranteed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the United Nations Charter. Under President Biya, the Government has devoted increased attention to human rights in such international forums as the United Nations and the Non-Aligned Movement. Also, Cameroon has submitted reports on the status of human rights in the country to two United Nations committees.

Access to the Government's social programs is open to all Cameroonian citizens on a nondiscriminatory basis. President Biya has repeatedly stressed publicly the dangers of tribalism, but there remains deep-seated suspicion among ethnic groups. Cameroon is officially bilingual, but Anglophones are a distinct minority (20 percent) and often charge that the majority Francophones discriminate against them by denying them economic opportunity and a share of real political power commensurate with their numbers. The Bamileke, the country's largest single ethnic group (between 15 and 20 percent of the population), level similar charges against the rest of the body politic.

Women are granted equal rights under the Constitution, and some are politically active in the party and the sole labor federation. The women's wing of the CPDM has developed programs to encourage the economic and social productivity of Cameroonian women. Women are increasingly well represented in the modern wage sector. They make up less than 1 percent of the army and do not serve in the navy or air force. They may join the police and the gendarmerie but make up a very small percentage of these forces.

Significant cultural pressure is brought to bear on women to remain subservient to men. In late 1989, for example, a columnist for a government-owned newspaper admonished a reader to remember "your husband is the direct authority the lord has placed on you." Also, the Government requires a husband's consent before his wife may obtain an exit visa (see Section 2.d.), a policy the Government asserts is intended solely to preserve and strengthen the stability of family life. Polygamy is permitted by law and tradition, but polyandry is not.

Hospital reports of admissions of battered women indicate declining violence against women, at least in urban areas. A government-owned newspaper in late 1989 featured a readers' debate on the pros and cons of wife beating, stating in its introduction that it took no position in the debate. There are no reliable statistics on the extent to which violence occurs. In crimes of passion, men are sometimes treated lightly by the courts. Violence directed against women in other than a domestic context is not a major problem. Female circumcision is not common in Cameroon. It is practiced by a limited number of traditional Muslim families and is almost unheard of in other groups.

One of the goals of the sixth 5-year plan for economic, social, and cultural development is to improve educational opportunities for women. The percentage of female secondary school students increased 45 percent between 1970 and 1986. Girls made up 45.7 percent of primary school pupils in 1986, but their percentage drops to 38.3 percent at the secondary level. Women are also disadvantaged in access to higher education (14 percent of students) and professional opportunities. Regional differences in access to education also exist.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The labor code recognizes the right of workers to establish trade unions without prior authorization and to join trade unions of their choosing. In practice, there is but one umbrella organization in the country, the Organization of United Cameroonian Workers (OCWU), which operates parallel to the CPDM, and trade unions in the country are subordinate to the OCWU. The top union leadership is nominated by the Government. The OCWU permitted multiple candidates to run in worker delegate elections in late 1987 and early 1988, but it retains the right to approve candidacies, thus assuring political orthodoxy. The OCWU does not play a major role in Cameroonian politics, although it has a membership of approximately 450,000 in a working population of more than 3 million. It pursues worker grievances and seeks improvements in government programs for worker safety and training.

Strikes are illegal, and political activity by trade unions, excepting action designed to protect economic and other interests, is prohibited. The OCWU is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. The OCWU maintains contact with foreign trade union organizations, including the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, but such contact requires government authorization.

The International Labor Organization's (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) observed in 1989 that various legislative provisions, which regulate the right of public servants to organize, restrict their right to strike, and ban foreign workers from trade union office, are inconsistent with ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. It has expressed the hope that the Government will amend the legislation in the near future.

CAMEROON

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The labor code recognizes the right of trade unions or trade union federations to engage in collective bargaining with employers or groups of employers. In practice, true collective bargaining between employers and workers is rare, owing to the small size of the modern industrial sector, the small number of large employers, and the involvement of the Government in the process. Under the law, all employers of more than 10 workers must permit the election of a worker representative from among the employees. This individual has a statutory right to discuss labor conditions with the employer on behalf of the employees and enjoys special protection from arbitrary dismissal. Candidates for these positions must be approved by the OCWU.

There are no export processing zones in Cameroon, but one is in the planning stage.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

While forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law, the COE has noted that provisions of the labor code, the law establishing the National Civic Service for participation in development, legislation respecting prisons, and the Merchant Shipping Code are in violation of the ILO conventions on forced labor. The Government has stated repeatedly that amendments to bring these laws into compliance with ILO conventions are being processed or are under study. There have been reports of levies of communal labor being employed in some traditional societies.

The labor code sets the minimum working age at 14, a rule which appears to be respected in the modern wage sector. Labor inspectors are empowered to enforce provisions of Cameroon's labor code, as are labor courts. In rural areas where farming occupies 80 percent of Cameroon's citizens, children participate at early ages in agricultural work alongside adults. Street vendors in urban areas are occasionally under age 14, more frequently during school vacations than at other times.

Under the labor code, the minimum annual paid vacation is 18 days, and the legal workweek is 40 hours for nonagricultural employees and up to 48 hours per week for agricultural workers. In order to make room for younger workers, civil servants are encouraged to retire upon reaching the minimum retirement age of 55. Minimum monthly wages are set by the Government for all public and private sector jobs. Minimum wage rates, which range from $62 to $103 per month, are based on geographic zones, types of industry, and worker seniority and qualifications. The lowest wages are insufficient to support a family, but usually are supplemented by a second job or another family member's earnings. Workers with middle-range wages also are likely to need second incomes to support a family, especially in Yaounde and Douala.

Occupational safety and health is mandated by law, based on ILO standards. In theory, these standards are enforced by Ministry of Labor inspectors and labor courts, but they lack the means for effective enforcement.

CAPE VERDE

Cape Verde is ruled by the African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV), the sole legal political party, under the leadership of President Aristides Pereira. Most government ministers are also senior members of the party, and many of them were leaders of the revolutionary movement to free Cape Verde from Portuguese rule. The Constitution adopted in 1980 declares the party "the supreme expression of the interests of the popular masses." Members of the Popular National Assembly, which is formally the supreme organ of the State, are elected from a slate of candidates proposed to the electorate by the party. The Assembly selects the President, who, as Head of State, proposes the Prime Minister to the Assembly. The Assembly is subordinate to the executive; it has never reversed government/party decisions, although deputies increasingly debate issues openly, and critical views are often reported in the media.

Security responsibilities, formerly divided between the military, the security, and police forces, were consolidated under a single government department in February 1986. The reorganized Ministry of Defense and Security operates under guidelines and leadership approved by the party. A largely voluntary party paramilitary unit, the "Popular Militias," supports the security forces and has been accused of making arbitrary arrests.

Cape Verde has few natural resources, and for years Cape Verdeans have emigrated to improve their economic condition--over 500,000 live abroad. A 20-year drought has also hindered Cape Verde's development efforts for its population of 400,000. However, heavy summer rains in 1987 and 1988 may have signaled the end of the drought and promised improvements in the agricultural sector. The Government is the largest nonagricultural employer. It controls banking, the import of most basic commodities, airlines, the press, and schools. It depends importantly on generous foreign assistance and remittances from Cape Verdean emigrants.

The Constitution bans opposing political parties, and in practice the Government uses its authority, e.g., detention powers, to limit opposing views. Freedom of speech, press, and assembly and association are not technically limited by law but have been in practice. Discrimination and violence against women are common. There were no known political prisoners held at the end of 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reported instances of politically motivated deaths, but one man died while in official custody (see Section 1.c.).

b. Disappearance

There were no reported instances of officially inspired disappearances.

CAPE VERDE

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Periodic police brutality occurs. In August on Maio Island, a man died in police custody, allegedly of a severe beating; although local medical authorities determined that the cause of death was strangulation, a government-appointed special commission found that the deceased, a former mental patient, killed himself. There was no evidence of torture or other cruel and unusual punishment of prisoners and detainees in 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Cape Verdean law requires that an accused person, unless caught in the act of committing a crime, be brought before a judge to be charged within 48 hours of arrest. In exceptional cases, with the concurrence of a court official, the formal charge process may be delayed, but it still must take place within 5 days of arrest. For crimes against state security, however, persons may be detained for up to 5 months without trial upon a judge's ruling. This loophole is occasionally abused, and cases of arbitrary arrest by members of the "Popular Militia," a voluntary paramilitary party organization, occur periodically. There is a functioning system of bail, and everyone is entitled to representation by an attorney in civil or criminal cases. Those unable to afford legal counsel are represented by lawyers named by the state-run Lawyers' Association.

There were no known instances of forced exile for political or other reasons. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is composed of a Supreme Court, whose members are appointed by the Government, regional courts, and local popular courts. Trials are conducted by one judge without a jury. The autonomous Institute for Judicial Support, to which most private lawyers belong, provides counsel for indigent defendants. Trials appear to be handled expeditiously, and evidence suggests that the courts protect individual rights in criminal cases. Verdicts can be appealed.

Appeals to the Supreme Court are common. For example, in June the Supreme Court upheld a lower court decision in favor of Teofilo Santos Silva, allegedly fired from the Bank of Cape Verde for statements vilifying bank leadership. The bank was ordered to restore Santos to his former position or to compensate him for damages.

The popular tribunals adjudicate minor disputes on a local level in rural areas. The "judges," who are appointees of the Ministry of Justice, are usually prominent local citizens without legal training. Their decisions can be appealed within the regular court system.

Political/security cases of a nonmilitary nature are tried before the criminal courts. There have been no cases tried in recent years, and there were no known political prisoners at the end of 1989.

CAPE VERDE

- f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution recognizes citizens' rights to the inviolability of domicile, correspondence, and other means of communication. The law requires warrants issued by a judge before searches of homes may be conducted. In practice, these rights are observed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution proclaims freedom of speech and intellectual creativity, including the rights of authorship, but it also stipulates that none of these rights and freedoms may be exercised "contrary to national unity." While freedom of the press is not specifically guaranteed by the Constitution, a law adopted in December 1985 assures citizens the right to express their thoughts in the press, but at the same time the party underlined that this right should be exercised responsibly. People rarely criticize the Government publicly. Debate in Parliament is lively, but within the accepted one-party system.

The newspaper Voz di Povo, radio, and television are government owned. Occasional articles critical of some aspects of government policy are printed or broadcast, but this is probably done with prior authorization from the Government. Local radio broadcasts carry items from Western news agencies as well as from Communist countries, generally balancing coverage and identifying sources on controversial international issues. In 1989 the PAICV Third Congress granted limited autonomy to the National Press, a publishing house formerly controlled entirely by the party leadership.

A Catholic monthly newspaper, which has carried criticism of some aspects of life in Cape Verde, is tolerated without interference as long as its articles are not viewed as a threat to the Government. On occasion, the editor and contributors have been called before popular tribunals to explain their articles. There is also a monthly newspaper, Noticias, published in Mindelo which, since its inception in 1988, has followed an independent editorial policy.

Foreign periodicals generally circulate freely in Cape Verde even when they contain articles critical of or unflattering to the Government, as is sometimes the case with Portuguese newspapers. International radio broadcasts are received clearly without interference.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to meet, to associate freely, and to demonstrate is provided for in the Constitution, but as a practical matter no organizations opposed to the Government or its policies are permitted. Party-sponsored "mass organizations" of women and youth are prominent. For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

The Constitution requires separation of church and state. Freedom of worship is respected by the Government, and members of all faiths practice their religion without harassment. At least two-thirds of the population, probably including most of the government and party leadership, are nominally Catholic, but the predominance of Catholicism does not appear to affect adversely other faiths. Evangelical Protestants and Seventh-Day Adventist are the two other principal religious communities.

At least two faiths, the Baha'i and Christian Science, which were formally banned or suppressed under the Portuguese, have been permitted to reestablish themselves and operate freely since independence. There are no restrictions on religious practices, teaching, or contacts with coreligionists outside Cape Verde. The Catholic Church, for example, openly opposes birth control methods which are advocated and supported by the Government. A few foreign missionaries are active in Cape Verde, and more than half the Catholic clergy are non-Cape Verdeans. Cape Verdean consular law requires, however, that missionaries applying for residency belong to a denomination with a recognized membership in Cape Verde. In this context, two American Mormon missionaries were asked to leave Cape Verde in September after their visitor's visas expired.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no extraordinary legal or administrative restrictions on either travel or residence within the country. All resident Cape Verdeans wishing to leave the country, either temporarily or permanently, must obtain exit permission from the Government. Such permission has not been denied for political reasons. Emigration has long been an important and recognized alternative for those wishing to escape the prevailing harsh economic conditions.

The Government goes to considerable effort to maintain close contact with emigre communities and provides every opportunity for Cape Verdeans living abroad to maintain their ties with the homeland, including making provision to vote in elections. Repatriation is a constitutional right, and the Government does not discourage intending repatriates.

The law allows for revocation of citizenship on several grounds, including activities contrary to the interest of the country. However, there are no known cases of the Government instituting proceedings to deprive persons of citizenship for political reasons.

The party's monopoly of power in Cape Verde is specified in the Constitution. Opposition parties are illegal and do not exist. Therefore, citizens are unable to change the one-party political system through a democratic process.

At the national level, government officials are selected by the party, and senior leaders are selected from among the small group of men who actually led the struggle for independence. The Secretary General of the party is President of the Republic, the Deputy Secretary General is Prime Minister, and the third-ranking party official is President of the National Assembly. Five other members of the party's political commission are also ministers. Not all ministers or secretaries of state are party members, but all clearly serve at the pleasure of the party.

CAPE VERDE

Current party membership is about 6,000, which is about 4 percent of the total adult population and represents a doubling in size since independence in 1975. Within this elitist party, there exists a modest scope for meaningful political activity. The delegates to the Third Party Congress in 1989 were elected by secret ballot, and the party announced plans to allow free elections of certain local officials, whether candidates are party members or not.

Twice-yearly National Assembly sessions serve to ratify--never reverse--earlier party/government decisions.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government in the past has permitted visits by private organizations to investigate conditions of persons convicted for political or related offenses. There are no known official or nongovernmental human rights organizations in the country; none critical of the Government would be permitted.

Racial discrimination is not a serious problem in Cape Verde, where the vast majority of the population shares various proportions of Portuguese and African ancestry. Sex discrimination exists, although it is prohibited by the Constitution. Many traditional, male-oriented values of the Portuguese and African ancestors of today's Cape Verdeans are still part of the country's culture.

The Code of the Family, enacted in October 1981, prescribes the full equality of men and women in law, including equal pay for equal work, but in practice women customarily have been excluded from certain types of employment and are often paid less than men. Both the Government and the party are making efforts to bring women into various economic and social activities where they have been traditionally absent, including in the labor-intensive economic development projects. The Organization of Cape Verdean Women was founded in 1980, with party encouragement, to sensitize Cape Verdeans to issues affecting women.

Domestic violence against women remains extremely common. Crimes such as rape and wife beatings are largely ignored by police and are rarely brought to trial. Even then, penalties for first offenders are usually suspended, and physical and psychological retaliation against a woman who wins such a trial is the norm. Government efforts are occasionally made to increase women's awareness of their legal rights, such as in special periodic television or radio programs addressing these issues, but these programs rarely reach the rural women most strongly affected by such crimes.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of association is limited. Workers in several sectors are organized into unions within the Central Sindical (UNTC-CS). The trade union central is affiliated with the PAICV and headed by a high-ranking party member. About one-third of the active work force are nominal members of the UNTC-CS. Individual unions perform some traditional trade union functions and act also as party affiliates.

There is no reference to the right to strike in the Constitution or in any legislation. In the absence of any legal prohibition against strikes, the NUC believes that the right to strike exists, but it has never exercised this theoretical right. Union leadership has taken positions on specific issues in opposition to government policies in state-owned enterprises.

The UNTC-CS is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, in whose councils it has never taken positions independent of those officially sanctioned by the Government. It maintains contact with and receives assistance from both Communist and non-Communist national unions abroad.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions are by law the designated means by which workers are represented. The right of unions to function without hindrance is mandated. However, there is no true collective bargaining. Wages for government employees are set by the Ministerial Council. Wages for state enterprises are proposed by the ministry controlling the state enterprise and approved by the Ministerial Council. Labor laws require that private companies pay the prevailing wage, which usually implies the wage that is paid in the Government and state enterprises. The UNTC-CS and the unions have influence in the process. There are no export processing zones in Cape Verde.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is constitutionally prohibited and is not practiced in Cape Verde.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 14, and children under 16 are prohibited from working at night, more than 7 hours per day, or in establishments where toxic products are used. All enterprises submit a yearly report to the Director General of Labor with information on the salary and ages of each employee. There is no inspection mechanism.

Minimum wage rates are established by the Government for both civil servants and private enterprises. As of January 1, 1987, the minimum wage for civil servants was approximately $84 per month. Wages for unskilled workers are considerably lower, and in rural areas the daily minimum for the least skilled types of labor is about $1.62 per day. In most circumstances, a family cannot survive on a single minimum wage. Multiple incomes, shared housing, and extended families help bridge the gap for many minimum wage earners.

There does not appear to be an overall safety and health code. The normal workweek for adults is 44 hours over 5 1/2 days. A worker is entitled to at least 1 free day per week. These regulations seem to be respected in practice, but there is no enforcement mechanism.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

The Central African Republic (C.A.R.) is a one-party state in which General Andre Dieudonne Kolingba has exercised virtually full political control since his accession to power in a bloodless coup on September 1, 1981. In 1986 President Kolingba established the only legal political party, the Central African Democratic Assembly (RDC), and introduced a new Constitution, which was subsequently approved in a national referendum. In that same vote he was elected without opposition to a 6-year term as President. The new Constitution established a directly elected parliament (National Assembly) and an advisory body known as the Economic and Regional Council. Both have met regularly since 1987.

The Ministry of Defense controls a military police force (Gendarmerie Nationale), in addition to the armed forces, which number about 3,800. These forces share internal security responsibilities with the civilian police force (Police Nationale) under the Ministry of Interior, which is responsible for policing major roads and keeping records of the movement of vehicles. The Presidency has its own security force, which has collateral responsibility with the border police for airport security.

The C.A.R. is a poor, landlocked, and sparsely populated country, most of whose inhabitants derive their livelihood from subsistence agriculture. The essentially agrarian economy has suffered in the past from ineffective government fiscal and developmental policies and adverse global trends. Since 1982 the Government has tried to implement economic structural reforms in cooperation with international donors. However, with continuing unfavorable world economic trends, progress has remained elusive.

Human rights remained restricted in 1989. The Government did release several political prisoners, including a journalist, and moved to put into effect a law authorizing the resumption of trade union activity. However, the Government took further action to repress the religious activities of the Jehovah's Witnesses and two other religious groups. In September, under unexplained circumstances, the Government brought back from Benin 12 former dissidents, arrested them on arrival, and held them without charge throughout the remainder of 1989. Principal human rights problems continued to be mistreatment of prisoners and detainees, arbitrary detentions, intrusive surveillance of political opponents, and restrictions on freedom of speech and press, association, the right of citizens to change their government, women's and minority rights, and worker rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There have been no reports of killings or executions for political motives by government forces, although at least one death from mistreatment while in official custody occurred (see Section 1.c.).

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearance.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Penal Code prohibits torture and provides for sanctions against those found guilty of physical abuse. Nonetheless, there are reports of police beatings of criminals or suspects.

Family members, legal counsel, doctors, and clergy generally have access to prisoners, including prominent political detainees. The latter frequently receive special privileges, including permission to leave the prison periodically.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Central African law, political detainees may be held without charge for as long as 2 months but must then be formally charged or released. In regular cases, those arrested must be brought within 96 hours before a magistrate, who decides whether formal charges will be filed. In practice, this limit is often exceeded owing to inefficiencies in judicial procedures. No system of bail exists. When political detainees are charged, local judicial procedures (which are modeled on the French system) allow for open-ended preventive detention while the public prosecutor prepares the state's case against the accused.

The exact number of political detainees and political opponents in exile is not available. During high-security events, the Government controls the activities of about 10 opponents, particularly supporters of former Emperor Bokassa, by holding them under house or village arrest until the event is over. Four students arrested in September 1988 for alleged but unspecified political reasons were released soon thereafter without any known charges having been brought against them.

It is the Government's announced policy to encourage dissidents to return to the C.A.R.; several former opponents of the regime have returned and been appointed to high positions in the Government. In late August, a government opponent, Gen. Francois Bozize, and 11 followers returned from Benin. It is not clear whether they were forcibly expelled from Benin, but all were taken into custody upon arrival in the C.A.R. and were in detention awaiting trial at the end of 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary consists of regular and military courts, with the Supreme Court at the apex. In most cases involving common criminals, the Government permits legal procedures modeled after French Law to be fairly and openly applied, although execution of the law is hampered by inadequate training of officials and persistent traditional beliefs regarding witchcraft and sorcery that sometimes take precedence over strict rules of evidence. The accused have a right to legal counsel at all stages in the formal procedures and have the right of appeal.

In 1988 a High Court of Justice was created to try political prisoners, replacing the Special Tribunal of civilian magistrates and military advisers which had adjudicated political cases from 1981 to 1987. It functions in much the same manner as the ordinary courts, except there is no right of appeal, although the possibility of presidential clemency exists. No cases have yet come before this Court, although a president of the court was named in October.

The number of political prisoners is unknown. Political opponent Ruth Rolland was released from prison in September by a Presidential Decree of General Clemency. Rolland had been tried, convicted, and imprisoned for distributing tracts critical of the Government. She was rearrested on December 16 on unspecified charges.

Government interference with privacy is common only in political and security cases. The law formally prohibits the invasion of the home without a warrant, and this prohibition is not generally abused in civil and criminal cases. If a political crime is considered to be involved, police are allowed to search private property without written authorization. The consensus among Central Africans is that their Government can and does keep a close watch on any citizen who opposes or appears to oppose it, but government surveillance is rare in practice.

To combat increasing local crime, including robbery and assault, citizens' action groups, called vigilance committees, were created by the RDC. These committees, consisting of 20 volunteers per neighborhood, patrol the streets and have the right to stop and hold suspected criminals briefly before handing them over to the police. A code of conduct guides committee members, forbidding them, for example, from invading private property or acting in the capacity of a police officer. In September the RDC decided to establish vigilance committees throughout the country.

Civil servants are not required to be party members, but there are strong social pressures to join, particularly in the case of those holding higher level positions.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The right of private citizens to speak publicly about political developments or to criticize the Government is circumscribed, although most people feel free to comment privately on political affairs. The National Assembly provides a limited forum for public discussion of government policies.

Newspapers, radio, and television are all government owned and controlled. Domestic news favors upbeat stories and noncontroversial events. Reporting on international news is selective and tends to avoid events that may be embarrassing to friendly foreign governments.

Thomas Kwazo, a journalist serving a 3-year sentence for filing an "unauthorized" story, was released following the September Clemency Decree for various prisoners.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Despite constitutional guarantees of the right to assembly, only assemblies of a nonpolitical nature can take place without government approval. Groups that register with the Ministry of Interior can hold meetings. Government forces quickly disband unlawful assemblies and, in some instances, arrest the participants.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

A variety of religious groupings are active in the country (approximately 35 percent traditional African, 50 percent Christian, 15 percent Muslim). Religious organizations and missionary groups are generally provided religious freedom by Central African custom. However, any group whose behavior is considered political in nature is quickly stifled. In 1986 the Jehovah's Witnesses were banned by the Minister of the Interior for alleged advocacy of civil disobedience. This restriction was only partially enforced, and Witnesses continued to congregate quietly for religious services in private homes. In April 1989, about 100 participants at such a meeting in Bangui were rounded up and detained by police under direct supervision of the Minister of the Interior. Most were released within 2 days; the others a few days later. The last four foreign Witnesses remaining in the country were expelled shortly afterward. Other religious groups also have been affected. In February the Minister of the Interior suspended the activities of the Fraternal Union of Baptist Churches on unspecified grounds. It resumed its activities in July. In September he suspended indefinitely the activities of the Union of Evangelical Pentecostal Churches for "irresponsible conduct." It remained suspended at the end of 1989.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

People are generally free to move about within the country. There are police checkpoints along major roads which sometimes present an obstacle to travelers unwilling or unable to pay bribes expected by some officials.

The right of voluntary travel and repatriation is recognized. Financial and educational constraints, rather than government controls, act to restrict most foreign travel and emigration. There were no known cases of revocation of citizenship.

A reduction of political tensions in Chad since 1985 prompted many Chadian refugees in the C.A.R. to return to their homeland voluntarily. Their number in the C.A.R. declined in 1989 to less than 3,000, from a high of 45,000 in 1984-85.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the ability to change their government through democratic means. The power and prerogatives of the President and the sole party are not subject to change from below. There has been progress in expanding participation in the political process. The President makes all important national policy decisions, although he allows his Cabinet considerable leeway in day-to-day activities of government administration. The President is also head of the party, the RDC. Approval of the RDC is required in order to run for political office, including the National Assembly.

The Constitution grants the National Assembly, elected by secret ballot in free elections, the authority to debate and vote on bills proposed by the executive and to initiate legislation of its own. Deputies are promised immunity from prosecution or other government interference for opinions voiced or votes cast during the exercise of their duties in the National Assembly. Assembly sessions in 1989 were marked by occasional frank criticisms of government policy, and for the first time the Assembly considered budgetary matters. Virtually all measures proposed by the Government eventually were adopted by nearly unanimous votes after significant amendments by the Assembly. In March the Deputies elected a new Assembly President.

Elections for municipal councilors were held in May 1988. In the seven largest towns, the Ministry of the Interior chose one member of the elected municipal council to serve as mayor. In all other municipalities the mayors were, at least in theory, elected by the municipal councils; but in several cases the councils were overruled by the Ministry of the Interior.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no local organizations to monitor human rights issues. However, the Government does permit representatives of Amnesty International and the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit Bangui periodically. The Government also permitted an October visit of an International Labor Organization (ILO) mission to investigate allegations of worker rights abuses (Section 6.a.). Union representatives indicated the visit went well. The Government plans to host in January 1990 a conference on human rights sponsored by the International Committee on African Human Rights.

The Constitution mandates that all persons are equal before the law without regard to wealth, race, or religion. In practice, some minorities tend to receive unequal treatment, e.g., the forest-dwelling Bamingua, commonly known as pygmies, are subject to discrimination and exploitation which the Government has done little to correct.

There are more than 80 ethnic groups in the Central African Republic, with about 70 percent of the population being Ngbaka, Baya, or Banda. While President Kolingba has made statements about the desirability of an ethnic balance in his Cabinet, preference for high government and military positions has been given to members of his Yakoma ethnic group (approximately 10 percent of the population). Each ethnic group has its own language, but the Sangho language is spoken throughout the country.

Although the Constitution affirms the equality of all citizens, women have traditionally been accorded fewer opportunities than men. Certain jobs remain closed to women, such as service in the gendarmerie. There are no precise data on the percentage of women in the paid labor force. Many are involved in traditional labor--gathering food and firewood and keeping house--while others are in commerce as market vendors. Educated women working outside the home typically find clerical jobs, but some are gradually moving into professional positions.

Polygamy is legally sanctioned, although increasingly fewer women accept the practice. A prospective husband must indicate at the time of the marriage contract whether he intends to take further wives. Divorce is legal in the C.A.R. and may be initiated by either partner.

Violence against women, including wife beating, occurs, but it is difficult to gauge the extent of the problem, as it is seldom officially reported. The Ministry of Justice does not generally hear many cases from people complaining of spouse abuse, although the issue does come up during divorce trials or in civil suits for damages. Most often, women will tolerate abuse in order to retain a measure of financial security for themselves and their children.

Female genital mutilation (circumcision) has been forbidden by law since the 1960's, but it is practiced by some ethnic groups. Enforcement of the prohibition is rare as it is basically considered a private, family matter. It is practiced in rural areas and, to a lesser degree, in the Muslim quarters of Bangui. Many urban dwellers consider it an outdated custom.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

A 7-year suspension of most trade union activity ended on May 19, 1988, when a law concerning trade union freedom and the protection of union rights was adopted. The new law provides employees and employers the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, to draw up their own constitution and rules, to elect their own representatives, and to formulate their program of action. Implementation of the law was delayed nearly a year while the Government drafted detailed regulations and guidelines.

On May 1, 1989, the law entered into full force, and the Minister of Labor gave workers throughout the country official permission to begin organizing. The Government determined that all trade union activity should begin from the ground up with elections organized by profession and place of work. Only after all major trade unions are in place will workers be permitted to convene a congress to set up a National Federation. Once the law had entered into force, teachers, civil servants, and employees at most of the large factories and businesses in the capital, Bangui, met in groups organized by profession and place of work in order to elect representatives and draft statutes for their union locals. By the end of November, 50 unions had held elections, 37 of them had submitted their statutes to the Ministry of the Interior, and 28 of them had been officially recognized. The other 9 are still in process. The Procurator and the Ministry of Labor retain the right to review the statutes for compliance with labor legislation. Encouraged by their official recognition, local unions have stepped up their activities and plan to send a committee outside of Bangui to organize unions on a regional level. Two seats for labor representatives are reserved on the Economic and Regional Council.

The new law permits strikes when all efforts at conciliation have failed. It also allows unions to become affiliated with international labor organizations; even during the 1981-88 ban on union activity some labor leaders continued to attend international labor congresses.

Despite this progress, there are unresolved problems with the 1988 law as written, e.g., restrictive membership requirements and the uncertain role of federations. In June the ILO Committee of Experts on Applications of Conventions and Recommendations took note of recent changes outlined by the Government's representative, but determined that C.A.R. compliance with ILO conventions could only be assessed by a direct contacts mission. A visit by such a mission took place in October. The mission's report had not been made public by the end of 1989.

In April the U.S. Government announced the suspension of certain trade privileges accorded the C.A.R., based largely on the C.A.R. Government's failure to respect freedom of association since 1981.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The 1988 union law, which applies throughout the country, accords trade unions full legal status, including the right to own property and to sue in court. Employers are forbidden from discriminating against workers on the basis of union membership or union activity, and infractions can result in the assessment of legal damages. It is too early to tell whether, or how effectively, these provisions will be enforced. Mechanisms for collective bargaining spelled out in the 1961 Labor Code fell into disuse during the ban on union activity and had not yet been revived in late 1989. The 1988 law does not specifically address whether trade unions may engage in collective bargaining. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The ILO Committee of Experts has for some years noted "considerable divergencies" between legislation and practice in the C.A.R. with respect to Conventions No. 29 and 105 on forced labor. The Government has maintained that the C.A.R. laws in question, which all date back to the 1960's, are obsolete and are no longer observed. In its 1989 report, the Committee noted that the Government had indicated its readiness to accept, but has thus far not requested, ILO assistance in drafting legislation to repeal the offending laws.

Employment of children under 14 years of age is forbidden by law. The relevant legislation is only loosely enforced. Jobs are in such demand that children in the labor force are generally limited to helping the family in traditional subsistence farming or retailing.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Minimum wages are established by the Government, and a social security system exists for private industry. The minimum wage for a manual laborer, for example, is about $40 per month and about $140 per month for a stenotypist. These salaries assure a family the basic necessities but are barely adequate to maintain a decent standard of living as measured against the norms of industrialized countries. The Government has not raised the minimum wage since 1980, partly in response to pressure from international financial institutions. Much labor is performed outside the wage and social security system, especially in the large subsistence agricultural sector by self-employed farmers. The law sets maximum working hours for government employees and most people in the private sector at 40 hours per week. Domestic employees may work up to 55 hours per week. There are also general laws on health and safety standards in the workplace, but they are neither precisely defined nor actively enforced.

CHAD

President Hissein Habre, whose support is based in the armed forces, heads an authoritarian government which came to power in 1982 after protracted civil war. Since then, President Habre has governed through a Council of Ministers and a National Consultative Council, both appointed by him. On December 10, in Chad's first election since 1969, a new Constitution was adopted by referendum, and Hissein Habre was elected to a 7-year term as President. Legislative elections for the National Assembly, as mandated by the new Constitution, are expected to be held during the first part of 1990. The multiethnic National Union for Independence and Revolution (UNIR), created in 1984 to broaden Habre's political constituency, remains the only officially recognized political party. Many former opponents continued to be brought into the civil service and army, including some at the ministerial level, while several hundreds of their followers were released from prison. President Habre's long-time rival, ex-president Goukouni Oueddei, remained in self-imposed exile in 1989.

The Government employs a large internal security apparatus. In addition to the army and police, it includes the National Security Service (DDS), the Special Rapid Intervention Brigade (BSIR), the Rural Paramilitary Police (Gendarmerie), and a Presidential Security Service. Chad has been concerned about sporadic terrorism, mostly emanating from Libya, and chronic instability among ethnic groups, notably the Hadjerai and Zaghawa in 1988 and 1989.

Chad remains desperately poor, and its economy has been severely dislocated by extended war with Libya and by declining world prices for its principal export, cotton. Its estimated 4.5-million population has one of the lowest per capita annual incomes in the world, $178 in 1988. The Government relies heavily on foreign donors, particularly France, to finance government operations and to fund development projects. The economy improved in 1989 as the Government adopted a stringent World Bank plan, important donors increased their aid, and abundant rains insured that subsistence farmers and herders produced enough to feed themselves.

Human rights in Chad remained circumscribed in 1989. Major human rights concerns were: possible extrajudicial killings; torture and harsh treatment of prisoners; indefinite and incommunicado detentions; denial of fair trial; restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, and the right of citizens to change their government democratically. However, significant steps were taken in 1989 to improve the situation. Between December 1988 and December 1989, the Government released 625 dissidents or former Chadian rebels from prison. Chad's new Constitution promises basic political rights and liberties to all Chadians and secret elections through universal suffrage. In August the Habre Government further eased tensions with Libya with the signing of a bilateral Framework Accord committing the two countries to seek a political solution to their longstanding territorial dispute, and to release all prisoners of war (POW's). Chad continued to hold Libyan POW's at year's end, as well as an unknown number of persons arrested in the wake of a military revolt in April.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no confirmed instances of government-instigated political or extrajudicial killings in 1989. In April a group of senior military leaders, all of whom were members of one branch of the Zaghawa ethnic group, led an armed revolt against the Habre regime. The Government successfully put down the revolt and arrested an unknown number of persons, most of them Zaghawa. Their status at the end of 1989 was unknown. There is concern that Army Commander Hassan Djamous, who was implicated in the April 1989 military revolt, may have been summarily executed.

There were no confirmed disappearances in Chad during 1989. However, the fate of hundreds of Chadian soldiers who fought under Goukouni and were captured in July 1983 has not been clarified by the Government. Amnesty International (AI) estimates the number of these "disappeared" prisoners as between 500 and 1,000.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no confirmed reports of torture of prisoners during 1989. Due to government secrecy and the practice of holding most political/security detainees (and many others) in indefinite, incommunicado detention, it is difficult to obtain information on torture and many other alleged abuses of prisoners. For example, the Government has never clarified the fate of Saleh Gaba, a journalist, who, according to many reports, was tortured with electric shocks and beaten severely, and who reportedly died in prison in June 1988. AI requested the Government to conduct an urgent investigation into the circumstances of Gaba's death, but no response had been received by the end of 1989.

There were allegations that government troops continued to use extreme measures and intimidation to maintain order in parts of Guera prefecture, where a 1987 insurrection among members of the Hadjerai ethnic group was met with strenuous repression, including summary executions. There were also reports in 1989 that the military had used similar measures against members of the Zaghawa ethnic group following an armed revolt in April by senior Zaghawa military commanders.

Prison conditions in Chad are harsh, and abuses in handling prisoners, usually in the form of beatings, are understood to be common. Conditions are reportedly severe in the special detention centers maintained by the DDS and other security organizations. The lack of food and medical treatment is reported to be especially glaring, and prisoners in past years are alleged to have died from the combination of malnutrition and physical abuse.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Chadian law, the authorities are required to show probable cause in making arrests and to adhere to established judicial requirements in detaining persons (see Section 1.e.). In security/political cases (the term is very broadly interpreted), the Government has a completely free hand. Those who express views critical of the Government, or hold views different from it, often are regarded as endangering the security of the State and may be subject to indefinite detention without trial. Many detainees are held incommunicado, and most are never charged or tried.

The total number of political detainees, as distinct from prisoners of war, is not known. Among detainees believed held without charge, reportedly because of their political beliefs or ethnic origins, are: Gamane Gody; Ahmed Lamine; Moussa Konate; Gamane Moussa; Keffine Abouzarga; Djibrine Daoud; Djimet Gondje; Issa Kamsoul; Abderamane Tchere; and Dari Tchere.

Between December 1988 and December 1989, the Government released 625 Chadians from prison, including on December 22, 1989, Moukhtar Bachar Moukhtar, formerly Secretary of State, Ministry of Agriculture. Most were former members of armed factions opposed to the Government, especially the Chadian Patriotic Front (FPT) which reconciled with the Government in 1988. Some of those released were considered political prisoners rather than POW's. All were given the option of joining (or rejoining) the Chadian armed forces, or of returning to their former occupations. The Government has steadfastly refused to allow the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) access to Libyan prisoners captured since 1986. In November, government authorities met with a high-level delegation of the ICRC, and it was announced that an agreement in principle had been reached "to permit the ICRC to take measures leading to visits to the Libyan POW's." However, by year's end, no such visits had occurred. A number of Libyan POW's have joined the Libyan National Salvation Front, which is opposed to Colonel Gadhafi's regime and which is based in Chad. These Libyans are no longer considered POW's by the Government.

A number of people, primarily members of a clan of the Hadjerai ethnic group, were arrested on security grounds in 1987 and remained in detention during 1989 without charge or prospects of trial. In December 1988, government troops defeated a band of Libyan-backed rebels, most of whom were Hadjerai, and more Hadjerai suspected of complicity with the rebels were arrested and held without charge. According to AI, more than 180 persons belonging to the Hadjerai ethnic group were in secret detention at the beginning of 1989. These included a number of children.

The President has called for persons in exile to return to Chad; many of them have done so and have been integrated into the Government and military. Nevertheless, there also have been reports of detention by government security forces of former Chadian exiles upon their return to Chad, including Hadja Merami, and her daughter Azzine. Although Hadja Merami was subsequently released, her daughter was reportedly still held without charge at the end of 1989. President Habre's long-time rival, ex-president Goukouni Oueddei, remained in self-imposed exile in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

CHAD

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Chadian judicial system (the Supreme Court and several lower courts) and Criminal Code have evolved from the body of law (Napoleonic Code) inherited from the former colonial power, France. This law includes safeguards against arbitrary arrests and provides for specified detainee rights, including the right to counsel and the right to be promptly informed of charges. There is also a traditional system of law presided over by sultans and chiefs. It is generally effective and fair in resolving property and other civil disputes and in dealing with cases involving petty local crime. Decisions in customary courts may theoretically be appealed to the regular courts.

Armed conflict over more than 20 years has severely disrupted the legal system, and political/security cases almost never come before the courts. The Government has made some effort to reestablish civilian law enforcement in liberated areas. AI states in its 1989 Report that, since President Habre came to power in 1982, no political prisoners have been brought to trial or even had their cases referred to judicial authorities. AI asserts they have been kept in secret detention, under harsh conditions, and are released only when it suits the Government's political purposes.

Whether accused of crimes or security offenses, most Chadians do not get speedy trials, in part because of the rudimentary nature of the Chadian judicial system. There are only a few trained lawyers, judges, and other court personnel. Many of Chad's tribunals do not even have law books. The few trained judicial officials complain of a heavy backlog of cases. Trials can be held in public or private at the option of the Government. No legal right to a timely trial exists.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under Chadian law, homes may be searched only during the day and under authority of a warrant. In practice, there are many instances where this law has not been respected, especially in areas where ethnic unrest continues. Correspondence carried by people traveling overland in Chad is often checked by authorities at various points, but correspondence sent through the Chadian postal system is less likely to be subjected to such controls.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Officially, free speech is assured under Chadian law, but in practice public or private statements that the authorities consider seditious have led to arrest. There is no prior restraint on the publication or broadcast of information in Chad, but the media (television, radio, and two newssheets) are government controlled and directed, and there is no opportunity for opposing views to be heard. The small Chadian press corps is careful not to criticize the Government or its policies. Occasionally the Government authorizes controlled public criticism of individual ministries or agencies of government and officials. Academic freedom is nominally respected but is subject to similar restraints.

CHAD

The Government's treatment of foreign correspondents, uneven in the past, improved in 1989. The Government encouraged visits by foreign journalists, facilitated their interviews with public officials, and allowed them access to many areas of the country long off-limits to the foreign press. It did not impose prior censorship, a change from the past, but banned an April issue of Jeune Afrique magazine which contained an article about the attempted military revolt.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association is restricted. Chadians may assemble peacefully only as long as the purpose of the meeting is not opposed to government policies. Prefects have the nominal right to forbid a meeting, but prior permits are not required unless the gathering anticipated is large enough to cause a public hazard.

Membership in UNIR is voluntary. Although President Habre is intent on having a single mass political movement to which all Chadians will belong, he continued to permit the existence of a number of small former opposition political groupings.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it pertains to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Chad is officially a secular state in which Islam, Christianity, and other religions are practiced freely. Both Islamic and Christian holidays are given official status. More than 50 percent of Chad's population is Muslim, and Chad is a member of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. Christian missionaries may, nevertheless, enter the country, proselytize, and provide assistance to local populations. They are mainly active among the non-Muslim ethnic groups in the south. Strictly religious publications are allowed to circulate freely. The Government neither favors nor disfavors members of particular religions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Chadians enjoy freedom to move around the country except within military zones or areas of recent or potential combat. These restrictions generally pertain only to the northern one-third of the country and are not enforced for the sparse population of that large desert region. In the north, retreating Libyan military left thousands of landmines under the sand, which have claimed some civilian victims. International travel is permitted, but regular passports are expensive (about $60), and travelers must be cleared by Chad's internal security services, a process which normally takes less than a week. Chadians are free to emigrate.

In the past, thousands of Chadians fled to neighboring countries because of drought and civil strife. As conditions began to improve in 1986, most of these displaced Chadians returned from neighboring countries, encouraged by the Government. These returnees, as well as those Chadians who fled the occupied northern zone, have been well received.

CHADSection 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Under the Chadian political system in effect through late 1989, citizens did not have the right to change their Government through elections and referendums. Since June 1982, Chad has been governed by President Habre, who heads a Council of Ministers complemented by an appointed National Consultative Council. Both Councils are carefully balanced to promote ethnic and regional harmony, as is the membership in the executive organs of the country's only authorized political movement, the National Union for Independence and Revolution (UNIR). The main source of President Habre's authority has been the allegiance he commands from the armed forces and the security services. In some areas, traditional leaders (e.g., cantonal or village chiefs) are popularly elected or chosen by the subordinate members of the traditional hierarchy.

While ethnic unrest continued in some regions of Chad, and opposition leaders such as ex-President Goukouni remained abroad, President Habre made further efforts in 1989 to achieve international and national reconciliation on the political front. On August 31, Chad and Libya agreed to seek a political solution to their conflict over the Aozou strip. This Framework Accord, signed in Algiers, includes a provision for an exchange of prisoners of war and, potentially, the withdrawal of Libyan troops from the disputed northern border area.

In addition, President Habre carried through on the "Libreville Accords," signed in late 1985 in Gabon by the Chadian Government and the rallying opposition parties, calling for the drafting of a new constitution within 4 years and eventual free elections. A Constitutional Commission presented a draft document in March 1989, and after scrutiny by the Government, the party, and the President, the people approved a new Constitution by referendum on December 10. President Habre was elected President without opposition at the same time. The Constitution promises basic human and political rights, including the rights of women and labor unions. It also provides for a unicameral legislature scheduled to be elected in 1990.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Chad cooperates with the ICRC in permitting some prison visits, but continued to deny the organization access to any Libyan POW's, although discussions on this issue continued in 1989. It did not respond to AI's appeal for an investigation into Saleh Gaba's case (see Section 1.c.). There are no local human rights organizations that monitor and comment on the Government's human rights policies.

There are 200 ethnic groups in Chad. They are roughly divided between Saharan and Arab Muslims in the northern and eastern regions, and Bantu peoples in the south. The latter group includes both those who have retained traditional animist practices and those who have adopted Christianity. Over 20 years of conflict have transformed the complexity of ethnic divisions beyond simple north-south formulations. Between 1965 and 1985 as many as 11 factional armies contended at times for control of the country. In an effort to build a national government, President Habre has expanded ethnic and geographic representation by appointing people to top government and party positions from all parts of the country.

Officially, Chadian women enjoy full political equality and the full protection of the law. In practice, neither traditional law nor the inherited French Code fully protects women's rights. The new Constitution specifically prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex. Women contribute the bulk of labor in virtually all aspects of farming, even though men are the heads of many agricultural cooperatives. Women also engage in commerce ranging from managing simple market stalls to the ownership of some larger businesses. Women serve voluntarily in the armed forces, although they are excluded from officer training programs.

Violence against women, mainly wife beating, reportedly occurs in Chad on a fairly wide scale, but it is difficult to quantify. Doctors in Chad estimate that about 7 percent of admissions to emergency wards are for domestic violence cases directed against women, about 3 percent against men. While domestic violence is not sanctioned by the Government, the police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes because of strongly ingrained traditional attitudes of male dominance. Formal legal remedies are ineffective. Customary courts occasionally intervene, reflecting the mores of the different ethnic groups they represent. OFUNIR, the women's wing of the political party UNIR, is strongly and articulately vocal in opposing domestic violence directed against women. Early in 1989, OFUNIR organized a well-publicized lecture and discussion on the issue. Female genital mutilation (circumcision) has long been common in Chad; it is more prevalent in the south as part of initiation rites and in cities among all ethnic groups as a status symbol. The Government opposes these practices but has not outlawed them due to the deeply rooted traditional and religious attitudes of many Chadians.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

About 95 percent of all Chadian workers are involved in subsistence agriculture, animal husbandry, or fishing. As a result, the labor movement is small and only marginally effective. Chad's labor laws permit the formation and functioning of unions subject to restrictions. The two rival trade union federations were merged in 1988 into a single national umbrella organization, the National Union of Chadian Trade Unions (UNST), which subsequently became the labor wing of the ruling UNIR party. All unions are required to be members of the UNST, which is controlled by the Government. The UNST has not sought to affiliate with any international trade union organizations except African organizations such as the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

The right to strike exists only if arbitration at three levels in the Ministries of Labor and Justice fails. This process, which in effect makes strikes illegal, has been criticized by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) has observed that various legal provisions of Chadian law, which forbid public employees from exercising the right to strike, prohibit trade unions from all political activity, and suspend all strikes, are at variance with Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, which Chad has ratified. The Government has given assurances that these provisions will be repealed, and the ILO is advising the Government on the preparation of draft language for a new labor code.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Freedom of association and the right to form unions is guaranteed in Chad's new Constitution, and the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively is established in Chadian law. However these rights are weakened by provisions that allow the authorities to intervene in the collective bargaining process and require prior government authorization for collective agreements to come into force. Government labor tribunals exist to hear worker-employer disputes. Their decisions may be appealed to the judicial system. Labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country. There are no export processing zones.

The ILO COE has welcomed the Government's stated intention to amend the labor code to reduce significantly government interference in the collective bargaining process.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The ILO has been critical of Chad in the past for the use of forced labor. The Government is continuing discussions with the ILO on revising its labor laws to meet ILO conventions on forced labor, which Chad has ratified.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 14 in the wage sector, but enforcement of this law is limited. There is general compliance in practice, given the large pool of adults seeking employment. However, children work on family farms at a much earlier age.

The statutory minimum wage rate for workers in the formal economy is approximately $25 per month, which is barely sufficient for subsistence. The Government, the largest employer, promised to begin paying civil servants their full salaries in 1989, but frequent budgetary shortfalls caused irregular payments. Most workers must supplement their incomes through subsistence agriculture, second jobs, and/or reliance on the extended family system.

Most nonagricultural work is limited to 48 hours per week, with overtime to be paid for any excess. Agricultural work is supposedly limited to 2,400 hours per year. All workers must have at least 24 consecutive hours of rest each week, usually on Sunday. Occupational health and safety standards are established by law and ministerial decree; but, as with most social legislation, enforcement is weak.

COMOROS

During much of 1989, the Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros was a de facto one-party State led by President Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane, who, backed by the Presidential Guard, had been continuously in power since 1978. Located in the Mozambique Channel between East Africa and Madagascar, Comoros comprises three islands and claims a fourth, Mayotte, which is still governed by France. In 1989 there were four important amendments to the 1978 Constitution, including one which would have permitted President Abdallah to succeed himself in 1990.

On November 27, President Abdallah was assassinated under mysterious circumstances. Under constitutional provisions, the head of the Supreme Court became acting President, and Abdallah's Cabinet of Ministers remained in place. However, effective power rested with Bob Denard, a French soldier of fortune, and approximately 25 European mercenaries who were serving as the officers of the Presidential Guard. Denard and his group eventually bowed to intense pressure from France and South Africa and voluntarily departed the Comoros on December 15, leaving command of the Presidential Guard in the hands of French troops who arrived that same day. At the invitation of the acting President, a wide spectrum of Comorian political leaders began roundtable discussions in mid-December to prepare for new, democratic presidential elections in 1990.

About 25 mercenaries, primarily French, had trained and led the South African-funded Presidential Guard, which had primary responsibility for internal security and which was the source of a number of human rights abuses. France, which had provided considerable financial and technical assistance to the small Comorian armed forces and the gendarmerie, seemed likely to reorganize the Guard and integrate it into the regular armed forces in the wake of the mercenaries' departure.

Agriculture dominates the economy, but Comoros is running out of arable land, and soil erosion on the steep volcanic slopes is an increasing problem. Revenues from the export of vanilla, essence of ylang ylang, and cloves continue to fall. Three major families, of which the late President Abdallah's is one, control most of the import-export business. Comoros is part of the French franc monetary zone and depends heavily on France for budgetary support and technical assistance. In 1989 Comoros began to implement a number of economic reforms sought by the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, including a 5-percent cut in already low civil service salaries.

Human rights were sharply restricted during President Abdallah's rule. Freedom of speech, press, association, citizens' rights to change their government, women's rights, and worker rights were all significantly restricted. Several weeks before he was assassinated, voters in a referendum approved constitutional changes that removed restrictions on President Abdallah's ability to succeed himself; there were numerous reports of fraud and tampering with ballot boxes in the referendum. During the brief period of rule by the mercenaries after Abdallah's death, there were almost no arrests, and virtually all political prisoners were released. By the end of the year, politicians were actively engaged in the preparations for presidential elections in 1990.

COMOROS

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no substantiated reports of torture or other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment in 1989. However, there were unconfirmed reports that in the last days of the Abdallah regime, after the November 5 referendum on constitutional changes, there was some torture of suspected arsonists on the island of Anjouan.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In 1989 there were no known cases of arbitrary arrest or detention. In regular criminal cases, a person may not be detained more than 48 hours without being charged. This is generally followed in practice. However, under Abdallah's regime, there was apparently no such limit in cases involving national security, which was interpreted broadly by the Government. For example, four persons, including two former ministers, were detained for 2 months in 1988 in connection with a pamphlet criticizing the Government for its neglect of the island of Moheli.

From November 27 to December 15, when Denard and the mercenaries effectively controlled the country, virtually all those who had been detained after the 1985 and 1987 coup attempts and in connection with the November 5 referendum, were released.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for the equality of all citizens before the law and the right of all accused to defense counsel. The Comorian legal system applies Islamic law and an inherited French legal code. Most disputes are settled by village elders or by a civilian court of first instance. In regular civil and criminal cases, the judiciary is usually independent, and trials are public, but in national security cases during the Abdallah regime regular judicial procedures were sometimes completely ignored.

One of Denard's last official acts was the release of Said Moustafa Cheik of the leftist Democratic Front, whom Abdallah considered to be the only political prisoner in the country.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of home and property. There were no known cases of arbitrary interference with privacy in 1989. There is no regular, systematic interference with correspondence, but some members of the opposition believed that their mail may have been screened by the Presidential Guard (see also Section 2.a.).

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Despite constitutional provision for freedom of expression, thought, and conscience, they were significantly restricted under President Abdallah's rule. Comorians discuss and criticize the Government and its leading personalities openly in some situations. During the parliamentary debates on the constitutional changes, the Assembly's sole opposition member spoke freely against the Government, for which he was sharply criticized by President Abdallah, but otherwise suffered no harassment. The so-called tribune libre, an informal private forum for discussion of political, economic, social, and other issues, has been in existence for several years. Meetings are by invitation, but all subjects are covered, and the existence of the group was known and tolerated by the Abdallah Government. Attendees include figures from both the public and private sectors.

However, the Abdallah Government restricted public criticism of its performance. After political tracts critical of the regime appeared in Mutsamudu, Anjouan, the Government organized public meetings to criticize the authors. One member of a leading business family, who wrote an open letter critical of the President and accused a senior minister of corruption, was harassed by the Government and fined exorbitant amounts for petty tax and customs duty irregularities.

There is a considerable degree of self-censorship by the government-owned radio station and the semi-independent bimonthly newspaper. Prior censorship is rare.

Foreign journals and newspapers are available, as are books from abroad. The Paris-based Indian Ocean Newsletter, which is often critical of the Comoros, generally arrives unhindered through the international mail. To show solidarity with fellow Moslem countries, Salman Rushdie's "Satanic Verses" was banned in 1989, and in March the Interior Minister personally led a public burning of foreign publications containing excerpts from the book. For several weeks after that incident, foreign publications were carefully screened and some issues were confiscated. An issue of the local newspaper was recalled in order to reprint a page containing an article about the Rushdie affair deemed overly critical of Westerners.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of association. Under Abdallah, Comorians were circumspect about organizing public political gatherings, and political groupings opposed to the Government kept a fairly low profile. The December roundtable discussions on the presidential elections comprised representation from a broad cross-section of society, including the previously banned Democratic Front.

COMOROS

c. Freedom of Religion

An overwhelming majority of the population is Muslim. The Constitution holds Islam to be the "wellspring of the principles and rules which guide the State and its institutions." However, the State upholds the right of non-Muslims to practice their faith. There are churches for the small Protestant and Catholic populations. Christian missionaries work in local hospitals and schools, but they are not allowed to proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on travel within the country. Passports and exit visas for foreign travel are generally granted. One disgruntled former government official was allowed to emigrate without any problem. A leading member of the opposition was denied an exit permit but successfully traveled to France anyway, via Mayotte and Reunion. Some members of the large Comorian community in France opposed the Abdallah Government, but in 1989 none of those returning to the Comoros were subjected to governmental reprisals.

Under Abdallah, the right of citizens to change their government through peaceful means existed in theory but not in practice. With his November 27 assassination and the December 15 departure of the mercenaries who had led his Presidential Guard, a new political era opened in the Comoros. No less than 14 political groupings were represented in the roundtable discussions on the presidential elections, which will be held in 1990 at a date still to be determined. The roundtable discussions indicate that the Constitution will probably be modified to permit several political parties and presidential candidates to contest the elections. Following these, the new President would likely dissolve the Federal Assembly and organize open, multiparty parliamentary elections.

In the 1987 Federal Assembly elections, opposition candidates were permitted to run, but there was widespread fraud on election day, and the ruling United Progress Party (UPP) won 41 of 42 seats. In 1988 an opposition candidate won the by-election to fill the remaining vacant seat in the Assembly.

Traditional social and economic institutions also influence importantly the country's political life. Intra-island rivalries have been a persistent and growing factor. Village notables and Muslim religious leaders tended to dominate local politics.

Comoros continues to claim sovereignty over Mayotte, which did not join the other islands in declaring independence from France in 1975. The results of a 1977 referendum on the status of Mayotte--overwhelmingly in favor of remaining with France--has never been accepted by the Comorian Government. The French have indefinitely postponed a new referendum. In the June 1988 French parliamentary elections, 98 percent of the voters on Mayotte supported candidates advocating closer ties to France, while less than 2 percent favored candidates advocating independence or reunification with the Comoros.

COMOROS

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

After 1986 the Abdallah Government did not respond to requests from human rights organizations including, as far as is known, Amnesty International's call for an investigation regarding the alleged use of torture on some detainees held after the 1987 coup attempt. No local human rights groups were permitted under President Abdallah's regime.

The constitutional recognition of Islam's special status formalizes the deeply held commitment of most Comorians to an Islamic world view. The society respects authority based on inheritance, age, wealth, and religious leadership.

The Constitution formally provides for the equality of citizens regardless of race, sex, or religion. Nevertheless, within Comorian society, men have the dominant role. Women have the right to vote and to participate, in theory, in the political process as candidates, but tradition has been a powerful force in discouraging women from direct participation in politics. Women are neither veiled nor limited, in terms of employment, to minor civil service posts. Change in the status of women is most evident in the major towns. Women are finding increasing employment opportunities in the small paid labor force, and generally receive wages comparable to those of men in similar work. Property rights generally do not disfavor women; for example, the house the father of the bride traditionally provides to the couple at the time of their marriage remains her property, even if her husband divorces her.

Violence against women, including wife beating, occurs but is believed to be rare. The Government has not addressed this issue specifically, however, and there are no studies or statistics available to help determine the extent of the problem. When an expatriate chef at a new luxury hotel slapped a woman for an alleged work infraction, her male coworkers quickly came to her rescue, and the chef was quickly fired. Female circumcision is not practiced in the Comoros.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution allows workers to form unions and to strike. However, farming on small landholdings, subsistence fishing, and petty commerce make up the daily activity of most of the population. Hence, the wage labor force is small (less than 2,000 workers), and there are no formally constituted, legally recognized unions at present. There have been sporadic groupings of workers in various sectors (dockers, taxi drivers) who have formed temporary associations for presenting specific grievances, but these have tended to dissolve after their demands were met. Public service employees are not subject to the Labor Code but are granted the right to organize in civil service legislation. There is an active teachers' association.

A half-day strike at a new luxury hotel led to the firing of the expatriate manager and improvements in pay and working conditions. There were also brief work slowdowns by teachers and airport baggage handlers about late payment of salaries. The increasing scarcity of jobs is also a real restraint on labor complaints, organizational activities, and formal strikes. The Government's inability to pay wages and salaries on schedule sometimes results in work slowdowns, absenteeism, and informal, peaceful protests.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The absence of formal unions does not mean that collective bargaining does not exist. There are various informal collective conventions between workers and employers. There are no export processing zones. Labor legislation, to the extent it exists, is applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor in the Comoros.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment of children is 15. This is generally respected. Child labor is not an issue due to the lack of employment opportunities for adolescents and young adults. Children do help in family units in the large subsistence sector.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The currently accepted minimum wage is approximately $50 per month, which is barely adequate to cover basic human needs. However, the hours of work in any category rarely exceed 35 hours per week. In 1989 the Government reminded employers to respect the Labor Code, which guarantees a day off per week plus a month of paid vacation per year. Otherwise, the Government's role in such labor-related fields as setting health and safety standards is minimal.

CONGO

The People's Republic of the Congo is officially a Marxist-Leninist state governed by an elite group of civilian and military officials through the single legal party, the Congolese Labor Party (PCT). President Denis Sassou-Nguesso, Chief of State and Head of Government since 1979, serves as President of the 75-member PCT Central Committee. The President nominates the other 12 members of the PCT Political Bureau, the key policymaking group, whose selection is approved by the Central Committee. Under Sassou, Central Committee membership has usually reflected a balance among Congo's rival southern, northern, and central ethnic groups. The military and security services are firmly under the control of the northerners, who are the ultimate arbiters of power in Congo and have dominated its Government since 1968. The need to maintain a consensus among the competing regions and ethnic groups has provided a check on arbitrary and overly pronorthern policies. Congo's National Assembly has limited powers, but it has recently begun to serve as a sounding board on social and economic issues and to draw representatives of key interest groups outside the PCT into the political arena.

The security apparatus, which is under the direction of the Presidency, is headed by the State Security Organization (DGSE) and is patterned after those in Eastern Europe. Its principal objective is to protect the State against all possible dissident activity. As of late 1989, the military forces were no longer routinely used for internal security purposes because the police have been reorganized, removed from the Ministry of Defense, and given special riot and crowd control training. PCT "core groups" are in all ministries, labor organizations, mass organizations, and urban districts. They only intermittently attain their stated goal of monitoring the activities of workers and neighbors.

The Congolese economy is highly dependent on oil, and declining oil prices since 1985 have forced the Government to cut its budget expenditures, cooperate with the International Monetary Fund and World Bank in formulating a structural adjustment program, and to seek debt relief measures. In addition, since 1985 the Government has followed a policy of liberalization of the economy and has moved toward a truly nonaligned foreign policy. At the Fourth PCT Congress in July 1989, the party called for and adopted an economic program emphasizing administrative reform, agricultural self-sufficiency, privatization of state enterprises, and encouragement of foreign investment. Despite its Socialist policies, the PCT has never forbidden private property and enterprise, and it has encouraged the indigenous commercial sector in the past few years.

Human rights remained circumscribed in 1989. Most Congolese live their lives with little government interference as long as they do not criticize the Government. The principal human rights problems include mistreatment and torture of detainees; arbitrary detentions; lack of fair trial; discrimination against women; and tight restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, worker rights, and the right of citizens to change their government.

CONGO

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for and Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported cases of disappearance for political motives.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

The practice of beating suspects at police stations and at state security centers in the course of interrogations is common. The public or the police frequently beat thieves who have been caught in the act of stealing. Political detainees are held incommunicado; Amnesty International (AI), in various statements and reports, has expressed concern about the use of torture to extract information from detainees held after the 1987 coup attempt. At the same time, several political prisoners held incommunicado in the past are now leading normal lives, including as government ministers. Prison conditions in general are very poor.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides protection against arbitrary indictment, arrest, and detention. But in practice a warrant is not required to make arrests. Under the Code of Penal Procedure a detainee must be brought before an investigative judge within 3 days of arrest. The judge may then order detention for a maximum period of 6 months, after which the detainee must be charged or released. This law, however, does not apply in cases involving security of the State, and political detainees have been held for lengthy periods without being brought before a judge or charged, e.g., the Government held Georges Mfaouta-Kitoko, Christophe Samba, and Florent Kihoulou without charge from 1986 to 1988 for belonging to an independent political discussion group and writing a tract calling for a "new society." The trial of those accused of participation in the 1982 Brazzaville bombings did not take place until 1986, and some of the accused were held incommunicado for several years. A similar pattern appears with respect to those accused in the 1987 coup attempt.

Despite government steps to increase the number of magistrates and improve procedures, the administrative processing of regular criminal cases is slow, and persons awaiting trial are often held for lengthy periods. Whether a detainee is formally charged usually depends upon the seriousness of the crime and the economic situation of the family. For lesser crimes, the person is usually taken to jail, where he may be beaten and held for a few days, then released on bail pending a trial which may never take place. A person accused of a serious crime (e.g., murder, rape) is held in prison until the trial, which may be held months or even years later.

The number of political detainees or prisoners in 1989 was unavailable. In 1987, according to AI, the Government arrested 60 or 70 people in connection with an abortive coup attempt by former army captain Pierre Anga and supporters with alleged ties to President Sassou's predecessor, Joachim Yhombi-Opango. The Government officially acknowledged the arrest of four military men and two civilians for alleged participation in the coup plot. Yhombi-Opango, Colonel Jean Michel Ebaka, and Lt. Colonel Eboundit, the ranking military officers arrested, remained in detention at a government housing complex at the end of 1989. After one coup participant was tracked down and killed by government troops in July 1988, a number of his relatives and other associates were arrested. The Government claims to have released some of these persons. In November 1989, it announced the release of some 40 civilians implicated in the 1987 coup attempt but has refused to reveal the names of those released or still in detention.

In 1988 the President announced an amnesty for most persons held for political offenses since 1963, excepting those arrested in connection with the 1987 coup plot. Despite this announcement, it appeared that at least some other political detainees remained in prison at the end of the year.

There were no known instances of exile being used as a means of political control in 1989. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of a Fair Public Trial

The legal system is not free from political interference. The Constitution establishes the Supreme Court at the apex of the judiciary, but in practice this Court is an arm of the executive branch rather than an independent body. The amended Constitution also provides for nonprofessional judges to be elected to all courts below the Supreme Court. The stated purpose of this was to "popularize justice," i.e., provide a role for peers to influence the formal judicial process. According to the law, any Congolese citizen can become a judge but can adjudicate cases only in collaboration with trained judges. All nominations must be approved by the party. By law, the right to a fair and public trial exists in all cases, and the judicial process is relatively fair and open for those accused of common crimes. It is not unusual to have a higher court reverse lower court decisions in nonpolitical cases. Detained persons are entitled to legal counsel, and all lawyers are regulated by the State. In capital criminal cases, defense lawyers are provided by the Government for those without funds.

While political cases usually do not come to the trial stage, when they do they are tried by a special court, the Revolutionary Court of Justice. Trials before this Court, such as the August 1986 trial of 10 persons convicted of causing bomb explosions in Brazzaville in 1982, have not met international standards of fairness. In that case, AI indicated that several judges were members of the PCT Central Committee and had been involved in the case at an earlier stage. In 1988 the President commuted the sentences of four defendants in the case. There were no known political cases tried before the Revolutionary Court in 1989.

There is generally little interference by the Government with privacy, family, home, or correspondence so long as a person does not engage in any overt activity which involves or implies opposition to the Government.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are restricted, despite guarantees in the Constitution. The Government allows some criticism of its policies and programs judged not to be politically sensitive, but it does not allow its ultimate authority to be challenged publicly. The Government does not hesitate to arrest people and hold them incommunicado for expressing views it finds objectionable, as in the cases of the "new society" writers (see Section 1.d) and Jean-Felix Demba Ntelo, who was released by presidential decree in 1988 after several months in custody. (The Government maintains that these persons were involved in a coup plot.)

The State owns and controls all media except for one weekly religious newspaper. A state censorship committee reviews the content of all newspapers, movies, books, and records. Articles considered to be critical of the Government or its leaders are censored. The Government and party, through general guidelines for journalists, control the kind of news Congolese journalists may publish from various sources of information. Self-censorship, however, is the general pattern.

The Congolese have access to Zairian radio and television, as well as to news and feature programming from France and the United States. Western papers and magazines are freely available. However, individual issues containing articles critical of Congolese domestic politics have been pulled from newsstands and the mails; and foreign journalists working on domestic issues are occasionally detained or expelled. Foreign journalists are generally permitted to travel freely once an entry visa and a special permit for travel to the interior are obtained. These are usually granted.

Academic freedom is limited. The Congolese educational system borrows liberally from the Soviet system in form, but it offers a broad range of materials, including American, to students. Increasing numbers of Congolese pursue higher education in American and other Western institutions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of peaceful assembly is limited by the State's perceived self-interest. Political meetings are permitted only for the party and its affiliated organizations. Government permission is not required for groups to assemble for religious or social purposes, but it is required for the use of official facilities. Government authorization is also required to establish professional clubs and organizations, of which there are several.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by law, but the Government is officially atheist. Christmas Day, for example, is officially called Children's Day. Religious organizations, such as the Salvation Army, must obtain government permission to work in the Congo. Jehovah's Witnesses are not permitted. Members of the Baha'i faith may hold services but are prohibited from organizing and teaching. With these important exceptions, the government and party position toward religious affairs is characterized by political pragmatism, with regular, though unofficial, contacts between the respective leaderships.

The Catholic Church, the largest single religious community, maintains a seminary for the training of its clergy and has missions throughout the country. Masses are held in French and the various local languages. The Catholic church publishes the only independent newspaper, La Semaine Africaine. Catholic and other missionaries are active in managing private missions and providing other social services. Some social services formerly provided by the Catholic Church have lapsed, but a few continue as joint church-government ventures, especially in education. With the recent liberalization in Congo's economic policies, there are some signs of government efforts to solicit church support, including the provision of seats for religious representatives in the National Assembly.

The Government exercises limited control over the internal movement of its citizens through identification card checks and control points outside all major towns where soldiers or militia rigorously check identification documents. Congolese citizens wishing to travel abroad require exit authorization from the State Security Organization (DGSE). Passports are generally granted but must be returned to the DGSE after the traveler returns from abroad. There are no known instances of Congolese being refused the right to return to their country. There are no known cases of a native-born Congolese being denied citizenship.

The Congo is the home of about 2,000 refugees, primarily from Chad, Central African Republic, Rwanda, Burundi, and Zaire. In the case of Zaire, refugees are often indistinguishable from the sizable number of Zairians in Congo engaged in economic pursuits. Refugees are subject to surveillance and occasional harassment and expulsion by the Congolese Government, but there has been no widespread or systematic forced repatriation of refugees. The Congo is a party to the U.N. Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, and a representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is resident in Brazzaville.

The Congolese people do not have the right to change their government through democratic processes. Under the Constitution, the President of the Central Committee of the Congolese Labor Party (PCT) is automatically President of the Republic. After coming to power in a surprise Central Committee maneuver in 1979, Colonel Denis Sassou-Nguesso was reelected by regular party congresses in 1984 and 1989. The President is the most powerful single person in government, but his authority is limited by his need to maintain a consensus in the Political Bureau and within the larger Central Committee. The Congolese military, whose leadership is drawn primarily from the north, supports the Government, and its officers occupy key positions among the ruling group. Government and party positions, however, are awarded to representatives of the southern and eastern ethnic groups in numbers sufficient to ensure their support or acquiescence and to maintain a rough regional and ethnic political balance.

Opportunities for political involvement by Congolese citizens are limited to the Marxist-Leninist Congolese Labor Party (PCT), including its mass organizations, and to participation in national, regional, and local assemblies. The PCT is the "supreme social and political organization." No other political parties are permitted to operate, and political competition takes place almost exclusively within the PCT framework. PCT membership is approximately 10,000 out of a population of some 2 million. Membership is awarded on the basis of political loyalty and public service.

The national, regional, and local assemblies are elected by universal suffrage from single, party-approved lists, which contain only one candidate for each seat. The selection process can involve a certain amount of negotiation within the PCT, and incumbents have been turned out of office in the process. National Assembly representatives are chosen on a merit basis from a broad spectrum of the population, including party members, the army, small farmers, workers, and representatives of religious groups. The powers of the National Assembly are limited, but its debates on social and economic issues have some impact. Regional and local assemblies may discuss issues and make recommendations before decisions are made at the national level. The last elections for the national, regional, and local assemblies took place in September 1989.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Congo Government rarely publicizes the arrest, trial, or release of political opponents. Polite listening without response is standard government procedure when faced with human rights inquiries from foreign governments or nongovernmental organizations. Foreign journalists have been expelled for investigating human rights issues, such as the circumstances under which political detainees are held. The Government did permit AI to send an observer to the 1986 bombing trial. It did not respond, however, to AI's subsequent request to send a delegation to review the human rights situation or to its 1987 memorandum concerning the 1986 trial. There are no human rights organizations in the Congo.

Under the Constitution there is no official discrimination based on race, sex, religion, language, or social status. As previously noted, northerners, especially those of the Cuvette region, exert strong influence in politics and in the security services. There are occasional reports of mistreatment of pygmies. Such incidents seem to be the result of cultural friction between those forest dwellers and villagers, rather than government policy, which specifically calls for integrating the pygmies into the economy and society.

Women have the same legal rights as men in commerce, politics, and society. Among some ethnic groups, women are often the chief decisionmakers. There is a large disparity, however, between salaries for men and women, and women are relegated to a secondary role in the modern sectors of society. This also holds for rural society where women are heavily involved in traditional family farming. The husband has considerable legal or actual control over the activities of his spouse, a control usually moderated by the influence of the extended family. Congolese women may not receive official travel documents without the permission of their husband, father, or male head of family.

Anecdotal evidence suggests violence against women, for example in the form of wife beating, is not widespread in the Congo. However, there are no studies or statistics available to determine more precisely the extent of the problem. There are no specific laws addressing violence against women beyond those protecting individuals regardless of sex. Legal remedies through the court system are available but are rarely used. In this strongly family-oriented society, informal remedies through the extended family system are most readily used. The Government has not specifically addressed the issue of violence against women, but in any case relies on the PCT women's organization to take the leadership role in educating the public in such matters. Female genital mutilation (circumcision) is not practiced among the Congolese; it may, however, occasionally be found among West Africans resident in Brazzaville or Pointe Noire.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The labor code adopted in March 1975 provides in theory for the right or workers to associate. In practice, given its historically active political role, the labor movement is scrutinized closely and controlled by the Government and party, largely through the umbrella union, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation (CSC), which is itself an appendage of the party. No group is allowed to form an independent, alternative union outside the party. As long as political subjects are avoided, there is a degree of democratic dialog within the labor movement and between the CSC and the Government.

The CSC is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), but it is free to and does associate with other international and regional labor organizations. As a reflection of the Government's efforts to improve contacts with Western countries, the CSC leadership in 1988 proposed establishment of a bilateral relationship with the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organization's (AFL/CIO) African American Labor Center (AALC). However, the AFL/CIO's policy against association with WFTU-affiliated unions has limited the contacts and prevented Congolese participation in AALC-sponsored activities.

Despite government assertions that the single trade union system results from the common will of the workers and from political, economic, and historical development, the International Labor Organization's (ILO) Committee of Experts again in 1989 noted that a trade union monopoly established by legislation is in violation of ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, which the Congo has ratified, and has urged the Government to bring its legislation into conformity.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The CSC is represented in every ministry and state-owned enterprise and serves on management boards along with a member of the Government and the party. Known as the "determinant trilogy," this structure is responsible for ensuring that the three major points of view are represented in the decisionmaking process and serves as Congo's form of collective bargaining in both the public and private sectors. While no alternatives to strikes exist, the local unions within the CSC have been able, in some instances, to persuade the Government to provide workers with increased benefits, including wage increases. The entire Congolese labor force is treated equally under the law; there are no exceptions such as those granted, for example, to export processing zones, of which the Congo has none.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There were no reports of forced or compulsory labor, which is legally prohibited.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment of children is 16. Outside the Government and major employers, this minimum is often ignored, especially in small family enterprises or family farms in the subsistence agricultural sector.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Working conditions for the 50 percent of the population in the modern sector are generally good and include a social security system. These conditions include a maximum 40-hour workweek, at least 1 day of rest per week, family benefits, severance pay, and medical care. The minimum monthly wage is $85 for urban employees. Domestic workers must be paid at least $75 monthly. Outside the Government, large corporations, and foreign enterprises, these minimums are often ignored. While many salaried Congolese have a rather high standard of working conditions and social benefits, the minimum wage does not provide a decent standard of living for a worker and his family. Workers at this wage level and many others in the informal sector are dependent upon the extended family, including other salaried family members, and some subsistence farming, in which most of the rural population is still engaged. There is a code of occupational safety and health, although it, too, is not rigidly enforced.

COTE D'IVOIRE

Power in Cote d'Ivoire is concentrated in the Democratic Party of Cote d'Ivoire (PDCI) and its long-time leader, President Felix Houphouet-Boigny, who is in his mid-to-late eighties. Although the freedom to form other parties is provided for in the Constitution, in practice no other party has been allowed to participate in the political process. Basic policies are set within the PDCI; the unicameral National Assembly has never publicly challenged a policy put forth by the party.

The Ministry of Internal Security includes the Surete Nationale and the gendarmerie, the national police, structured along French lines. The Surete has an arm tasked with intelligence gathering and counterespionage responsibilities. The gendarmerie is responsible for territorial security, especially in the rural areas.

During the 1980's Cote d'Ivoire has been squeezed by a heavy debt burden and falling prices for its exports, principally coffee, cocoa, and tropical woods, and per capita income has slipped in recent years from well over $1,000 to $740. In 1989 the economy continued to decline and the financial situation remained critical. A new International Monetary Fund and World Bank financial package was being assembled at the end of 1989.

In 1989 human rights remained circumscribed. The President continued to advocate dialog with dissenters in settling disputes, but it is unclear if this has eased the lingering threat of detentions and conscriptions, such as those which took place in 1988, and their stifling effect on critics, including students, teachers, and trade unionists. One businessman was widely believed to have been convicted on manufactured charges because of his connection with a well-known dissident. Other areas of human rights abridgement included restrictions on freedom of speech and press, academic freedom, and freedom of assembly and association; and limitations on women's and worker rights, and the right of citizens to change their government through democratic means.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or extrajudicial killings in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of officially sanctioned abduction or disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Penal Code prohibits official violence without "legitimate justification." The Code does not, however, specifically mention or prohibit torture, or the level of violence officials may use if "justified." While there were no confirmed reports of torture in 1989, foreign Africans are routinely treated more roughly by police on arrest than are Ivoirians. This rough treatment is reported to include beatings, often with the objective of extracting a confession.

COTE D'IVOIRE

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution and pertinent statutes prohibit arbitrary arrest or imprisonment. The Government has, however, occasionally detained persons considered a threat to internal security. The Government has also used the threat of forced conscription, such as that which occurred in 1988, to discourage student and trade union efforts peacefully to oppose the Government or its policies. In 1988, 20 former officials or members of the Secondary Schoolteachers' Union were detained and conscripted into varying lengths of military service.

Under the Code of Penal Procedure, a public prosecutor can order the detention of a suspect for up to 48 hours without bringing charges. The Code dictates that further detention must be ordered by a magistrate who can authorize periods of up to 4 months, but who must also provide the Minister of Justice, on a monthly basis, with a written justification for continued detention. There have been unconfirmed reports that local police have held persons for more than 48 hours in a few cases. Bail is technically available but is not commonly provided. Defendants are not guaranteed the right to a judicial determination of the legality of their detention.

Some prominent critics of the Government have chosen to live and write in other countries (see Section 2.a.). Political exiles from a number of countries have found Cote d'Ivoire to be a hospitable safe haven.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The modern judicial system is headed by a Supreme Court and includes a Court of Appeals and lower courts. Although the judiciary is generally considered independent of the executive in practice as well as under the Constitution's separation of powers provisions, the judiciary follows the lead of the executive in cases concerning perceived national security issues. There have also been credible reports that the courts have given lenient treatment to individuals with personal connections to the Government. One businessman, Innocente Anaky, is widely believed to have been convicted of trumped-up charges of financial impropriety because of his connections to prominent dissident Laurent Gbagbo. Anaky is currently serving a lengthy prison sentence.

Defendants have the right to be present at their trials. Innocence is presumed, and defendants have the right of appeal, although in practice verdicts are rarely overturned. Defendants accused of felonies or capital crimes have the right to legal counsel, and the judicial system provides for court-appointed attorneys for indigent defendants. In practice, however, many defendants cannot afford private counsel, and court-appointed attorneys are not readily available.

Ivorian law establishes the right to a fair public trial. This provision is generally respected in urban areas. In rural areas, justice is often administered at the village level through traditional institutions which handle domestic disputes, minor land questions, and family law. Dispute resolution is by extended debate, with no known instances of resort to physical or similar punishment. These traditional courts are increasingly superseded by the formal judicial system.

COTE D'IVOIRE

Civilians are not tried by military courts. There are no appellate courts within the military justice system. Persons convicted by a military tribunal occasionally request the Supreme Court to set aside the tribunal's verdict and order a retrial.

The number of political prisoners is unknown, but is believed to be small.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

All Ivoirians are considered to be members of the PDCI. Party regulations call for active participation in party activities and payments of dues, which are collected in most cases through deductions from paychecks. Most party regulations, however, are not strictly enforced, and Ivoirians who choose not to participate do not suffer retaliation.

The Code of Penal Procedure specifies that a police official or investigative magistrate may conduct searches of homes without a warrant if there is reason to believe there is evidence on the premises concerning a crime. The official must have the prosecutor's agreement to retain any objects seized in the search and is required to have witnesses to the search, which may not take place between the hours of 9 p.m. and 4 a.m. Legal safeguards against arbitrary searches are generally respected in urban areas, although there have been reports of police entering homes of foreign Africans, taking them to the local police station, and extorting small amounts of money for alleged minor offenses. Safeguards against arbitrary searches are also believed to be ignored on occasion in the countryside.

In 1988 there were some reports that armed members of the gendarmerie were directly involved in robberies of civilians, particularly on the highways. There were no such reports in 1989; however, there were continuing reports, difficult to substantiate, of police roundups of foreign Africans, also with the intention of extorting money. Private telephone conversations are monitored to some degree, although it is difficult to estimate the extent of such monitoring. There is no evidence that private correspondence is monitored.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Free expression in Cote d'Ivoire is provided for in the Constitution but significantly limited in practice. Public criticism of basic government policies, the party, or the President, rarely occurs. Critics of the Government express themselves in informal situations without fear of reprisal.

Government policy assigns the media a positive role in promoting national unity and development, allowing criticism of failures to execute policy but not criticism of the policies themselves. Investigative journalism is not permitted with respect to the Government and its policies. The Government operates radio, television, and a wire service, and owns majority shares in the two daily newspapers. There are also two weekly newsmagazines which are controlled by the party. All of these media follow government policies. Several periodic pamphlets are published privately.

COTE D'IVOIRE

In April Vice President of the National Assembly Bamba was detained for carrying political tracts advocating a multiparty system. He was released and retains his elected position as Deputy in the National Assembly.

Academic freedom is restricted. A university professor, Pascal Kokora, was fired from his job in January 1988 after having his linguistics class compare Ivorian and foreign news reports of the trial of former Secondary Schoolteachers' Union officials. As no alternative work was available for him, he left the country after several months. This report last year indicated that Kokora was given his job back in September 1988; in fact, he was not reinstated and has once again left the country.

Laurent Gbagbo, generally considered to be Cote d'Ivoire's leading dissident, lived in voluntary exile in France from 1983 to 1988, when he returned and was given a job at the university. In his current position, Gbagbo is limited to research activities and publishing in scientific journals, and he is not allowed to have significant contact with students. In general, professors and students report that they are afraid to express antigovernment sentiments in any public forum.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the Constitution, but in practice is restricted when the Government perceives a significant and immediate danger to public order (which can include the expression of unwelcome political views). Gatherings occasionally are canceled to prevent the expression of controversial views in public forums. Only nonpolitical gatherings are permitted on campus.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There are no known impediments to religious expression. There is no dominant religion, and no faith is officially favored by the Government. The open practice of religion is permitted, and there are no restrictions on religious ceremonies or teaching.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government exercises minimal control over domestic travel but has increased internal security roadblocks for identity and customs checks. Persons stopped at such roadblocks are frequently harassed and "fined" for one minor infraction or another. In 1989, at one checkpoint in Abidjan, security forces slapped an American citizen and beat her French citizen husband without cause other than perceived verbal insolence. The army subsequently initiated an inquiry and suspended the corporal in charge of the patrol pending the inquiry's findings.

Although Professor Kokora initially had some problems obtaining a passport, Ivorians normally can travel abroad and emigrate freely. Ivorians have the right of voluntary repatriation. There are no known cases of revocation of citizenship.

Cote d'Ivoire's refugee and asylum practices are liberal. The country has resettled or granted safe haven to many refugees from many different countries. In 1989 approximately 800 refugees, mostly Africans from neighboring countries, entered the country. While in Cote d'Ivoire, refugees receive 1-year, renewable resident visas for their first 5 years in the country, after which they may apply for permanent residence. Cote d'Ivoire does not take any significant responsibility for the economic and social welfare of refugees, who become the concern of private and international organizations.

While in theory the citizens of Cote d'Ivoire have the right to a multiparty system, in practice they are unable to change the one-party system of government. (The President recently restated his long-held position that Cote d'Ivoire is "not yet ripe" for a multiparty system.) No opposition groups exist openly, and the Government does not allow their formation. Within the PDCI, the President wields power through a 13-member Executive Committee, a 57-member Political Bureau, and a 208-member Steering Committee. Political power is concentrated in the President's hands, and most important decisions are made by the President himself. The 175-seat National Assembly confirms and ratifies legislative initiatives received from the President.

Within this strict one-party system, the Government continues to encourage more open participation in the political process by expanding the size of party institutions and by permitting more party members to compete in legislative, municipal, and local party elections. In 1989 an important mayoral race in San Pedro was hotly, and by all accounts fairly, contested.

The Government is not a party to international human rights accords but has been cooperative in the past towards international inquiries into its human rights practices. It did not respond publicly to Amnesty International's appeals in 1988 on behalf of the Secondary Schoolteachers' Union, and it is thus not known what impact, if any, these appeals may have had on the Government's subsequent positive action.

In 1987 a group of Ivorians formed an internal Human Rights Association. The Government has repeatedly refused to recognize this association and has not allowed local journalists to attend the two press conferences it has held. Under these circumstances the group's ability to investigate and report on alleged human rights violations has been very limited.

There is no overt, official discrimination based on race, sex, religion, language, or social status. Although French is the official language and the language of instruction in the schools, radio and television broadcasts are provided in major local languages. Social and economic mobility are not limited by policy or custom.

Males clearly play the preponderant role overall, although some Ivorian traditional societies accord women considerable political and economic power. Nonetheless, in rural areas tribal customs dictate that menial tasks are performed mostly by women. Although PDCI policy is to encourage full participation by women in social and economic life, there is considerable informal resistance among employers to hiring women, who may be considered "undependable" by virtue of potential pregnancy.

Female genital mutilation (i.e., clitorectomy) is widely practiced in Cote d'Ivoire, particularly among the rural Muslim population in the north and west. The operation, which takes place at puberty as one element of a rite of passage, is generally performed outside modern medical facilities. Clitoral excision is illegal in Cote d'Ivoire, but the Government does not make strong efforts to prevent the practice, and social pressures are sufficiently strong that it persists, particularly in small villages where the tribal chief is the primary decisionmaker. Excision is becoming less frequent as the population becomes better educated.

Violence against women, especially wife beating, is neither widely practiced nor tacitly condoned. However, representatives of womens' organizations state that wife beating does occur, often leading to divorce. Doctors state that they rarely see the victims of domestic violence. A severe social stigma is attached to domestic violence of any kind; neighbors will often intervene in a domestic quarrel to protect an individual who is the object of physical abuse. The courts and police view domestic violence as a family problem unless serious bodily harm is inflicted, in which case criminal proceedings do take place. The Government has no clear-cut policy regarding wife beating beyond the obvious strictures against violence in the Civil Code.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to form unions under the Labor Code of 1964, but almost all unions are organized within a single government-sponsored labor confederation, the General Union of Cote d'Ivoire Workers (UGTCI). Only the University Teachers' Union is independent of the confederation.

The leader of the UGTCI occupies a senior position in the party hierarchy. Union membership is encouraged but not mandatory. The UGTCI is a relatively passive coordination mechanism rather than an active force for worker rights, although it has had some success in improving working conditions and safety standards. The UGTCI represents approximately one-third to one-half of the organizable work force.

The right to strike is protected by statute, but in practice strikes are rarely authorized by the UGTCI. There were no official strikes in 1988, although there were several "work stoppages." For example, workers in a factory near the capital stopped work to protest a management plan to reorder production. In this case, as usually happens, the Government stepped in to mediate. In 1989 reliable sources suggested that some wildcat strikes occurred without receiving publicity or being officially acknowledged.

Generally, the Government negotiates with strikers and resolves at least some of their economic grievances. In the 1987-1988 dispute with the secondary schoolteachers, the Government used a variety of powers to coerce the teachers back to their jobs.

This included arrest and detention of 20 of them and conscription of several men into military service. There were no reports that professional groups experienced persecution or harassment in 1989.

The UGTCI formally prohibits its individual trade unions from forming or maintaining affiliations with international professional organizations in their fields, with the exception of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

In theory, collective bargaining is protected by the Labor Code. In practice, however, only the UGTCI is allowed to engage in collective bargaining with individual companies. The UGTCI has representatives in every major business enterprise, and the UGTCI Secretariat often plays a mediation or conciliation role in relations between labor and management in individual businesses. There are no export processing zones in Cote d'Ivoire, although there is some discussion about creating such zones in the future. Labor legislation, to the extent it is applied, is applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There have been no reports of forced labor in Cote d'Ivoire, and it is prohibited by law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

In most instances, the legal working minimum age of 16 is enforced among government employees and among large multinational companies. However, children often work on family farms, and in Abidjan some children routinely act as vendors of consumer goods in the informal sector. There are also reports of children working in what could be described as sweatshop conditions in small workshops. Many children leave the formal school system at an early age; lower grade education is mandatory but far from universally enforced, particularly in the rural areas.

The Government enforces a comprehensive labor code governing the terms and conditions of service for wage earners and salaried workers and providing for occupational safety and health standards. Those employed in the modern sector are reasonably protected against unjust compensation, excessive hours, and capricious discharge from employment. The standard workweek is 44 hours. Minimum wages vary according to occupation, with the lowest being approximately $110 per month. This does not provide a decent standard of living for a worker and his family. Government medical insurance and retirement programs provide an element of income security for salaried employees in the modern sector. Month-long paid vacations and a substantial severance pay are also guaranteed. There is, however, a large informal sector of the economy, involving both urban and especially rural workers, in which many of these occupational regulations are enforced erratically at best.

DJIBOUTI

Djibouti is a one-party state ruled since independence in 1977 by President Hassan Gouled Aptidon and his People's Assembly for Progress (RPP) which has been the only lawful political party since 1981. Public life in Djibouti is dominated by two ethnic groups, the politically predominant Issa (the tribe of the President) and the largest single tribe, the Afar. The presidency is considered to be reserved for an Issa and the prime ministry for an Afar. Real authority in the Government, civil service, party, and armed forces is in Issa hands.

Djibouti's security services, all under government control, include an army of about 3,500 total personnel (primarily ground forces with small naval and air units), and three national police forces: the National Security Force and the National Police, both under the Ministry of the Interior, and the Gendarmerie, under the Ministry of Defense, which has been involved in human rights violations. France guarantees Djibouti's external security and maintains a force of about 3,800 military and naval personnel in Djibouti.

Djibouti's narrowly based fledgling economy depends almost entirely on services to its (mostly French) 10,000 expatriate residents and operation of the seaport, airport, and Djibouti-Addis Ababa railroad. Although the State is the largest employer, individuals are free to pursue private business interests and to hold personal and real property.

Human rights in Djibouti remained tightly circumscribed in 1989. Areas of concern included: the continued denial of political pluralism, in particular the domination of the Government and single legal political party by the Issa tribe; restrictions on freedoms of speech, press, and assembly; refusal to recognize the refugee rights of Somali nationals fleeing the Somali civil war; incidents of arbitrary arrest, detention, and deportation; and allegations of the use of torture by the security services.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There was no politically motivated killing, but at least one person died while in official custody. This occurred after the authorities, in the city of Tadjourah in June, arrested five persons who protested the method of distribution of emergency relief food aid. A young Afar man died under unexplained circumstances in a hospital while in police custody (see Section 1.c.).

There was no disappearance of persons for political reasons.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

According to credible reports, in 1989 branches of the Gendarmerie in particular carried out brutal interrogations of some detainees (including Somali refugees), which included beatings and other physical abuse, and there were allegations of methodical torture of detainees in isolated cases. The death in a hospital of a young Afar man while under Gendarmerie custody in the spring sparked renewed public allegations of torture by the security authorities. The Government did not comment publicly on this incident.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

By law, a person may be detained no more than 48 hours without an examining magistrate's formal charge. In practice, this deadline is ignored in cases of political interest. An accused has the right to legal counsel, which is provided by the State, if the accused is destitute. An accused person awaiting trial may, by a judge's order, be released on bail or on personal recognizance, or be jailed pending the final verdict.

The Director of a prominent U.S. human rights organization was detained in 1989 for 4 days without charge, while undertaking to ascertain the situation of Somali refugees (see Section 2.d.).

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Djibouti's legal system is a mixture of Djiboutian legislation and executive decrees, French codified law adopted at independence, Shari'a (Islamic religious law), and traditions of the native nomadic peoples. Crimes in urban areas are dealt with according to French-inspired law and judicial practice in the regular courts. Civil actions may be brought under either French-inspired law in the regular courts or in the context of tribal customs in the traditional court. Shari'a courts handle only family matters such as marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance. Decisions of all three courts may be appealed to an appeals court of the same system. Appellate decisions of all three court systems may be appealed to the country's Supreme Court.

The Tunisian national charged with the fatal 1987 terrorist bombing of an outdoor cafe remained in prison awaiting trial at the end of 1989.

A special State Security Court may hear in closed session cases of espionage, treason, and acts threatening the public order or the "interest of the Republic." This Court last convened in 1986.

Proceedings in all courts except the State Security Court are open to the public. The judiciary appears to be generally sympathetic to the government position and susceptible to government influence in cases of political interest.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no reported incidents of arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence in 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are restricted. Those who express public views that are critical of, or perceived as threatening to, the Government face prosecution for common crimes or detention for days or weeks without charge.

DJIBOUTI

Djibouti's radio and television stations and one newspaper (a French-language weekly) are all government owned and operated. All media personnel are civil servants. The Government's avowed policy is to coordinate the dissemination of all information in the interest of national development. The news media do report on social and national development problems within Djibouti, but the Government itself, its policies, and those of neighboring governments are free from criticism. The media largely avoid reporting on domestic politics and ethnic strife in Djibouti, Ethiopia, and Somalia.

The editor-in-chief of the newspaper was removed from office in April 1989 (and later reassigned to another ministry) after publication of articles unflattering to the Government of France. In addition, a journalist was arrested, held for 3 weeks, and subsequently dismissed from his job in connection with the distribution of antigovernment tracts in Tadjourah.

As a rule, the Government does not censor or forbid the importation of books and newspapers, but in 1989 the Government banned importation of the book "The Satanic Verses."

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government effectively bans political protest by selective enforcement of public assembly permit laws and by detention of persons without charge. (Detainees in such cases are usually released with no ill-treatment within a matter of days, though often not within the legally mandated 48-hour period within which charges must be filed.) In 1989 public demonstrations in protest of the death of the Afar held in custody in Tadjourah resulted in the arrests of about 25 persons, of whom 11 were sentenced to 6 months in prison for unauthorized demonstration against the authority of the State.

Permits for political meetings are not issued outside party auspices; it appears that permits for such purposes are sought only rarely. Peaceful assembly and association for nonpolitical purposes are routinely permitted.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Djibouti respects freedom of religion for all faiths. Virtually the entire population is Sunni Muslim. The holy days of Islam are legal holidays. The Government and all private offices observe Islam's month of Ramadan with a shortened workday. However, the Government imposes no sanctions on those who choose to ignore Islamic teachings on diet, alcohol consumption, religious fasting, etc.

The expatriate community supports Roman Catholic, French Protestant, Greek Orthodox, and Ethiopian Orthodox churches. Less than 1 percent of the population belong to these Christian congregations. Foreign clergy and missionaries may perform charitable works, but proselytization is a sensitive issue and, while not illegal, is strongly discouraged.

DJIBOUTI

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Djiboutians travel freely within Djibouti and may live and work where they choose. In 1989 the police increased document checkpoints aimed at controlling crime and especially the influx of illegal aliens and refugees from neighboring Ethiopia and Somalia. Djiboutians leave for, and return from, international travel without restriction or interference. Passports are available to all Djiboutians but are invalid for travel to Israel and South Africa.

Djibouti cooperates with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to assist and protect the approximately 1,500 registered Ethiopian refugees in Djibouti city. As a matter of policy, however, the Government does not recognize as refugees the approximately 30,000 Somali nationals who have fled the Somali civil war.

Although the Government has an informal agreement with the UNHCR that these refugees will not be forcibly repatriated if they do not "cause trouble," the UNHCR in fact has limited ability to extend protection to these individuals. The police routinely conduct sweeps of people thought to be illegal aliens, and some Somali refugees have been deported as a result. Africa Watch's October 1989 report indicates that many refugees may have perished during the forced repatriation in June of 125 people into an isolated area of Somalia. One refugee reported that they were pushed across the border into Somalia without shoes, water, or food. To avoid the heat they walked during the night. At least 4 of his group of 20 reportedly died of thirst during the trek.

Djibouti's treatment of Somali refugees came in for serious criticism from international human rights organizations, particularly over several instances of expulsion of Somali refugees into northern Somalia. Amnesty International (AI) in December 1988 and Africa Watch in December 1989 appealed to the Government to ensure that no refugees would be forced to return to their country of origin or coerced, ill-treated, or arrested if they opposed repatriation.

Djiboutians have neither the right nor the ability peacefully to change their government. The Issa-dominated People's Assembly for Progress (RPP) jealously guards its position as Djibouti's only political party, a status it has enjoyed since the Afar-dominated Djiboutian People's Movement (MPD) was outlawed in 1981. The party chooses the candidates for the presidency and the 65-member National Assembly, a legislative body with no real power. Presidential elections are held every 7 years, and elections for the National Assembly every 5 years. Citizens are encouraged to vote, but their only choice is whether to cast a ballot for or against the party's candidates. The two different ballots must be cast in different boxes, making it obvious who votes against the party.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has been responsive in recent years to inquiries concerning human rights practices, but it has taken no action to resolve the problems addressed by AI's and Africa Watch's appeals on treatment of refugees. There are no private human rights organizations in Djibouti.

The Government speaks out about human rights practices in the Israeli-administered territories and in the Republic of South Africa but is silent about human rights violations in Djibouti and in neighboring Ethiopia and Somalia.

The dominant status of the Issa in the party, the civil service, and the military is maintained by de facto discrimination based on tribe and language against the Afar, and discrimination based on tribe against the Isaak and Gadaboursi.

Women in Djibouti legally possess full civil rights but are traditionally secondary to men in public life, and generally live within the constraints of Shari'a law. Women are active in small trade; and many women are employed in offices and stores, mostly as clerks and secretaries. There are women, though only a few, in the professions (the judiciary, medicine, teaching) and in the military and the police.

According to medical personnel, violence against women--including rape and wife beating--appears to occur relatively infrequently in Djibouti. Moreover, most domestic and community violence is considered a family or tribal matter, is dealt with accordingly, and is rarely brought to the attention of authorities. The police and courts are almost never involved. As a result, it has not become a public or government issue, but the party-affiliated Djiboutian National Women's Union (DNWU) in November 1988 began a government-supported campaign against female circumcision. Progress in the campaign has been slow, however, particularly in the northern districts, where nomadic traditions of genital mutilation of young girls (e.g., clitoral excision and infibulation) are widely practiced.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Labor unions play a minimal role in Djibouti. Workers are free to join or not to join unions as they choose. There are 30 individual labor unions in Djibouti, many of which represent employees of only one private or state-owned corporation. Only a small percentage of Djiboutian workers are union members. The Government exerts control over individual unions through Djibouti's sole government-organized labor central, the General Union of Djiboutian Workers (UGTD). Key labor positions in the UGTD are held by persons sympathetic to management.

Workers are free to strike, but in practice most labor action is limited to short, wildcat protests.

The UGTD is affiliated with Africa's continent-wide official trade union body, the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. Unions are free to maintain relations and exchange programs with unions and labor organizations in other countries. A representative of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations's

African-American Labor Center led a seminar in Djibouti on union administration in February.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The law recognizes labor's right to organize and bargain collectively. In practice, formal collective bargaining virtually does not exist; relations between workers and employers are informal and paternalistic. On questions of wages and health and safety conditions, the Ministry of Labor encourages direct, ad hoc resolution by labor representatives and employers. Either workers or employers may initiate a formal administrative hearing at which the Labor Inspection Service of the Ministry of Labor mediates. Wages are set by employers in consultation with the Ministry of Labor to assure adherence to mandatory minimum wage regulations.

There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Prohibited by law, there is neither forced nor compulsory labor in Djibouti.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum age of 14 years for employment is respected in practice. Children may and do work in family-owned businesses such as restaurants and small shops, including at night. Children are not employed under hazardous conditions.

Minimum wage rates are specified by government regulations and by categories of workers and are enforced by the Ministry of Labor. Increased last in 1976, minimum wages begin at less than $80 a month for unskilled laborers and reach nearly $1,400 a month for "directors" and medical doctors. The minimum wage in most cases does not provide a decent living for a worker and his family. However, many workers also receive housing or housing allowances and transportation and food allowances. Mandatory seniority bonuses range from 4 percent of the worker's basic salary after 2 years of service to a maximum 52 percent after 26 years of service.

The legislated maximum workweek is 40 hours, often spread over a 6-day workweek. Overtime pay regulations apply to additional work. Workers are guaranteed daily and weekly rest periods and paid annual vacations. The Ministry of Labor enforces occupational health and safety, work hours, and wages regulations through inspection, dispute mediation, and administrative judgment by the labor inspection service. These regulations are vigorously enforced.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

The present leadership of Equatorial Guinea took power in 1979, establishing a military Government after overthrowing the tyrannical dictatorship of Francisco Macias Nguema, which had caused the murder or exile of one-third of the country's population. In 1982 the national Constitution was adopted, national and local assemblies were chosen, and the Government was officially declared to be civilian. The Government has been headed since the coup by President Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, who was reelected (as the sole candidate) in August 1989 for a 7-year term. Obiang established in 1986 the country's sole legal political party, the Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea (DPEG). The party, made up mostly of Fang tribe members from Rio Muni, the continental province of the country, controls the Government without viable opposition.

Police and internal security forces are responsible for the preservation of public order. They are augmented by the 300- to 500-man presidential guard unit provided by Morocco. The majority of human rights abuses has historically been caused by the civilian police and internal security forces.

Equatorial Guinea is one of the poorest nations in the world. Most of the population (an estimated 350,000, a figure rejected by the Government of Equatorial Guinea as too low) live by subsistence agriculture, fishing, and hunting, with per capita annual income approximately $300. The small wage economy, based on cocoa, lumber, and coffee, was devastated by the death or exodus of thousands of trained and educated citizens during the Macias years. Recent years have seen the emergence of a very small middle class. The country's recent inclusion in the West Africa franc currency zone has helped create greater fiscal integrity and an improved investment climate. Foreign aid is crucial to development, and Equatorial Guinea receives substantial assistance, with Spain, the previous colonial power, and France as the key donors. In 1989 France, Spain, and the Soviet Union announced that they would forgive portions of the country's debts.

Despite modest progress in the economic sphere and in human rights, political rights of all kinds, including speech and assembly, continued to be tightly restricted in Equatorial Guinea in 1989. Police brutality remained a significant problem, although reports of harsh treatment of illegal foreign workers declined. On occasion the President intervened personally to resolve cases involving human rights, most recently in October when senior police officers were convicted of using excessive force against detainees, including a World Bank contractor. The Government sought advice and technical assistance from Western countries on improving the prisons.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No such killings were reported in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances in 1989.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In its public statements, the Government appeared to make a serious commitment to reduce the use of torture and other cruel treatment in 1989. However, harsh and abusive police interrogation and punishment methods continued in 1989, notably in two well-documented cases of abuse. In February several Equatoguineans who had broken into an expatriate's home were arrested and tortured by police for several days. When they gave the police the names of their accomplices, the latter were subsequently tortured also. The methods of physical torture used against these men included beatings, electric shock, and binding of limbs.

In a second case in September, a British subject on contract with the World Bank accompanied several Equatoguinean friends to the police station when the latter were taken in for disorderly conduct. When he protested to the police about the four female companions being tied up and bludgeoned on the feet, the police commissioner had him tied up and severely beaten in the same manner. When the international community registered strong complaints, the Presidency apologized for the incident. In mid-October, after a public trial, the police officers responsible were convicted and sentenced to several months in prison to be followed by assignment to lower ranking positions. However, at the end of the year, one of the officers was not in prison but rather under house arrest. It was unclear whether the sentence had been carried out against the other officer.

In contrast to the past, there were few reports in 1989 of arbitrary police beatings of illegal Nigerian, Cameroonian, or Ghanaian workers.

Prison conditions continue to be extremely harsh, with basic amenities unavailable. In 1989 the Government expressed an interest in improving jail conditions and in arranging training for police personnel, and expressed willingness to invite international organizations to inspect prison conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Despite constitutional provisions, there was little enforcement of the rights of a person in detention to be charged or released within a certain period of time, to have access to a lawyer, or to be released on bail. Arbitrary arrests by security forces or police have been commonplace, often on spurious charges in order to extort money. Many detainees are held incommunicado.

The number of political detainees held at the end of 1989 was not known.

In 1989 there were no known cases of persons being exiled for political reasons. There are a number of political exiles in Spain. In 1988 Jose Luis Jones Dougan, the leader of an opposition party in exile, returned and was arrested 2 months later. He was subsequently sentenced to a long prison term but apparently in December 1988 was released and permitted to return to Spain. According to Amnesty International's 1989 Report, Dougan's efforts to gain recognition for his political party were apparently considered to constitute a form of treason. Another returned exile, Jose Primo Esono Mica, was arrested and convicted with Dougan in 1988. Esono Mica's 30-year sentence was subsequently reduced to 15 years.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There is a formal court structure, with the Supreme Court at the apex, and also military and customary (tribal) court systems. Tribal laws and customs are honored in the formal court system when not in conflict with national law. The tribunal provided for in the Constitution to decide constitutional issues has never been established. Under the Constitution, military tribunals hear all capital cases (civilian and military). The death penalty has not been carried out for several years. There is no separation between the executive and the judiciary, and Supreme Court justices serve at the pleasure of the President.

There was no progress in 1989 in efforts to reform the legal system. The nation's mixture of traditional (tribal) law, military law, and Spanish rules and procedures combine to produce an inconsistent system of justice. There is no concept of due process, and appellate proceedings are nonexistent; the executive branch acts with little respect or understanding for judicial independence. Laws are frequently enacted by decree without any public announcement, excepting an occasional brief mention on government radio. Defendants who are unable to afford legal counsel stand little chance of acquittal. The fact that few lawyers (approximately 20) in the country depend on their connections to the Government raises questions about the impartiality of the defense their clients might receive. Unless represented by counsel, those arrested in Equatorial Guinea usually have no way of knowing if the offense they have been charged with is bona fide.

The Government in 1989 continued to maintain that it holds no political prisoners. However, several persons, including Esono Mica, remained in prison at the end of 1989.

There were fewer reports in 1989 of arbitrary interference with privacy, including pressures by authorities to join the sole political party and to participate in "spontaneous" government-sanctioned celebrations. Persons deemed suspicious are sometimes placed under surveillance, and there is a general belief that telephone conversations are monitored routinely, although correspondence remained sacrosanct. Search warrants are not normally used, even though they are required by the Constitution.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Open public criticism of the Government is not tolerated. In the past, the press has consisted of sporadic government bulletins. In late 1989, the first regular printing of a newspaper was started, initiated by the Spanish Government. While criticism of the Government did not appear in the paper, it highlighted the need for a more open forum, one less focused on government statements.

Both the television and radio stations are government entities, whose broadcasting is almost solely government propaganda. Nevertheless, entertainment programming, including relatively recent movies and American television shows dubbed in Spanish, appeared in 1989. There was discussion early in the year of the Government establishing a film censorship board to reduce the number of violent movies from the West being shown. Radio propaganda was somewhat reduced in 1989 to accommodate African and American pop music. The Government strictly controls the publication, importation, and distribution of articles critical of the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Despite constitutional provisions guaranteeing these freedoms, the Government's firm position is that opposition political organizations and assemblies will not be tolerated. Private nonpolitical groups, such as professional organizations, churches, and sports groups require government approval.

c. Freedom of Religion

With one exception, freedom of religion was generally respected. Jehovah's Witnesses, originally banned from the country in 1985, and harassed in 1986 and 1987, are still prohibited. Foreign clergy and missionaries continue to play an active role in educational development, and all denominations are allowed to participate in charitable as well as religious activities. Christianity, mainly Catholicism, is the predominant religion. In general, active proselytizing by Protestant denominations is discouraged, but conversions are permitted.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There were no explicit restrictions on travel within the country. There are restrictions on travel abroad, including lengthy delays in obtaining passports. Many Equatoguineans leave the country without formal documentation for both economic and political reasons. A large number reside in Spain, France, Cameroon, and Gabon. While third-country African workers sometimes must resort to bribery to obtain legal registration, even the formerly enslaved Nigerians enjoyed virtual freedom to work and travel in 1989. With regard to repatriation, President Obiang in 1989 told the Equatoguinean expatriate community, many of whom had voiced fear of repression, that they were welcome to return to the country without any restrictions. Few returned in 1989 since they enjoy a higher standard of living abroad than they would in Equatorial Guinea. Also, the treatment of several political exiles in 1988 underscored the Government's determination to prevent any political role for persons with views in opposition to the Government's (see Section 1.d.).

The people of Equatorial Guinea do not have the right to change their government by democratic means. President Obiang was reelected President in 1989 as the sole legal candidate. Cristino Seriche Bioko, a Bubi, has held the office of Prime Minister since 1982. Following the recent presidential elections, Seriche was given the responsibility for coordinating the administration of about half the government ministries. Only members of the DPEG may hold public office, and the party controls the selection of all candidates. It is uncertain whether all adults must pay party dues; in 1989 it appeared that only government employees and employees of large business establishments, i.e., those in the wage economy, must do so.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In 1989 the Government showed greater willingness to interact with international human rights organizations. The Government publicly expressed the need to end human rights abuses. As far as is known, the Government, after permitting an Amnesty International (AI) mission to visit in 1988, did not respond to AI's memorandum of November 1988 concerning unfair military trials.

Although the law calls for equal treatment for all, tribal groups are not always granted the same rights and privileges. The Fang clans, of which President Obiang is a member, dominate all aspects of government, the military, and social life. Discrimination against the Bubi, Fernandino, and Playero clans is consistent, whether in the granting of political office or the approval of academic scholarships.

Women are confined largely to traditional roles, especially in agriculture. A large majority of the population is polygynous, and this has also contributed to the secondary status in society given to women. Educational opportunities are extremely limited for women. According to doctors in hospitals, violence against women is not widespread, and abuse of children is equally rare. The Government has not addressed violence as an issue; it looks to the Ministry for the Promotion of Women to advance the interests of women in Equatoguinean society. According to the medical community, female circumcision is not practiced in Equatorial Guinea.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Equatoguineans do not have the right of free association. In the small wage economy, no labor organizations exist, although there are a few cooperatives with limited power. Strikes are prohibited by law. Equatorial Guinea has been a member of the International Labor Organization since 1981 but has ratified neither Convention 87 on Freedom of Association nor Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Equatorial Guinea has no legislation regarding these rights, and there is no evidence of collective bargaining by any group. There are no export processing or free trade zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor and slavery are prohibited by law. During 1989 no cases of forced or compulsory labor were reported. While work roundups used to be routinely organized against third-country Africans, forced labor of this type was restricted in 1989.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum age for employment is 16, but there is no enforcement of this law. As in most of Africa, children at a much earlier age assist families with traditional agricultural production and sales.

There is only a small industrial sector in the country. Most salaried employment is provided by the Government, construction companies, businesses providing retail goods and services, and the plantation agricultural sector. In 1989 Equatorial Guinea had a statutory minimum wage of approximately $35 per month, which was not adequate to provide a decent living for a worker and family. The average monthly wage was about $70 for the small percentage of the population that had regular salaried employment, most of whom were required to supplement this income with other income or farming in order to provide a decent living for themselves and their families. By law, working conditions included a maximum 48 hours workweek with a full day of rest each week plus regularly scheduled national holidays. Occupational health and safety standards do not exist. There was no effective monitoring of work hours or labor conditions outside the Government.

ETHIOPIA

The People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia is a self-proclaimed Marxist state headed by President Mengistu Haile-Mariam, who came to power in 1977 following political infighting for leadership of the 1974 revolution which unseated Emperor Haile Selassie. A new Constitution in 1987 created new organs of government: a Council of State, a Council of Ministers, and a Parliament (the Shengo). The most powerful institution in the country, however, is the Marxist-Leninist Workers' Party of Ethiopia (WPE). Despite the trappings of representative government, power remains in the hands of President Mengistu, who is Chief of State, General Secretary of the WPE, and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. Ethiopia is in a state of civil war, with the regime seriously challenged by armed, active insurgencies which during 1989 moved beyond regional borders.

Ethiopia's armed forces are the largest in sub-Saharan Africa, numbering between 250,000 and 275,000. Cuban troops withdrew in September after a 12-year presence. An extensive security apparatus under the Ministry of Internal Affairs attempts to control the population through a combination of surveillance and informers. The Government justifies these security measures and the size of its defense expenditures (estimated at 60 percent of the government budget) on the basis of external threats and internal insurrections. Military setbacks in 1988 and 1989 compelled the Government to seek diplomatic rapprochement with its neighbors and to try to negotiate settlements with some internal opponents, most notably with the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF), through the good offices of former U.S. President Carter, and with the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), under Italian auspices.

The Ethiopian economy is based on agriculture, which contributes 45 percent to the gross national product and more than 80 percent of exports and employs 85 percent of the population. Although the Government promotes the formation of collectives and cooperatives, peasant farms still account for about 93 percent of crop production, state farms for about 6 percent, and producers' cooperatives 1 percent. The major agricultural export crop is coffee, providing 65 to 75 percent of foreign exchange earnings. In 1988 the controversial forced "resettlement" program of moving people vast distances to unpopulated areas was suspended for lack of funds, but the mandatory "villagization" program to move families into villages in the same area continued in 1989, with no reports of accompanying violence. Periodic drought and famine, the Government's war effort, and Socialist economic policies have made Ethiopia the world's poorest country, according to the World Bank.

In 1989 the overall human rights situation in Ethiopia remained generally deplorable. Major concerns included: widespread abuses such as summary executions by all parties to Ethiopia's civil strife; the use of torture as an accepted practice in interrogation; arbitrary, incommunicado detentions; the lack of fair public trials; serious restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, and the right of citizens to change their government; and limitations on women's and worker rights. In May there was a coup attempt by the military leaders in which atrocities were committed on both sides. However, in September the Government announced the release of remaining members of the royal family and 84 other political prisoners. The Government has shown new tolerance of religious organizations and activities, including unacknowledged emigration of Ethiopian Jews as part of improved relations with Israel. While emigration remains restricted, the Government issued passports in unprecedented numbers. It allowed relief groups relative freedom in pursuing humanitarian concerns.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The May coup attempt resulted directly from military disenchantment with the regime and followed the loss of the Tigray region to insurgents in February. The attempted coup resulted in the executions of an unknown number of generals--one estimate stated 38 senior officers were executed--and other senior military officials and in the imprisonment of nearly 200 others. Atrocities occurred on both sides, with coup plotters murdering the Minister of Defense, and loyalists killing rebellious generals. In December the trial of the 14 most senior officers arrested in the aftermath of the coup attempt began.

As a consequence of military setbacks in Tigray, the Government resorted to the forced conscription of youths in their early teens in April and May, which fed public discontent at the time of the coup. After new military reverses in the autumn, the Government launched a particularly brutal conscription campaign in November. Some youths who resisted conscription were shot. Reports also surfaced in 1989 that guards used lethal force against children demonstrating at a government-run orphanage in November 1988, resulting in four deaths. The guards responsible for the deaths were arrested and charged. The results of this case remain unknown.

Security forces used excessive force following the coup attempt to quash student demonstrations, reportedly killing two students (see Section 2.b.).

There were no reports during 1989 of politically motivated disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The 1987 Constitution notably omits a passage from the 1955 constitution prohibiting cruel and inhuman punishment. Torture has been used against members of most opposition groups, including the EPLF, the TPLF, and the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF).

Political prisoners are initially taken to central investigation centers operated by the Ministry of Internal Affairs, such as the central prison and the notorious "Third Police Station" in Addis Ababa or the Mariam Gimki Center in Asmara. Interrogation is often combined with physical abuse, especially for those suspected of affiliation with an opposition or insurgent group. Common methods of torture include beating on the soles of the feet, suspension from a rope in a contorted position, death threats, mock executions, sleep deprivation, and submergence to the point of unconsciousness in tanks of water.

Following the May coup attempt, Addis Ababa's political detention centers were reportedly the sites of torture, as was the basement of the Menelik (or Grand) Palace. Ethiopian television showed film footage of the mutilated body of one of the coup plotters. Additionally, both sides desecrated the corpses of generals involved in the attempt. Coup sympathizers reportedly exhumed the body of the murdered Minister of Defense, dismembered it, and left the remains in a ditch. On the other side, loyalists in northern Ethiopia beheaded the corpse of General Demissie Bulto (a coup sympathizer and former commander of the Second Army) and paraded the head through the streets of Asmara.

The 1987 Constitution provides for arraignment in court within 48 hours, arrest warrants, a fair trial, protection against self-incrimination, and the right to counsel; however, Ethiopians suspected of antigovernment actions or sentiments continue to be subject to arrest or detention by the police without charge or judicial review. In politically sensitive arrests, the Government generally prefers to operate in secret, taking the suspect from home at night.

Reports of arrests and detentions following the May coup attempt attest to the fact that these practices continued in 1989. Additionally, family members of some alleged coup participants were arrested in broad daylight in a surprise move by authorities reacting to public rumors that arrests would only happen at night. Treatment of officers arrested in the coup attempt reportedly improved substantially by the end of 1989.

On September 2, the Government released 87 prominent political prisoners, some of whom had "disappeared" in previous years. These prisoners were part of a larger amnesty on the eve of the Ethiopian New Year. In addition to the release of three grandsons of former Emperor Haile Selassie, the release included former Ambassador to Canada and Permanent U.N. Representative Berhanu Dinka, who "disappeared" in 1986, and long-missing members of political movements who fell out of favor with the Government during the turbulent late 1970's.

In the wake of the amnesty, Ethiopia's remaining political detainees are estimated at between 400 and 500. At least 17 members of the EPLF, TPLF, OLF, and other groups are held in two prisons in the Addis Ababa area. As in the past, sketchy information, especially as regards the situation in northern Ethiopia, prevents accurate estimates of the total number of opposition group members remaining in prison.

A state of emergency declared in 1988 remains in effect in Eritrea and Tigray. Under it, security forces are empowered to stop, detain, and hold indefinitely without court or prosecutor's warrant, any person who has violated or is suspected of having violated the special emergency decree or who in any manner disturbs law and order within the emergency areas.

An unspecified number of refugees from the Somali camps at Aware in eastern Ethiopia were arrested for selling food ration coupons. At year's end, they were being held without trial by local Ethiopian authorities.

In Eritrea, 60 EPLF members took advantage of a government amnesty offer and surrendered for reeducation and reintegration into society. Voluntary repatriation, however, has not greatly reduced the number of Ethiopians who remain in exile, unable to return to Ethiopia for fear of persecution. As many as 1 million Ethiopians are believed to have taken up refuge in neighboring countries.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Ethiopia's judicial system remains bifurcated in practice if not in theory. While nonpolitical civil and criminal offenders are usually granted fair public trial, military and political cases are subject to official manipulation and executive meddling. The definition of what constitutes a "political" case is sometimes farfetched and usually relates to the Government's preoccupation with internal security.

The Supreme Court is at the apex of the judicial system. Other judicial bodies include a newly announced Supreme Court Council, a Worker's Control Committee, and military courts in contested areas. Kebeles (urban neighborhood organizations controlled by the WPE) have since the 1974 revolution been the primary local units of judicial decisionmaking and law enforcement. Their work has been marked by arbitrariness and a failure to follow procedures that would ensure the right to a fair trial supposedly guaranteed by the 1987 Constitution.

When the Ministry of Internal Affairs allows political trials to take place, they are almost always held in secret, with only the verdict (if even that) publicly announced. Even prisoners cleared of charges or whose terms have been completed may not be promptly released from prison. Some of the most senior officers detained after the coup attempt were arraigned in December before a military tribunal in public session attended by local and foreign journalists. While this does not by itself guarantee a fair trial, it is at least less arbitrary than prior practices.

The 1987 Constitution provides for the "inviolability of the house" and protects against unlawful entry into private homes. In practice, warrants are not used for searches of offices or private homes. In Eritrea and other war-torn areas the state of emergency affords the armed forces great latitude in searching or even confiscating suspected premises.

In the aftermath of the attempted coup in May, some families of suspected coup plotters were subjected to searches of their homes and seizure of their property, even though the targeted suspect may have already been in custody.

Surveillance of persons, both visual and electronic, is not subject to legal restraints. All mail is subject to government monitoring. Ethiopian citizens can be called in at any time for questioning by authorities and for mandatory kebele meetings, political rallies, or marches. Refusal to appear for any of the events may result in imprisonment without hearing.

ETHIOPIA

Local kebele association officials monitor urban Ethiopians, whereas peasant association leaders perform the same function in the countryside. These officials monitor visitors, items brought in and out of houses, any meetings, and adherence to local curfews. The scope of such surveillance and petty interference in the private lives of Ethiopian citizens depends heavily on the makeup of the kebele and its leadership.

There are some indications that kebele control has diminished somewhat over the last year as a result of the general decline in the authority of the Government among many Ethiopians. The Government has also taken some steps to remove unpopular measures by: reducing pressure to join the WPE; no longer requiring party uniforms to be worn in government offices; and lifting the ban on Sunday driving.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

The major events influencing human rights in Ethiopia during 1989 were fighting in the northern parts of the country during the spring and fall, and the coup attempt against President Mengistu in May. Ethiopia's civil war, now in its 28th year, continues to dominate the decisions of a government pursuing its self-preservation at all costs. Both the Government and the various insurgent movements have practiced forced conscription, imprisonment without recourse, violence against civilian populations, torture, and extrajudicial killing. These abuses have taken place during a civil war and under a declared state of emergency in the northern part of the country.

Major insurgent groups include the EPLF, active in Eritrea; the TPLF, active in Gonder, Shewa, Tigray, and Welo; the OLF, active in southeastern and western Ethiopia; the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Party (EPRP), active in areas of Gonder and Mekedel; and a new umbrella group calling itself the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), comprising the TPLF and its ally, the Ethiopian People's Democratic Movement (EPDM). There are another half-dozen minor insurgent groups.

Insurgent forces made major advances in 1989 with the capture of Tigray and lightning thrusts south within 70 miles of Addis Ababa. According to press reports, the rebels claimed to have killed, wounded, or captured an estimated 30,000 to 40,000 government soldiers and seized millions of dollars worth of military equipment during an autumn campaign. Also, in September the Air Force recommenced the terror bombing of Tigrayan towns on crowded market days. When government forces bombed Mekele, the capital of Tigray, school children were among the casualties.

The poor showing of government forces in 1989 could be traced to poor morale, use of forced conscription, and to the loss of over 200 military officers in the May coup attempt. Eyewitnesses reported that government security forces killed and wounded teenagers resisting conscription. Ethiopian authorities also reportedly tried to impress a number of Somali Isaak refugees from refugee camps close to the Somali border; however, the refugees were released after they had been positively identified as Somalis by camp personnel. Recent Ethiopian returnees from Somalia were explicitly exempted from conscription by the Government.

ETHIOPIA

During 1989 there were credible reports that all major parties to Ethiopia's civil war engaged in abduction, imprisonment without trial, torture, and summary execution of internal and external opponents. Factional disputes within and between insurgent groups were particularly violent, and included assassination of leaders. There are credible reports that the TPLF has forcibly conscripted teenagers and others as porters and support workers. In some areas the EPLF, the TPLF, and the OLF abducted local officials. There are numerous, albeit unconfirmed, accounts from TPLF-controlled areas of closed churches, destroyed clinics and schools, and destruction of basic infrastructure by the insurgents.

Little information is available on the treatment of prisoners of war (POW's). One insurgent group, the TPLF, as a matter of practice releases ordinary soldiers upon capture, after disarming them and confiscating their footwear. The rationale for this action by the TPLF appears both humane (as a guerrilla group they cannot care for large numbers of POW's) and tactical, since it encourages some GPDRE units to surrender. On December 31, the EPLF announced plans to release 10,000 POW's under its control.

Both the Government and the insurgents have seized upon the desperate need for food relief in 1989/90 as a political issue. Deliberately or not, the Government has underestimated the need for food relief in some insurgent-controlled areas. The EPLF and TPLF initially insisted on complete control over food distribution in areas held by them. By the end of 1989, however, there appeared to be some flexibility on all sides.

Relief organizations and volunteer groups were allowed relative freedom in pursuing their humanitarian activities in all areas controlled by the Government. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), however, has been denied access to Eritrea following a dispute with the Government. The TPLF and EPLF have allowed these relief groups only limited access into areas under their control. There were no reported attacks on relief workers during 1989 by either government or rebel forces, although Ethiopian staff members were killed in riots at refugee camps in southwestern Ethiopia.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is no freedom of speech or press in Ethiopia. The Government closely monitors the pronouncements of public officials, academicians, and clergy. Some instructors and professors in secondary schools and at the university have resisted the politicization of education. Academic freedom, although seriously circumscribed, still finds limited expression at the university.

The Government owns and operates all information media and exercises censorship through editorial boards and the Ministry of Information. Expression of unauthorized political opinions or of views at variance with the official government line can result in imprisonment. Political, economic, and social policies are formulated at the top levels of the government-controlled media and government-organized citizen groups.

Books and magazines are confiscated if deemed to contain sentiments opposed to the regime. Foreign magazines and newspapers are not readily available since foreign exchange is not granted to purchase them. Foreign radio broadcasts and those of opposition groups are widely listened to by Ethiopians.

During the search for the late U.S. Representative Mickey Leland and his party, the local press gave relatively open, accurate, and extensive coverage of the operation, and the Government allowed the foreign press corps freely to enter the country and to file reports without interference.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Notwithstanding constitutional provisions, assembly of any sort not previously approved by the Government is forbidden. In contrast, attendance at government-sponsored rallies, meetings, and parades is frequently mandatory and enforced by a wide range of sanctions. However, whereas frequent or close association with foreigners in the past may have resulted in government harassment and occasional detention, this is generally no longer the case. Trade and professional associations, such as the Rotary and Lions Clubs, are allowed to operate, although their membership and activities are monitored by the Government.

In late May, students at Addis Ababa University attempted several demonstrations against the Government in the wake of the attempted coup. However, internal security forces, including special commandos, used excessive force to beat back the students before actual demonstrations began, reportedly killing 2 students and arresting at least 100. Similar incidents occurred at the local commercial and technical schools. Additional reports indicate the police broke up a student demonstration in Addis Ababa's Revolution Square by firing warning shots into the air. No one was killed, injured, or arrested on that occasion.

Ethiopian nationalism and traditional values, including religion, are an integral part of the national culture. Government policy no longer ignores or tries to suppress religion. In fact, religion is now being factored into aspects of national planning. This planning, though, extends to the selection of religious leaders sympathetic to party policy. The Government nationalized most church property (thought to include as much as 30 percent of all land holdings in Ethiopia at the time) when it took power in 1974, and the Ethiopian Orthodox Church reportedly is dependent on annual government compensation payments to cover clerical salaries.

The Government's new attitude toward religion has resulted in increased respect for freedom of worship and proselytism for the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and Islam as provided in the 1987 Constitution. The Government continues to monitor religious practice and any teaching which might be contrary to its political views.

Party members are officially prohibited from worshipping, but this ban is not enforced. According to press reports, kebele officials often discourage church attendance, generally by scheduling mandatory meetings on Sunday mornings. The Government expunges reference to any deity from official statements and publications, television programs, and films, although government-controlled media still give routine coverage to church affairs and religious festivals. Ethiopian Orthodox church and Islamic holidays are recognized by the Government, and officials of both religions are allowed to exercise jurisdiction over civil matters such as marriage.

Foreign Protestant evangelical organizations have experienced a general trend of greater tolerance from central and local government officials over the last 3 years. Local government officials allowed a number of churches that had been closed to reopen. The September 2 amnesty included the release of the leaders of the Ethiopian Evangelical Mekane Yesus Church, some of whom were arrested over 5 years ago. The Government issues permits to foreign missionaries to enter and work in Ethiopia in limited numbers, although ostensibly as development specialists, not as missionaries. The Jehovah's Witnesses, however, remain banned.

Ethiopia's small Jewish population, known as Beta Israel or "Falasha" (a word meaning immigrant or outsider), lives in Gonder and Tigray, areas often associated with recurring insurgent activity. There have been no reports this year of atrocities or discrimination toward Ethiopian Jewry at the hands of Ethiopian authorities. Incidents of murder and thievery reported in late 1988 were attributed to long-running social conflicts in which land disputes and criminal activity are seen as motivating factors; those Ethiopian Jews who were victims were not attacked primarily because of their religious beliefs. The Government permits foreign-sourced development assistance directed at Jewish areas, including assistance used for the construction of synagogues. The burning of a synagogue near Gonder city in November resulted from a fight between two Jewish communities over the location of a new synagogue.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within Ethiopia increased markedly during 1989. While insurgent-held areas in Tigray remain inaccessible to both Ethiopians and foreigners, the Government allowed resumption of travel by citizens between Addis Ababa and Asmara, the capital of Eritrea. The Government's controversial internal resettlement program remained suspended for lack of funding. Reports indicate that some of those previously resettled have been trickling back to their original home areas.

The Government's mandatory villagization campaign, which collects scattered rural farmers into newly created villages, continued in 1989. It is sanctioned under the 1987 Constitution, which states that "the state shall encourage the scattered rural population to aggregate in order to change their backward living conditions and to enable them to lead a better life." The Government has announced plans that call for 50 percent of the rural population to be moved into villages by 1993. Unlike in prior years, there were no reports during 1989 of violence associated with villagization.

Travel abroad by Ethiopians was much freer in 1989 than in prior years, as the Government began issuing passports in unprecedented numbers. However, the processing of passport applications remains long and laborious. Exit visas must be used within 15 days of issue, and renewal can be difficult.

ETHIOPIA

Foreigners wishing to travel within Ethiopia must still obtain travel permits, and access to areas of conflict remains restricted. For diplomats, however, the process of obtaining permits to travel to areas not in conflict has become largely a formality. During 1989, only one permit request was denied to U.S. Embassy personnel.

Emigration remains highly restricted, though marriage to or adoption by foreign nationals is allowed. The Ethiopian Government responded sharply to the U.S. Government's 1989 immigrant visa lottery. Ethiopian postal authorities reportedly destroyed 100,000 applications mailed by those wanting to participate in the program. People coming to the Embassy for applications were beaten back by police at the Embassy's gates.

Illegal emigration remains punishable by imprisonment or, in exceptional cases, by death. Nonetheless, considerable illegal emigration occurs either under the subterfuge of travel abroad for business or to visit relatives, or by overland treks and surreptitious crossing of borders.

The Government recognizes the right of voluntary repatriation, and its proclamation of amnesty for Ethiopians living abroad (numbering more than 1 million) remains in effect. Most of these are in neighboring countries, mainly in refugee camps. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) repatriation programs have successfully repatriated approximately 10,000 Ethiopians from Djibouti, Somalia, and Sudan since 1986. As of 1989, these official and spontaneous returnees came under the purview of a new tripartite commission composed of the Ethiopian and Somali Governments and the UNHCR.

There are no reports that returnees were mistreated or discriminated against upon their return. Ethiopian refugees in northern Somalia also may have returned to Ethiopia in an effort to flee civil strife in that country.

Instability in neighboring countries has stimulated a large-scale refugee movement into Ethiopia, with almost 800,000 entering the country--over 450,000 from Sudan and 350,000 from Somalia. Limited access to refugee camps by the international community has made it possible to monitor the level of relief and protection provided, although the Government has denied UNHCR permission to stay in the camps overnight.

There have been no reports that the Government has systematically denied aid to refugees in Ethiopia. Also, there were no reports of forcible repatriation. Violence at Somali refugee camps during July and early August was mostly among refugees themselves, although an Ethiopian guard was killed. Ethiopian staff members were killed during uprisings at Sudanese refugee camps at Fugnido and Itang during late September, which resulted from tribal tension between local Anuak people and Dinka and Nuer refugees.

Citizens of Ethiopia are not free to change their government. The 1987 Constitution institutionalizes all power in the WPE, the President, his advisers, and the 23-member Council of State. Political and economic policies are still dictated to the populace with little opportunity for public debate.

The WPE and its mass organizations purport to offer Ethiopian citizens a means of participation in government, but their real role is to ensure adherence to Marxist-Leninist principles. Official pressure on higher-level government officials to join the WPE has slackened in recent years. Many members of the bureaucracy have declined party membership without an adverse effect on their careers. Kebeles, the primary party/government control mechanisms at the local level, control housing allocation, basic food rationing, political indoctrination, and implementation of other government policies, such as registration and selection of youths for national military service.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government resists attempts by international and nongovernmental organizations to investigate human rights cases. It did not respond to Amnesty International's call in 1988 for an impartial investigation into reports of extrajudicial killings and lengthy and arbitrary detentions, particularly in Eritrea and Tigray. Ethiopian authorities did respond positively in 1989 to an international human rights organization's request for a list of the 87 political prisoners covered by the September 2 amnesty. There is no governmental or private body to investigate alleged human rights violations. Ethiopia is not a signatory to any of the United Nations human rights documents or the African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights.

The Constitution provides for the equality of all Ethiopians irrespective of nationality, sex, religion, occupation, social or other status. The highest government echelons are no longer dominated by the Amhara ethnic group but include many Oromos and a few Eritreans and Tigrayans. However, almost all senior government and political figures are of Christian origin, although the population is approximately 50 percent Muslim.

American visitors to areas inhabited by Ethiopian Jews report the existence of some economic discrimination. The general poverty of the Jews has been aggravated by the Government's villagization campaign, which is true of other farmers forced to relocate from their traditional farming areas.

The rights of women are protected and women are promised additional government support by the Constitution. However, sex discrimination persists in Ethiopia's tradition-bound culture. Various U.N. studies note cultural and traditional biases, marriages imposed at a very young age, hard and time-consuming labor, inadequate employment opportunities, and below-average wages in urban areas.

Village leadership is invariably male, and all clergy are male. However, women in the principal Ethiopian cultures (Oromo, Amhara, Eritrean, and Tigray) enjoy certain economic rights equal to those of men. They may inherit, sell or buy property, and engage in business. In some rural areas, women have a subservient status within the home, and child marriages remain common, despite opposition by the Government.

Cultural attitudes about violence against women have improved since the 1974 revolution. While wife beating continues to be a problem, it is no longer as common as it once was. An Ethiopian woman does have redress to police protection if she is subjected to beatings by her husband, but the police are sometimes slow to respond. Women have successfully adjudicated many domestic violence cases in kebele courts, with offending husbands sometimes placed in kebele detention centers.

Long established practices, such as female genital mutilation (circumcision), remain common among Ethiopian Orthodox Christian and Muslim families. The Ministry of Health, religious organizations, the Revolutionary Women's Association (created in 1980 with the goal of improving the status of women), and nongovernmental organizations have engaged in an education and health campaign at the village level to sensitize the populace against female circumcision, early marriage, and harmful nutritional practices. A central tenet of this campaign is that female circumcision is itself an act of violence against women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

There is no independent labor movement in Ethiopia. The labor force is organized into two umbrella mass organizations under the control of the only legal political party. The Government sees its own interests and those of working people as identical and considers a single trade union structure necessary to build a developed, Socialist society. The right to strike is not recognized, and strikes are rare.

The Ethiopian Trade Union (ETU) embraces industrial and urban workers with a combined membership of 318,000 (1988). Many of ETU's top leaders have been trained in Eastern Europe, and as an organization the ETU seeks to implement government policy, expand control over the workplace, and prevent work stoppages. The ETU is a member of Africa's continent-wide official trade union body, the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, and is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

Rural workers are organized under the Ethiopian Peasants' Association (EPA), which has 5.7 million members. The EPA is an umbrella organization of some 20,000 smaller peasants' associations, and in addition to being an implement of government control, promotes literacy and advances agricultural techniques. In some areas the local peasants' associations have tax collection and militia responsibilities.

Despite guarantees on the freedom of association in the 1987 Constitution (Article 47), farmers and workers are not permitted to organize outside the two recognized mass organizations. Ethiopia has consistently been criticized by the International Labor Organization (ILO) Governing Board for failure to observe ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, which Ethiopia has ratified.

In 1989 the ILO's Committee of Experts noted that a draft labor code is being drawn up and expressed the hope that it would correct existing defects such as the imposition of a single trade union system, the legal obligation of trade unions and peasants' associations to disseminate among workers the Government's development plans and Marxist-Leninist theories, the right of the ETU to affiliate with international organizations, restrictions on the right to strike, and nonrecognition of trade union rights for public servants and domestic personnel.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

In practice, collective bargaining does not exist. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Slavery was officially abolished in Ethiopia in 1942, but the legal code does not otherwise address the issue of forced or compulsory labor. In Socialist Ethiopia, citizens are sometimes called on to perform certain civic obligations, including "volunteer" assistance in community work projects such as road-building and emergency repair. In factories, workers are also expected to "volunteer" extra hours at no pay, so production quotas can be met.

In 1989 the expanding civil conflict led to an often violent forced conscription of teenage youths. Beginning in April, there were eyewitness accounts of trucks picking up youths as young as 13 from Addis Ababa's market area. The latest round up of teenagers in Addis Ababa occurred in November. Forced conscription was also reported in other areas of the country. The young conscripts were often under armed guard and, by some accounts, sometimes chained together to prevent their escape. Quotas were established for each of Addis Ababa's kebeles.

The contract employment of children under the age of 14 is prohibited in Ethiopia. This restriction appears to be respected in factories, shops, and among domestic workers, although children under 14 are frequently seen as street vendors or beggars.

Current working conditions vary according to occupation and region, but hours are generally long, conditions poor, and wages low. Given high unemployment, there is pressure for existing jobs in the modern economy. The minimum wage in Ethiopia is 93 cents per day. Even in a country with the low per capita GDP of $106, such a low minimum wage is not sufficient to provide a decent standard of living for an urban worker and family. On the other hand, only unskilled day laborers usually receive such a low wage.

Fringe benefits not required by law (transportation, meals, shelter) raise the effective minimum wage. In some corporations, fringe benefits reportedly account for almost half of the payroll. Low-paid workers often supplement their income by holding multiple jobs, receiving help from the extended family, and engaging in subsistence farming. Government wages have been frozen for 15 years. Some internal government surveys reveal that as many as two of every five salaried government workers earn less than what is required to purchase a typical Ethiopian "grocery basket."

ETHIOPIA

The law establishes 8-hour workdays and 48-hour workweeks. The maximum legal workweek is generally respected in practice, but as noted there is much uncompensated "volunteer" labor to meet factory or office quotas. Health and safety codes for the workplace are rudimentary and remain unenforced. Compensation for occupational injuries and disabilities is mandatory.

GABON

President Omar Bongo, the head of Gabon's sole political party, the Democratic Party of Gabon (PDG), has been reelected three times in uncontested elections, most recently in November 1986. A 1983 constitutional amendment provides that only the President-Founder of the party (President Bongo) may be a candidate for president. Presidential power is extensive but in practice is somewhat limited by a complex governmental structure, which includes a 42-member Cabinet headed by the Prime Minister. The 120-member National Assembly has no real power. All major ethnic groups and regions are represented in the Government, Political Bureau, and Central Committee of the party.

The armed forces are comprised of approximately 4,000 army, navy, and air force personnel. Internal security is shared by the Gendarmerie, a paramilitary force of 2,700, and the National Police, consisting of 2,000 troops, which works with the Gendarmerie to maintain law and order in Libreville, Port Gentil, and other provincial capitals. Uncontrolled immigration is of particular concern. Security forces monitor the presence and activities of thousands of illegal aliens and occasionally conduct campaigns to find and deport them.

Gabon's relatively high per capita income ($3,200 in 1989) is based on oil revenues, but it belies the underdeveloped nature of the country and its economy. Although endowed with petroleum, manganese, uranium, and vast timber resources, Gabon has had limited agricultural and industrial development and must import most of its food and manufactured goods. Rain forest covers 85 percent of the country, and approximately two-thirds of the populace lives in remote areas. The TransGabon railroad, completed in 1986, now connects the coastal capital of Libreville to Franceville in the southeast interior. Due to the precipitous fall in revenue from oil exports in recent years, the Government has imposed austerity measures to meet World Bank and International Monetary Fund program criteria. A massive onshore oil field discovered in southern Gabon should boost petroleum output by 50 percent by 1990.

Human rights continued to be tightly restricted in 1989. Principal concerns included mistreatment of prisoners and detainees (there continued to be allegations of mistreatment of Equatorial Guineans held as illegal aliens by the security forces), lack of procedural safeguards in State Security Court trials, and restrictions on freedoms of speech, press, and assembly.

There were no known political killings or summary executions in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of abductions or disappearances ascribed to government security forces or any other group.

GABON

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Gabonese law and security enforcement officials use beatings as part of the interrogation process. Two persons arrested in conjunction with a foiled coup plot in late 1989 subsequently died while in custody. According to the Government, one died from malaria and the other from a combination of diabetes and hypertension. No independent medical confirmation of the causes of death had been made available by year's end.

Prison conditions are harsh, and the main prison, Central Prison, has poor hygiene, inadequate medical facilities, and insufficient food. No specific instances of mistreatment of prisoners came to light in 1989, but Amnesty International's (AI) 1988 Report stated that a number of criminal suspects and alleged illegal aliens had been beaten and tortured at Central Prison in Libreville in 1987.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Gabonese law protects against arbitrary detention through clearly articulated judicial procedures (in the French tradition). Security forces have been known to disregard the procedures, particularly in security cases, by detaining persons indefinitely without charge. The Constitution specifies that "acts against the security of the State" and "actions against the Chief of State," which can include advocating a multiparty system, are punishable crimes. There were, however, no known political detainees or prisoners held during 1989.

Exile is not used as a means of political control nor as a sentence for convicted criminals. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The court system, modeled on the French, has several levels. The trial court (Tribunal de Premier Instance) hears questions of fact and law in civil, commercial, ordinary criminal and administrative cases. The appellate level is divided into two courts, with a separate appeals court for criminal cases. The highest level, the Supreme Court, has four chambers.

Outside the normal court system, there is a military tribunal to handle all offenses under military law, a State Security Court, and a special criminal court which deals with fraud and embezzlement of public funds by officials. The right to a fair public trial is provided for in the Constitution and generally has been respected in criminal cases, but important procedural safeguards are lacking in State Security Court trials. State Security Court trials are open to the public, and defendants are represented by counsel, with the right to appeal to the Supreme Court or, if turned down by the Supreme Court, to the President. However, court officials are appointed by the President, who can also transfer and dismiss them by decree. Although the judiciary is susceptible to intervention by the executive, particularly in political or security cases, there was no indication that such intervention occurred in 1989. On January 1, 1989, and on the 20th anniversary of the ruling PDG, President Bongo continued his practice of commuting the sentences of first offenders who were not convicted of first degree murder or armed robbery.

GABON

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Search warrants may be obtained after the fact but, as occasionally happens in cases of suspected illegal aliens, sometimes they are not obtained at all. There were credible reports that in many cases the homes of those detained were ransacked by security forces who confiscated personal effects. The Government periodically monitors communications. Membership in the ruling PDG is not mandatory, but it enhances opportunities for political and career advancement. Gabonese citizens' livelihoods are not normally compromised by failure to join the party.

Section 2 Respect For Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are restricted. Neither direct public criticism of the President nor advocacy of a multiparty political system is permitted. Gabonese citizens with access to the President can express (and have expressed) their views, including criticisms, directly to him in private meetings, and there has been no retribution as a result. Public media--radio, television, and the sole daily newspaper L'Union--are controlled by the Ministry of Information and disseminate government views and communiques. The media carry wire service material (mostly Agence France Presse) which gives the public some coverage of world events. The broadcasts of prodemocracy demonstrations in China were apparently edited by the local television station which downplayed the impact of the mass demonstrations. However, the Government allowed the French satellite system to broadcast these events. The President encourages journalists to point out failures of individual government officials or ministries and to highlight inefficiency and corruption. Although foreign books and magazines containing "scurrilous" material have been banned in the past, this practice has not occurred in recent years.

Academic freedom is limited and public criticism of the President or of the political system is not allowed. In 1989 students engaged in protest actions against curriculum content.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government limits freedom of assembly and association to recognized organizations. Permits and police notification are required for all outdoor meetings. The Government generally permits such meetings only if they are organized by the ruling party (and its ancillary units such as the women's, youth, and labor movements), cultural and entertainment impresarios, or recognized church groups. Demonstrations are not permitted.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion, and the Constitution provides for religious freedom. Because their activities were considered by the Government as fostering disunity, Jehovah's Witnesses and several small syncretistic sects were banned by presidential decree in 1970. The decree was reiterated in 1985. As recently as 1987, the courts sentenced 24 Jehovah's Witnesses to short or suspended terms for belonging to a banned organization.

GABON

The primary faiths are Catholic and Protestant. There are a few Muslims (including President Bongo) and numerous adherents to traditional religions. Foreign missionaries, including Americans, are engaged actively in evangelical and administrative capacities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement of both Gabonese citizens and expatriates within the country is not restricted formally, but travelers occasionally encounter gendarmerie control points where identity cards and other documents are examined. While Gabonese citizens may return freely to Gabon from abroad, they must obtain exit permits from the police, and government employees must obtain permission to travel abroad.

There are approximately 200,000 non-Gabonese resident in Gabon, many of whom are from Equatorial Guinea or Cameroon. Immigration laws and presidential decrees promulgated in 1986 imposed heavy monetary guarantee requirements on non-French and non-American expatriates working in Gabon and levied exit visa fees for each departure from the country. The Gendarmerie periodically detains undocumented aliens who are then placed in a holding camp under harsh conditions. Most of the detainees are released after paying fines and bribes. In August the Government of Senegal arranged for the voluntary repatriation from Gabon of some 1,000 of its citizens.

The Government encourages but does not force "regroupment"--the voluntary consolidation of small rural communities into larger villages along a road--by enhancing the delivery of public services such as water, electricity, and schooling in the larger villages.

The present political system does not accord citizens the right to change their government through the electoral process. The Democratic Party of Gabon (PDG) is the sole political party of Gabon. A party constitution amendment (March 1983) restricts candidacy for presidential elections to the Founder-President of the PDG. Among party members, there is competition for elections to the National Assembly and for positions on the Central Committee, but this maneuvering is within the sole political party. Presidential elections are held during the 7th year of the President's term. National Assembly members are elected for 5 years. The Council of Ministers, which meets under the chairmanship of the President or, occasionally, the Prime Minister, approves all government decisions proposed by the President. The 42-member Cabinet (reshuffled slightly in August) includes representatives of major ethnic groups from all regions of the country. This large Cabinet allows the various interest groups to have a review role in policy formulation, a share in political patronage, and a consultative role on national resource distribution.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Gabon has not been the object of human rights investigations in recent years, but in 1989 it invited representatives of Amnesty

GABON

International and other human rights organizations to visit Gabon to ensure that coup plotters arrested in August receive good treatment and due process of law. President Bongo repeated his invitation to human rights observers in a November address to the nation in which he also announced that the coup plotters would be tried by the civil courts rather than placed under the jurisdiction of a military court. There are no local human rights groups. In the cabinet reshuffle of August, responsibility for human rights questions remained with the Secretary of State for Promotion of Women.

Gabon's relative prosperity has enabled the Government to extend health and social security benefits to all its people, regardless of tribal affiliation or region. Recent difficulties in maintaining these benefits have been due to severe budget cutbacks rather than to discriminatory practices. There are no significant ethnic, racial, religious, or social groups that have recently suffered mistreatment by the Government.

Urban women are moving increasingly into the professions due to improved educational opportunities, including in technical training institutions in urban areas. Government and party policies are supportive. In rural Gabon women still fill largely traditional roles built around family and village, e.g., hauling water, tending fields. The gradual introduction of piped-in water and of electricity has had the effect of improving living standards for rural women.

Violence against women in Gabon, including wife beating, occurs, but there are no studies or statistics available to help determine the extent of the problem. However, violence against women is believed to be infrequent as it is not part of the traditional social context. The incidents that are reported in the media from time to time invariably have their genesis within the context of domestic disputes or are related to violence against prostitutes. The Government does not condone such behavior but has not directly addressed the issue.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers may organize labor unions but are not free to form and join unions of their own choosing. All unions must be affiliated with the government-sponsored Labor Confederation of Gabon (COSYGA), which is a specialized organ of the PDG and the sole labor federation. It is estimated that over half of Gabon's 90,000 salaried private-sector workers are unionized. Government employees are not permitted to belong to unions.

Under Gabonese law, the right to strike continues to be severely restricted; strikes are illegal if they occur before remedies prescribed under the Labor Code (1978) have been exhausted. In June demonstrators gathered outside the presidential palace to protest a change in the Labor Code which would have legalized piece-rate work in the industrial sector. President Bongo met with a labor delegation to discuss the matter, and he later agreed to rescind the announced change. In an unusual conciliatory move, the demonstrators were paid their regular wages for the afternoon of the demonstration. Utilities workers in Gabon's oil capital of Port Gentil have staged work stoppages in the past to protest government-ordered cuts in salaries and personnel at the state-owned utilities company.

COSYGA is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and maintains ties with the International Labor Organization (ILO) and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations and other national trade union centers.

In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) indicated that, in order to conform with Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, the Government should revise existing legislation to: provide workers who wish to form unions of their own choosing the right to do so; eliminate the obligation imposed on workers to pay a solidarity tax without their consent; and eliminate compulsory arbitration which effectively makes it legally impossible to strike.

Unions in each sector negotiate with management over specific pay scales, working conditions, and benefits applicable to their industry. Representatives of labor, management, and government meet annually to agree on the minimum wage, which is determined within guidelines provided by the Government. Agreements reached between labor and management in each sector also apply to nonunion and expatriate labor. According to the Labor Code, workers may individually or collectively take complaints of code violations to arbitration and may appeal to labor and national courts. These provisions are respected in practice. There are no export processing zones in Gabon.

The 1989 report of the COE recommends that existing legislation be revised to expand protection against antiunion discrimination and to provide protection, including penal sanctions, for workers' organizations against employer interference.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Although forced labor is prohibited by law, the COE has for many years noted that provisions of the Merchant Shipping Code are incompatible with ILO Conventions on forced labor. These provisions permit the use of compulsory duties as one means of administrative punishment or reprimand for merchant seamen. The Government has often said that it is amending the Code, but it has taken no action to date.

d. Minimum Age For Employment of Children

No minor below the age of 16 may work without the authorization of the Ministries of Labor, Public Health, and Education, which enforce this provision. It is granted rarely, and few employees in the modern wage sector are below the age of 18. Children at younger ages are involved in traditional family farm labor in rural areas.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The (1978) Labor Code and the (1982) General Convention of Labor govern working conditions and benefits for all sectors. Labor legislation provides broad protection to workers. The minimum wage for unskilled labor since April 1985 has been about $200 per month for Gabonese and about $150 for foreigners. Owing to labor shortages, most salaries are much higher. These wages provide a decent living for workers and their families. Work over 40 hours per week must be compensated with overtime, and the workweek must include a minimum rest period of 48 consecutive hours. Women have a right to 14 weeks of leave during pregnancy, including 6 weeks before delivery.

The Labor Code provides for occupational health and safety standards to be established by decree of the Minister of Health. Adherence to these standards, which are generally adopted from the French model, varies greatly and usually reflects company policy rather than governmental enforcement efforts. There has been little unemployment for Gabonese wishing to enter the wage economy, although it has been increasing as the economy reacts to the recent decline in world oil prices.

THE GAMBIA

The Gambia is a parliamentary democracy with an elected president and legislature. Except for a coup attempt in 1981, The Gambia has had a history of political stability under the leadership of its only President since independence in 1965, Sir Dawda Jawara. His ruling People's Progressive Party (PPP) has dominated the unicameral Parliament, but several opposition parties participate in the political process, including two new political parties formed in 1986. In the parliamentary and presidential elections held in March 1987, President Jawara was reelected by a large margin, and PPP candidates won an overwhelming majority in Parliament.

The confederation between The Gambia and Senegal, established in 1982 following the coup attempt, formally ended in September 1989, following Senegal's withdrawal of its security forces from The Gambia. The two countries disagreed over the function and ultimate purpose of the confederation, with The Gambia insisting upon its sovereignty and Senegal favoring a more fully integrated economic union. The Gambia has a small army with an attached naval unit organized and trained by British officers. Its gendarmerie forces, formerly headed by Senegalese officers, are now under Gambian leadership. The combined confederal battalion, which had been two-thirds Senegalese and one-third Gambian, was disbanded in September 1989.

The Gambia's estimated population of 784,000 consists largely of subsistence farmers growing rice and groundnuts (peanuts), the country's primary export crop. The Gambia in 1989 continued a stringent program of economic reform which met the targets agreed upon with the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and other donors. The program has allowed The Gambia to reschedule its external debt and to receive new loan and grant assistance.

The Gambia has made particular efforts to promote observance of human rights, including the subject in its Constitution of April 24, 1970. In June the Organization of African Unity's (OAU) Commission on Human and People's Rights established its headquarters in Banjul. The Gambian Government founded a Centre for Democracy and Human Rights Studies, in conjunction with the OAU headquarters, to serve as a research institution and training center for human rights issues.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no instances of political killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no allegations of torture in 1989. The Constitution prohibits torture and other cruel, inhuman, and degrading punishment.

THE GAMBIA

Prison conditions are severe, and there have been occasional reports of mistreatment of prisoners. The deaths of several inmates in 1988 at one prison due to inadequate diet was investigated by a Presidential Commission on Prison Conditions. The Commission found nutritional deficiencies and some overcrowding, and its recommendations led to prison reforms, including the passage of legislation specifying an adequate prison diet. The Government allows prison visits by representatives of the local Red Cross and by close family members.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Based on British legal practice, well-developed constitutional and legal procedures govern the arrest, detention, and trial of persons accused of crimes. Under these procedures, a detained person must be brought to trial within 1 week of arrest. This waiting period, however, can be extended twice, making 21 days the maximum period of detention before trial.

In 1987 the Government detained several suspected members of the Movement for Justice in Africa, which was banned in 1980. They were later released without charges being brought on political grounds, although some were charged and tried for possession of cannabis. There were no political detainees being held at the end of 1989. There are some self-exiled opposition elements who would be arrested for suspected involvement in the 1981 coup attempt if they returned to The Gambia, e.g., the alleged leader of the plot, Kukoi Samba Sanyang.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Three kinds of law operate in The Gambia: general, Shari'a, and customary law. Shari'a, governing Muslims, is observed in marriage and divorce proceedings. Customary law covers marriage and divorce for non-Muslims, inheritance, land tenure and utilization, local tribal government, and all other traditional civil and social relations. General law, based on English statutes and modified to suit the Gambian context, governs criminal cases and trials and most organized business practices. If there were a conflict between general law and Shari'a, general law would prevail.

The Constitution provides criminal defendants with the traditional rights of the English legal system, such as presumption of innocence, the right of the accused to be informed promptly of the charges, and the right to a public trial. If released on bail, an accused person may face charges indefinitely, since there is no maximum time limit for completing the investigation and bringing the case to trial. Appeals normally proceed from the Supreme (trial) Court to the Court of Appeals, the country's highest tribunal.

While the judiciary operates independently and is free of government interference, judges are appointed by the Government. Because of the shortage of legal professionals in The Gambia, the legal system is staffed in part by judges and prosecuting and defense attorneys from other English-speaking countries having the same basic legal system as the Gambia.

An opposition journalist, Sana Manneh, editor of The Torch, accused four cabinet ministers of corruption in 1988 and subsequently was charged with libeling three of them in October 1988. A 4-month trial ensued, avidly followed by the private press and the public. In April Manneh was acquitted on two counts of libel and given a warning for a third, less serious count. The Government appealed this decision, and a hearing date is set for March 1990.

The Government released 40 prisoners in December 1988 in honor of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In February 1989, in commemoration of Gambian independence, President Jawara announced the release of 50 more prisoners, some of whom had participated in the 1981 coup attempt. Currently, there are no known political prisoners in The Gambia.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides guarantees, which are respected in practice, against arbitrary search of person and property. It does permit a search to which a suspect submits voluntarily or if it is reasonably required in the interest of national defense or public welfare. Under the Gambian criminal code, search warrants based on probable cause are issued by magistrates upon application by the police. The code also specifies that police may conduct a search of a private residence while a crime is in progress. There are a few police and military checkpoints in and around Banjul, which periodically stop drivers and search vehicles.

The rights of family are of extreme importance in The Gambia's conservative Muslim society. Marriage, the raising of children, and religious instruction are regulated by a combination of personal preference and ethnic and religious tradition. The Government does not normally intrude in family matters. Family planning is encouraged but not enforced. There is no effort to censor or control personal correspondence or communications.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press. While opposition parties have been relatively inactive since the 1987 elections, members freely express their opinions about the Government and ruling party.

The Government does not attempt to censor published materials, whether they originate within or outside the country. In practical terms, The Gambia, with its small, mainly rural, largely illiterate, multilingual population, does not support an active press. There are no daily newspapers. The Government and the People's Progressive Party have newspapers which are published on a biweekly or monthly basis. There are several independent, intermittently published, mimeographed newsheets. Both the opposition and the independent press are openly critical of the Government. A biweekly mimeographed paper, sponsored by a legal Socialist party, has been particularly vocal in condemning the governing party. There is, however, some degree of self-censorship in the government-owned media, which exercises restraint in reporting criticism of the Government. During the libel trial of the journalist who accused four cabinet ministers of corruption, Radio Gambia and the official press ceased coverage after the first week of the trial. However, the Socialist paper reported on the daily events of the trial and was widely distributed; the international press also covered the story.

There is no television in The Gambia, although Senegalese broadcasts can be received. The Government dominates the media through Radio Gambia. There have been no reported instances of government interference with the one commercial radio station, which mainly broadcasts music. Foreign magazines and newspapers are available in the capital. There is no university in The Gambia.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

In general, there is no interference with the freedom of association and assembly which is provided for in the Constitution. The Government almost always grants permits for peaceful assembly but requires that these meetings be open to the public. However, the Movement for Justice in Africa, which was suspected of involvement in the 1981 coup attempt, is banned.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The constitutional provisions of freedom of conscience, thought, and religion are observed in practice. The State is secular, although Muslims constitute over 90 percent of the population. The schools provide instruction in the Koran for Muslim students. Christians, both Catholic and Protestant, freely practice their religion. There is a small Baha'i community in Banjul. Missionaries are permitted to carry on their various mission-related activities openly and freely. There is no evidence of discrimination in employment, education, or in other areas of Gambian life on religious grounds.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides for freedom of movement, subject to conditions protecting public safety, health, and morals. There is no restriction on freedom of emigration or freedom of return. Internally, police and military checkpoints exist in and around Banjul, but there is no evidence that police harass travelers. Because of historic and ethnic ties with the inhabitants of Senegal, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Sierra Leone, and Mauritania, people tend to move freely across borders, which are poorly marked and difficult to police. Under the confederation treaty of 1981, neither Gambians nor Senegalese have needed passports or visas to travel to or reside in the other country. It is not clear whether this will change as a result of the recent dissolution of the confederation. The Gambia also recognizes the Economic Community of West African States' (ECOWAS) protocol which allows entry of ECOWAS country citizens for up to 90 days without visas.

In late April and May, during the ethnic violence and unrest in Mauritania and Senegal, over 7,000 Mauritanian citizens sought refuge from Senegal in The Gambia. The Gambian Government moved quickly, in conjunction with the Red Cross and other donors, to set up temporary camps and feeding centers for the Mauritanians and later arranged an airlift to help their voluntary return to Mauritania.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The President and the Members of Parliament are popularly elected, as are the district councils and the chiefs, who exercise traditional authority in the villages and compounds. Presidential and parliamentary elections are held every 5 years. Citizens must be at least 18 years of age to vote. Balloting is secret, and measures are employed to assure that illiterate voters understand the choices and voting procedure. A functioning multiparty system exists in The Gambia even though the People's Progressive Party under the leadership of President Jawara has been in power since independence. The principal opposition party, the National Convention Party (NCP), contests both national and district elections. Two newly formed opposition parties, the Gambia People's Party (GPP) and the People's Democratic Organization for Independence and Socialism (PDOIS), contested for office in the March 1987 presidential and parliamentary elections. Campaigning was vigorous, active, and open to all parties. The ruling PPP won by an overwhelming majority and now holds 31 of 36 elective seats in the Parliament. The NCP was the only opposition party to win seats. The opposition charged that the election was manipulated by the Government but did not provide evidence to support its allegations. The opposition also charged, with some justification, that the PPP benefited from its control of Radio Gambia and access to government vehicles for campaigning.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is responsive to charges of human rights violations and permits visits of international human rights organizations to observe the conditions of detainees and the trial process. There were no reported requests by such organizations for investigation of alleged human rights abuses in The Gambia during 1989. The Gambia is an active member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission and of the Organization of African Unity's (OAU) Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights. It took the initiative in persuading the OAU to locate the Commission in Banjul which opened in June 1989. The Government has also established the African Centre for Democracy and Human Rights Studies in conjunction with the OAU Commission, which held its first colloquium in November.

The Gambian population is overwhelmingly Muslim and rural, with 85 percent living in villages. While personal initiative and choice are valued, there is considerable emphasis on the collective aspects of rights and privileges. Traditional views, especially about the role of women in society, are changing, but very slowly. Marriages are still often arranged, and Muslim tradition allows for polygamy. Domestic violence (wife beating) and female circumcision are common practices in The Gambia as in the region, reinforced by traditional beliefs. As a result, the Government has been passive in attempting to counter these practices. However, the Women's Bureau in the Office of the President conducted a study in late 1989 of women's rights, including specific questions on domestic violence, that will be used as the basis for recommendations to the law reform commission. The Women's Bureau conducts an ongoing campaign in the rural areas to make women aware of their legal rights in divorce, property matters, and in cases of assault.

In villages the women continue to perform work in the field and provide for the majority of local food production. Women also play an important role in the small, modern wage sector of the economy. Most are in semiskilled jobs (e.g., assembly work, handicraft shops, bus conductors), very few are in skilled trades (e.g., carpentry, auto repair), and a small but growing number are in midlevel supervisory positions (e.g., civil service, tourist hotels, and banks). There is no wage or benefits discrimination for jobs that are performed both by men and women. Females comprise over one-third of the students in primary school, and, with growing educational opportunities, women are beginning to participate increasingly in the professions and in political life.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Labor Administration Act specifies that workers are free to form associations, including trade unions. However, less than 20 percent of the work force is engaged in the modern wage sector of the economy, where unions normally are active. The Gambian Workers' Confederation (GWC) and the Gambian Workers Union (GWU), are the two main independent and competing umbrella organizations, and both are recognized by, and have a good working relationship with, the Government.

The Labor Administration Act authorizes strikes. However, because of a required 14-day cooling off period (21 days in essential services), government conciliation efforts, and the poor bargaining strength of the unions, few strikes actually occur. In September about 200 workers of the China Building Material Company outside of Banjul went on strike following the dismissal of a worker; the outstanding issues appeared to be differences between the Chinese management and Gambian labor practices.

As a result of an incomplete merger effort between the GWC and the GWU, both organizations claim affiliation to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU); however, the ICFTU continues to recognize the GWU as its affiliate. Both unions are affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. In addition, there are two other Gambian labor confederations, the Gambian Labor Confederation, which is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions, and the Gambian Trade Union Congress, which is affiliated with the World Confederation of Labor. The Gambia is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Under the Labor Administration Act, workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively. While trade unions are small and fragmented, collective bargaining agreements in May resulted in revised minimum wage rates for categories of workers in construction, carpentry, electrical engineering, transportation, shipyards, hotels, and other occupations. There is no export processing zone in The Gambia. Labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Criminal Code prohibits compulsory labor. There is no evidence of forced or compulsory labor in The Gambia.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The official minimum age for employment is 18. However, because of the paucity of secondary school opportunities, most children complete their formal education by age 14 and informally enter the work force. Control of child labor does not apply to customary chores on family farms or street trading.

Minimum wages and hours of work are determined by the Joint Industrial Council, pursuant to the Labor Administration Act, which has representation from employees, employers, and government. For example, the minimum wage for an unskilled laborer is approximately $1.20 per day, usually supplemented with transport and other allowances. The wages are higher for various skilled laborers, with the minimum under the May 1989 agreement set at $2.89 per day for foremen and hotel chefs. The private sector generally has provision for overtime pay. These minimum wages do not provide for a decent standard of living. However, most Gambians do not live on one worker's earnings and rely on the extended family system, including often some subsistence farming.

The workweek for government workers is four 8-hour days, with a half day on Friday. Allowance is made for half-hour lunch breaks. For the private sector, there are four 8-hour days with half days on Fridays and Saturdays, making a 40-hour workweek. Government employees are entitled to 1 month's paid leave after 1 year of service; private sector employees receive 15 days of paid annual leave.

Under the Factory Act, the Minister of Labor is given authority to regulate factory health and safety, accident prevention, and dangerous trades and to appoint inspectors to ensure compliance. However, this system is less than fully satisfactory, owing to the shortage of inspectors. The Government announced in 1987 that it would submit to Parliament a new labor code to replace obsolete labor laws; and a new industrial injuries compensation act to replace the existing workmen's compensation act. However, no action to this end had been taken by the end of 1989.

GHANA

Ghana is governed by the Provisional National Defense Council (PNDC) under the chairmanship of Flight Lieutenant Jerry John Rawlings, who seized power from an elected government on December 31, 1981, and abolished the constitution, which has not been replaced. Under the Establishment Proclamation of January 11, 1982, the PNDC exercises "all powers of government." In practice, government policy is developed by Chairman Rawlings, assisted by a number of close advisers, both inside and outside the Government. In addition to Chairman Rawlings, the PNDC consists of eight members, of whom two are serving military officers and six are civilians. The executive consists of ministries headed by secretaries, most of whom are subordinate to a PNDC member responsible for that particular area of government. There is no national legislature or lawmaking body. All national, regional, and many district officials are appointed by the PNDC.

The several security organizations which exist in Ghana report to various departments of government, but all come under the control of the PNDC. Most security cases of a political nature are handled by the Bureau of National Investigation (BNI), which reports to the PNDC member responsible for security issues.

Starting in 1983, the Government adopted an Economic Recovery Program (ERP) to redress a quarter century of economic mismanagement and political instability which caused Ghana to decline from one of Africa's most promising economies to near collapse. Conducted in concert with the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and a consultative group of bilateral donors, the recovery program has had a positive impact. While economic growth has averaged 5 percent since the inception of the ERP, and inflation has fallen far below the triple-digit rates of earlier years, the austerity of the recovery program has been a heavy burden for large segments of the population.

Although the Rawlings regime has largely restored order following the 18-month period of revolutionary excess in 1982 and 1983, there continue to be significant human rights problems in Ghana. These include restrictions on such basic rights as freedom of speech, press, and assembly, the right of citizens to change their government, and legal due process. In June 1989, the Government established regulations for registering all religious organizations; it "froze" the assets of four churches, expelling the expatriate missionaries of two of them, the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Mormons. Summary arrest and detention were continuing problems with instances of incarceration without formal charges.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated or other extrajudicial killings.

No politically motivated disappearances were reported in 1989.

GHANA

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been occasional credible allegations of torture and beatings in recent years, although there were none in 1989. Prisons in Ghana are antiquated and overcrowded; conditions are harsh. Within the past few years, two American citizens with medical problems died in Ghanaian prisons, and a third stated he had been physically mistreated. The Government is aware of unsafe and overcrowded prison conditions and has established a commission to look into reform of the prisons and the parole system.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In routine criminal cases, arrests generally conform to the legal procedures set forth in the criminal code. This code requires that an arrested person be brought before a court within 48 hours to be charged. However, the court can refuse to release a detainee on bail and instead remand him without charges for an indefinite period of time, subject to weekly review as a case is investigated. Habeas corpus is limited by a 1984 law which prevents any court from inquiring into the grounds for the detention of any Ghanaian under PNDC Law 4 (Preventive Custody Law of 1982).

PNDC Law 4 provides for indefinite detention without trial if the PNDC determines it is in the interest of national security. Ghanaian security forces occasionally take persons into custody, with or without a warrant, and hold them incommunicado for extended periods of time, as in the 1987-1988 case of the journalist Ben Ephson. The threat of such treatment serves as a deterrent to activities deemed unacceptable by the State. PNDC Law 4 has been used against a wide variety of persons, including trade union officials like Akwasi Adu-Amankwah and student leaders like Tony Akoto-Ampaw, both of whom were released in 1989.

In late June, the PNDC detained without charge the President and the Secretary General of the Ghana Bar Association for more than a week after the Association announced its intention to hold a seminar commemorating the murder of three judges by soldiers in 1982, shortly after Chairman Rawlings took power. Following a decision by the Bar Association to cancel the seminar, the President and Secretary General were released. There are also reliable reports that Lebanese businessmen suspected of illegal activities are often simply arrested and incarcerated as a means of intimidating others.

In recent years, a number of American citizens have been arrested and held without charge for lengthy periods without the U.S. Embassy being notified or provided access as stipulated in international conventions and in a bilateral treaty. In 1989 the Government seized members of a religious group--the Black Hebrews--who are American citizens and long-time residents of Ghana. They were held several days before appropriate officials at the American Embassy were informed of their imprisonment. The Department of State renewed its August 1988 travel advisory warning American visitors and potential travelers of continuing problems with Ghanaian authorities.

The number of political detainees/prisoners at the end of 1989 was unknown, but the most reliable estimates were around 200. The Government claims the actual number is smaller. In September 1989, Major Courage Quashigah, two other military officers (one of whom reportedly committed suicide while in detention), and two civilians were arrested for alleged involvement in a coup plot. They had not been tried by the end of 1989.

The Government does not practice forced exile. In 1988 the Government continued quietly to encourage Ghanaian exiles with valuable skills to return home, offering them amnesty. A few officials of the former government have returned and resumed careers outside politics, apparently without difficulties. Others have remained abroad, particularly in the United Kingdom and other parts of Western Europe, in order to conduct active opposition to the PNDC or out of fear of political persecution.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

There are two court systems in Ghana. In the regular "prerevolutionary" court system, traditional legal safeguards are based on British legal practices. Trials are public, and defendants have a right to be present, to be represented by an attorney, and to present evidence and cross-examine witnesses. This system includes high courts, appeal courts, and a supreme court headed by a chief justice. There are limitations, however, to the independence of the regular courts. In April 1986, the PNDC summarily dismissed 16 judges, alleging that they were guilty of malfeasance. By this action, the PNDC put judges in the regular courts on notice that they serve at its sufferance. The independent Ghana Bar Association has urged the reestablishment of a judicial council to protect judges from arbitrary dismissal and preserve judicial independence.

A separate public tribunals system at the national and regional levels was set up by the PNDC in 1982 to bypass the regular court system and speed up the judicial process by deemphasizing legal "technicalities." This system includes the Office of Revenue Commissioners, the National Investigations Committee (which, established by PNDC Law 2, has the power to investigate virtually any allegation referred to it by the PNDC), the Special Military Tribunal, and the Public Tribunals Board. Most sensitive political cases and those involving security issues and capital punishment are heard by public tribunals. No appeals were permitted until 1985, when the National Appeals Tribunal was created.

The public tribunals depend largely on judges with little or no legal experience, and they shortcut legal safeguards and due process to provide "rough and ready" justice. Presiding judges are more often laymen than lawyers; there are no published guidelines concerning the admissibility of evidence; and conviction is by majority vote of the panel trying a case. Critics also contend that meaningful appeals are impossible because no adequate record is kept of initial hearings before tribunals. Judges on the appeals panel are drawn from the same pool of "lay judges" who hear initial cases. In the course of a September conference for tribunal officials, government officials proposed the establishment of regional appeal tribunals and the publication of tribunal judgments. The Ghana Bar Association, citing such shortcomings, has elected not to practice before the public tribunals. However, a number of lawyers have ignored the Bar Association's decision and will defend clients before the public tribunals.

GHANA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Citizens not engaged in activity objectionable to the Government are generally free from interference with regard to private conduct, although some critics characterize the local Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR) as "neighborhood watch committees." Monitoring of telephones and mail occurs, and forced entry into homes has been reported in connection with security investigations. The State supports family planning, but there has been no interference with the right to marry or have children as one chooses.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedoms of speech and the press are restricted. Chairman Rawlings has frequently encouraged people to speak out on local community concerns, though not on government policy. However, informers are said to exist, and some Ghanaians hesitate to speak frankly at public gatherings or to attend certain functions.

In September the Ghana Bar Association was to host the biennial meeting of the African Bar Association with the conference theme to be "Human Rights in Africa." The Government had been involved in the planning for almost a year, but, shortly before the conference was scheduled to open, the Government withdrew its financial and logistical support. Faced with this official opposition, the Bar Association canceled the meeting. The Government also confiscated the passport of the Ghana Bar Association President amidst allegations in a government-owned newspaper that he had planned to use the conference to destabilize the Government.

The Government owns the radio and television stations and the two principal daily newspapers. Reporting in government-owned media accentuates positive aspects of government policies but also covers selected instances of corruption and mismanagement in government agencies and state-owned enterprises. In general, media criticism of government policies or of Chairman Rawlings and PNDC members, as well as of foreign and domestic policies, is not tolerated. Journalists are subject to discipline or dismissal by the Government for running articles deemed unacceptable. The editor of the government-owned weekly The Mirror was dismissed in August 1988.

On occasion, the few remaining privately owned newspapers have tried to be relatively bold in reporting selected issues, including editorials and articles criticizing Ghana's foreign policy and the Economic Recovery Program (ERP). However, several privately owned newspapers have closed down in recent years, and in December 1985 the Government banned publication of the Catholic Standard; it remained banned in 1989, although Chairman Rawlings has said publicly that the ban is being reconsidered.

A few foreign periodicals such as West Africa, Time, and Newsweek are sold freely in Accra and other major cities, and even issues critical of Ghana are allowed to circulate. Most Western journalists are now routinely accorded visas and press credentials as opposed to the practices of a few years ago.

GHANA

Academic freedom is respected within the confines of the campus. The National Union of Ghanaian Students, one of the more vocal critics of the PNDC, is tolerated and allowed to organize and hold meetings. Several political organizations, including the June Fourth Movement and the New Democratic Movement (NDM), were founded by faculty and students at the University of Ghana. The NDM is viewed with particular suspicion by the PNDC. Just prior to examinations in May 1988, university students demonstrated over campus issues and forced the closing of all three universities; they reopened in December. During 1989 the Government made a concerted effort to improve its relations with the university students. Senior government officials and students discussed PNDC programs in a serious but nonconfrontational manner, and Chairman Rawlings addressed the graduation ceremonies at the three major institutions without incident.

Critics have charged, and the PNDC Chairman has publicly admitted, that fear of government reaction has led to the creation of a "culture of silence" in Ghana. Senior officials deplore this and ask people to speak out on issues, but instances such as the detention of the President and the Secretary General of the Ghana Bar Association in June demonstrate that to do so can be dangerous and that the boundaries of permissible discussion are still vague.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are also restricted. Individuals generally are free to join together formally or informally to promote benevolent or nonpolitical causes, but permits are required for public meetings or demonstrations, and these are seldom granted for political purposes, particularly if the applicant's views are at odds with those of the Government. Political parties and political meetings are prohibited. The Government barred persons with close ties to the old parties from running as candidates for election to the district assemblies.

Ghana has many private religious, social, and cultural organizations which are allowed to organize and gather with a minimum of legal or informal restrictions.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state-favored religion. Ghanaians are predominantly Christian, and many senior government officials are practicing members of various Protestant sects or Roman Catholicism, with no particular advantages or disadvantages attached to membership.

PNDC efforts to urge the major religious communities to support its economic and social policies has created tension between them and the Government. Chairman Rawlings publicly criticized the Roman Catholic Church's prohibition on its priests participating in the district assemblies. The PNDC has also been sensitive to criticism of Ghana's human rights record by leaders of various denominations. Chairman Rawlings has not renewed his 1987 charge that worldwide church and Christian organizations may be havens for foreign spy networks.

In June 1989, the Government laid down guidelines for the registration of all religious organizations and made it clear that any organization whose actions, it concluded, would lead to social disruption or would offend the morals of the people would not be registered, and thus not tolerated. The Government requires full information about the property and financial assets of the churches and makes the boards of governors personally liable for contraventions.

Subsequently, the Government "froze" the assets of four churches, two indigenous Christian churches, plus the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons). The expatriate personnel of the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Mormons were expelled with 7 days' notice. The Government alleged that the Jehovah's Witnesses refused to recognize Ghana's symbols of authority and that the Mormons advocated racism. Ghanaian members of the Mormon church have not been further harassed, but expatriate Mormons have not been allowed to resume their missionary activities in Ghana. At present, these four churches have not been allowed to apply for registration.

Other foreign missionary groups have generally operated throughout the country with a minimum of formal restrictions, but some foreign missionaries find obtaining visas is becoming more difficult. At least one missionary was denied entry in 1989 despite possessing a valid visa.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Ghanaians and foreigners are free to move throughout Ghana without special permission. Police checkpoints exist countrywide, allegedly for the prevention of smuggling, but are less obtrusive than in the 1982-84 period. Roadblocks and car searches are still a normal part of nighttime travel in Accra.

As members of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), Ghanaians may travel without visas for up to 90 days in member states. Ghanaians are generally free to exercise this right, and nationals of other member states are free to travel to Ghana. In August-September 1989, longtime Ghanaian residents of Liberia and longtime Liberian residents of Ghana abruptly returned to their "home" countries amidst press allegations that they had been deported. Both Governments officially denied their citizens had been deported. Ghanaians are also free to emigrate or to be repatriated from other countries. If a person is considered a security threat, special permission to travel outside Ghana must be obtained.

There is no forced resettlement of populations. The Government has not established policies to deal with the roughly 150 refugees registered with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Many unregistered refugees from the Sahelian drought in neighboring countries remain in Ghana, and efforts to settle or move these basically nomadic peoples have had only limited success.

There is no procedure by which citizens can freely and peacefully change their laws, officials, or form of government. Chairman Rawlings and the PNDC exercise total executive, legislative, judicial, and administrative power. The National Commission for Democracy (NCD) was established in 1984 to design new "democratic" structures which would help establish the legitimacy of the PNDC.

In December 1988, and in January and February 1989, the first elections of any kind since 1979 were held in Ghana to establish district assemblies in 10 regions. An estimated 58.9 percent of the electorate, higher in the rural areas than in the urban areas, turned out for the elections which were generally peaceful and unaccompanied by fraud. The contests revolved around the candidates' probity and competence. These local assemblies have limited authority, and the PNDC has emphasized that the first priority of the assemblies is to establish local development programs. The Government names one-third of the members of each assembly, which conduct meetings and formulate development programs within guidelines laid down by the Regional Coordinating Councils (RCC) established in August 1989. The RCCs are dominated by government-appointed officials.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no known locally organized human rights groups currently dealing with Ghanaian human rights matters. Several other organizations--most notably the Ghana Bar Association--have attempted to address human rights issues from time to time. The Government's reactions to these efforts have ranged from indifference to active discouragement. The Government does permit the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit prisons. In September 1988, Ghana hosted a meeting of the International Federation of Women Lawyers, which addressed human rights in Ghana, but in 1989 it blocked the African Bar Association meeting. A representative of Amnesty International applied to visit Ghana in 1989 but was denied a visa.

The Government is sensitive to charges of abuse of human rights and stoutly defends its practices. The PNDC is particularly critical of charges from human rights groups in the West that it lacks a democratic structure. It insists that "participatory democracy" through people's involvement in mass organizations such as the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution and the 31st December Women's Movement has "grassroots" support and is more broadly democratic than previous Ghanaian governments. Ghana is a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

Although ethnic differences are intentionally downplayed by the Government, occasional charges are aired that the PNDC and the political leadership are dominated by the Ewe ethnic group from eastern Ghana. Chairman Rawlings and a number of his close advisors are Ewe.

The Government has made a concerted effort to raise the status of women in Ghana. In 1985 it promulgated four laws which overturned many of the customary, traditional, and colonial laws which discriminated against women. These concerned family accountability, intestate succession, customary divorce registrations, and the administration of estates. Women in urban centers and those who have entered the modern sector encounter little overt bias, but resistance to women in nontraditional roles persists. Women in the rural agricultural sector remain subject to traditional male dominance. Women do have a significant economic role as market traders.

Violence against women, including wife beating, occurs, but, as there are no statistics or studies available, the extent of the problem is unknown. Police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes, and such cases seldom come before the courts. Female mutilation (e.g., clitoridectomy) is practiced only in the far northeast and northwest parts of the country. The Government discourages the practice, although it has not made it illegal. The 31st December Women's Movement, led by Chairman Rawlings' wife Nana Komadu Agyeman-Rawlings, prominently promotes the economic and social development of women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The PNDC has not interfered with the right of workers to associate in labor unions. Trade unions in Ghana and their activities are still governed by the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) of 1958, as amended in 1965 and 1972. The independent Trades Union Congress (TUC), established in 1958, represents organized labor in Ghana. It consists of a national headquarters and 16 affiliated unions, representing a claimed total membership of about 700,000 workers in skilled and semiskilled trades. Union members elect their own leaders, and representatives of the affiliated unions elect the TUC leadership at quadrennial conferences, the most recent having been in March 1988. The TUC publishes its own newspaper. It is independent of government subventions and has publicly criticized the Government at times for its economic policies as well as its failure adequately to consult the trade union movement.

The right to strike is recognized in law and in practice, although the Government has on occasion taken strong action to end strikes, especially those which threaten interests it perceives as vital. Under the IRA, the Government has established a system under which it seeks first to conciliate, then arbitrate, disputes. Discussions have been under way for some time to replace this system with labor tribunals to arbitrate industrial disputes certified as deadlocked. The Government has declared that establishment of labor tribunals must be part of a new, consolidated industrial relations act, which cannot be implemented piecemeal.

For several years the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) has criticized various aspects of Ghanaian legislation pertaining to freedom of association. The COE, again in 1989, expressed the hope that measures would be taken to bring Ghana's laws into conformity with ILO Convention 87 which Ghana ratified in 1967.

The TUC is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU). Consistent with OATUU guidelines, it maintains no other international affiliations, although it has friendly relations with other international labor organizations, including the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

GHANA

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize is generally respected. Civil servants, however, are prohibited by law from joining or organizing a trade union. The TUC is a large, well-established union organization whose membership has shown little growth in recent years. Ghana's trade unions engage in collective bargaining for wages and benefits with both private and state-owned enterprises, though in the latter category the threat of detention (a common practice in the early 1980's) hangs over union leaders to force agreement on issues. At the end of 1989, no union leaders were under detention for union-related activities. Akwasi Adu-Amankwa, a union leader detained at the end of 1988 for activities not related to his union responsibilities, was released and allowed to enter a training program offered in the Netherlands.

There are no functioning export processing zones in Ghana, and labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Ghanaian law prohibits forced labor, and it is not known to be practiced. For a number of years, however, the ILO's COE has urged the Government to revise various legal provisions which permit imprisonment with an obligation to perform labor for offenses which are not countenanced under ILO Convention 105, ratified by Ghana in 1958.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Labor legislation in Ghana sets a minimum employment age of 15 and prohibits night work and certain types of hazardous labor for those under 18. In practice, child labor is prevalent, and young children of school age can often be found during the day performing menial tasks in the market or collecting fares on local buses. Enforcement of minimum age laws is uneven, especially since local custom and economic circumstances favor children working to help their families. Violators of regulations prohibiting heavy labor and night work for children are occasionally punished.

Minimum standards for wages and working conditions are established through a tripartite committee composed of representatives of government, labor, and employees. It establishes a minimum wage rate, and other salaries are adjusted accordingly. Effective January 1987, the minimum wage was increased 25 percent to $0.50 per working day at current exchange rates. In early 1988, the TUC called for a "meaningful" national wage of not less than $4.00 per day. The current "living wage"--consisting of the actual wage and customary benefits such as transportation and food allowances--is about $1.00 per working day; the TUC estimates the daily living costs of a family of four at $5.00. Thus, the existing minimum wage is insufficient for a single wage earner to support a family. In most cases, however, households are supported by multiple wage earners, some family farming, and other family-based commercial activities. An upward adjustment in the living wage may be a major labor/management issue in 1990. The basic workweek in Ghana is 40 hours. Occupational safety and health regulations are in effect, and sanctions are occasionally applied to violators.

GUINEA

Guinea has been ruled by the military since 1984. Under President Lansana Conte, the military governs the country through the Military Committee for National Recovery (CMRN) and a joint military and civilian Council of Ministers. The regime, which came to power following the 24-year reign of Sekou Toure, suspended the constitution and rules through ordinances, decrees, and decisions issued by the President and various ministers.

Military and paramilitary forces number about 17,000 persons (although accurate figures are difficult to obtain), with the army alone consisting of some 10,000 officers and soldiers. The 2,000-man national guard (Gendarmerie Nationale), a police force, and a well-armed presidential guard provide internal security. Both the military and police have been involved in human rights abuses. In particular, abuses by police appear to have been a motivating factor behind the reorganization of the security services in 1989, placing the police under the direction of an army officer.

Eighty percent of Guinea's population of 7 million is dependent on subsistence agriculture. Per capita annual income is estimated at barely $300. Mineral resources, mainly bauxite, diamonds, and gold, are the major exports. Under President Conte, Guinea's economic reform program is attempting to diversify the small salaried work force, primarily through the creation of producers' associations and cooperatives and the promotion of foreign investment. However, efforts to reduce the size of the civil service, the largest employer, have left recent university graduates without jobs in the public sector, a sinecure under the old regime. Increasing unemployment in 1989 was a source of growing government concern.

The human rights situation has improved markedly since the Sekou Toure years; however, human rights in Guinea in 1989 remained circumscribed despite frequent government declarations of an increased dedication to human rights. Major concerns were the failure of the military Government to control abuses by often poorly disciplined security forces, including killings and beatings; the Government's silence on the fate of prisoners still unaccounted for following a 1985 coup attempt; and the Government's restrictions on freedoms of speech and press, assembly and association, and the right of citizens to change their government through democratic means. Women's rights are restricted in several important areas. Acknowledging these concerns, especially those in the political sphere, the Government has widely publicized the promulgation of a new constitution, scheduled for December 1990. President Conte announced that this document would provide for an interim 5-year period of mixed military/civilian stewardship leading to a multiparty, parliamentary system of government, headed by an elected president, with strict separation of powers. A drafting committee of 50 drawn from all sectors of educated Guinean society, is currently drawing up a new constitution.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings in Guinea in 1989. However, in October the police in Labe beat to death a young man who had been arrested on a minor charge. When a group protesting the incident marched on the police station and attacked it, the military was called in. Ultimately soldiers fired into the crowd, killing 6 persons and injuring 18. A government minister investigated the incident, and subsequently the Government ordered the arrest of police officers responsible for the young man's death. At the end of 1989 no formal proceedings had been launched.

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances in 1989. However, there is still uncertainty about the fate of a number of military officers, mainly from the Malinke ethnic group, who disappeared after their arrest following the 1985 coup attempt (see also Section 1.e.).

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The military Government continued in 1989 to denounce the human rights atrocities of the former Toure dictatorship and publicly seeks to enforce provisions of the 1965 penal code which forbid torture and abuse of authority. However, mistreatment of detainees continues; the police and soldiers are widely perceived by the public as using excess force, frequently involving severe beatings as in the Labe incident. Amnesty International's (AI) 1989 report noted that several students, while in police custody in 1988, had been beaten and subjected to mock executions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

A suspected criminal can be detained incommunicado by the arresting authority during preliminary investigation and has the right to counsel only after appearing before a judge. Such detention is limited to 48 hours, or 96 hours if an extension is granted by a tribunal. A system of bail for those accused of less serious crimes, as defined by the presiding judge, is available at the judge's discretion. In practice, despite presidential admonitions and campaigns in the government-owned media against corruption and harassment of citizens, paramilitary elements use arbitrary detention as a means of extortion. Political detainees, such as those held after the 1985 coup attempt, are often held incommunicado and without charge for extended periods of time.

The Government has encouraged Guinean expatriates, including former exiles of the Sekou Toure regime, to return home, but few have chosen to do so. Significant numbers of Guineans live in neighboring African countries and in France.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Guinean penal code provides for the presumption of innocence of accused persons, the independence of judges, the equality of citizens before the law, the right of accused to counsel, and the right to appeal a judicial decision. The judiciary includes courts of first instance (for justices of the peace at the local level) and two Courts of Appeal (one in Kankan, one in Conakry). The Court of Annulment is the Guinean court of last appeal. A special Court of State Security was created in 1985 to try those allegedly involved in the July coup attempt, but it did not meet in 1989.

According to ordinances issued in 1988, the Military Court prepares and adjudicates charges against accused military personnel, but to ensure equality before the law, all judgments regarding violations under the penal code are rendered by civil courts. Trials are public. Those accused of major crimes have the right to an attorney; those accused of less serious crimes must pay for legal counsel.

There is a traditional system of justice at the village or urban neighborhood level where litigants present their civil case before a village chief, neighborhood chief, or council of wise men for judgment. Justice is not enforced uniformly. For example, burglars caught in urban areas are sometimes beaten to death by victims and their neighbors with the tacit approval of police authorities. Authorities have publicly condemned such summary justice.

Human rights organizations have continued to criticize the Government's secretive handling of those tried by the State Security Court and the Military Court for alleged involvement either with the former Toure regime or the July 1985 coup attempt. Much of the information concerning trial procedures of these Courts was never made available, and the trials were widely perceived as unfair. Despite presidential amnesties on December 31, 1987, and on October 2, 1988, which released 106 persons (including 79 military personnel), the fate of many others remained unknown at the end of 1989. It was widely believed that many of the announced death sentences had been summarily carried out shortly after the suspects were arrested in 1985. Guinean officials have informed diplomatic and international human rights observers that there are no longer any political detainees or prisoners held in Guinea, implying that all those imprisoned for their connection with the 1985 coup have been released.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government stresses traditional family values and the inviolability of the home. In general, the military Government is less willing than the previous regime to abuse police powers, although unwarranted interferences in citizens' lives continues, mainly through individual police harassment. Security officials are known to monitor mail and telephone calls.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government has publicly stated that it supports free speech and press. However, citizens do not generally feel free to express public criticism of the Government, although criticism of government officials is heard in private discussions.

The Government owns and operates the news media, and reporters (who are government employees) practice self-censorship. In 1989 investigative reporting focused on social ills and unscrupulous commercial practices (a favorite target of official criticism), but no criticism of the senior levels of government or established policies was aired. The Ministry of Information, Culture and Tourism continues to act both as administrator and censor of media services.

Publications which incite crime or are contrary to good morals are prohibited, as are insult, defamation, and libel. Some groups--operating for the most part abroad--have expressed criticism in clandestine tracts. Many foreign publications circulate freely in Guinea, including some critical of the Government, and no attempt is made to interfere with foreign radio broadcasts.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public gatherings can take place only with the approval of the Government. The Guinean penal code bans any meeting which has an ethnic or racial character or any gathering "whose nature threatens national unity." Opposition groups are not permitted. The Government does encourage the formation of nonpolitical professional organizations, and their numbers continue to increase.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Guineans generally enjoy religious freedom and tolerance for the larger religious groups. Although an estimated 85 percent of the population is nominally Muslim, there is no official state religion. The Government observes both major Christian and Muslim holidays. The Government and the quasi-governmental National Islamic League (LIN) have spoken out against the "proliferation of pseudo-sects (within Guinean Islam) generating confusion and deviation." The President has declared that the LIN is the only organization with responsibility for coordinating the observance of Islam in Guinea. Foreign missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, operate freely in Guinea.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government restricts the freedom of movement of individual citizens for political reasons. For example, the 67 persons granted amnesty at the end of 1987 were restricted to their area of origin following their release from prison. That restriction has gradually been relaxed in many cases and left to the discretion of local prefects (governors).

Most Guineans, however, are free to move about the country and to change their place of residence and work, although in practice they face harassment by police and military roadblocks, particularly at night. It is common for individual citizens to pay bribes to avoid police harassment. Foreign travel, strictly curtailed under Sekou Toure, is now permitted.

Citizens are unable to change their government through democratic procedures. The military Government suspended the constitution and banned political parties and formal political activity when it took power in April 1984. The Government delayed its previously announced intention to introduce a new constitution in 1989. Rather, President Conte announced in October that there would be an interim 5-year period of mixed military/civilian stewardship leading eventually to a multiparty, parliamentary system of government, headed by a president, with strict separation of powers. At the end of 1989, the interim changes in government had not been introduced or a timetable announced.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Senior government officials received representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross concerning humanitarian issues, including possible prison visits. There are no local organizations reporting on human rights issues in Guinea.

While racial or ethnic discrimination is prohibited by the penal code, ethnic identification is still very strong in Guinea, and mutual suspicion affects relations across ethnic lines within and outside the Government. Official government policy is to include representatives of all major ethnic groups in the Government, but the Soussou ethnic group, to which President Conte belongs, tends to predominate at the highest, most influential levels. A disproportionate number of police are Malinke, former President Toure's ethnic group. Clandestinely circulated opposition tracts frequently play on ethnic tensions to stir resentment against the Government. As noted, many of those that "disappeared" after the 1985 coup came from the Malinke ethnic group.

In rural Guinea, opportunities for women are limited by custom and the traditional demands of subsistence farming. The Government has affirmed the principle of equal pay for equal work, but in practice women receive less pay than men in most jobs.

Violence against women, mainly wife beating, is prohibited under criminal law and is a ground for divorce under civil law. Police rarely intervene in domestic disputes, and prosecution of wife beaters is unusual but has occurred. Health workers in Guinea state that wife beating exists, but they differ in their opinions on the extent of the problem and its severity. The issue has not received significant publicity or government attention.

Female genital mutilation (circumcision) is practiced among all religious groups in Guinea: Muslims, Christians, and animists. According to Western health workers, the practice is nearly universal among Guineans. Grandmothers will frequently see to the circumcision of a granddaughter even when the parents are opposed. The most dangerous form of circumcision, infibulation, is not practiced.

GUINEA

Section 6 Worker Rights

Guinea's new labor code, drafted with the assistance of the International Labor Organization (ILO) and promulgated in January 1988, states that all workers have the right to create and participate in organizations that defend and develop their individual and collective rights as workers. The code also provides that workers have the right not to be a member of such organizations. Further, it stipulates that a union must be independent of political parties to be recognized as representative of workers. The code requires elected worker representatives for any enterprise employing 25 salaried workers. The code also grants salaried workers the right to strike 10 days after their representative union makes known their intention to strike.

In practice, most salaried Guineans--many of whom are civil servants--are affiliated with the country's sole trade union central, the Guinean National Labor Confederation (CNTG), which has close ties to the Government. Private sector workers may strike only with the permission of the CNTG board, a requirement which reduces the likelihood of strikes. In March taxicab drivers in Conakry participated in a 1 to 2 day strike, protesting police harassment and increased insurance and gasoline rates. According to reports, police arrested and detained briefly over 50 rock-throwing drivers. Police held the strike leader for several days. In the past, the Government has dealt sternly with wildcat strikers, including banning those in the public sector from further government employment. The CNTG is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

The ILO Committee of Experts (COE) has commended the Government for its new labor code but also noted that some question still remains regarding legislative provisions that provide for the establishment of compulsory arbitration. In its 1989 report the COE commended a revision of the code limiting the Government's power to refer a dispute to compulsory arbitration to cases involving "essential services" and "national crisis." However, the COE observed that the statute still permits either party to invoke compulsory arbitration, a practice that could limit the right to strike, according to the Committee.

Under the new code, representative workers' unions or union groups can organize in the workplace and negotiate with employers or employer unions. Union delegates are to represent individual and collective claims and grievances before the employer. Work rules and work hours established by the employer are to be developed in consultation with union delegates. Individual workers threatened with dismissal or other sanctions have the right to a hearing before the employer with a union representative present. Employers must give advance notice of any plan to reduce the size of their work force for economic reasons.

In practice, CNTG representatives take the lead in labor/management talks. Collective bargaining has taken place, most notably in 1986 when the CNTG concluded an agreement with the mining companies, and again in 1988 when bank employees collectively bargained for substantially higher salaries.

GUINEA

Labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country. There are no export processing zones.

The above cited COE 1989 report commended the Government for removing a provision of the law restricting the right to hold union offices to Guinean nationals.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is not practiced in Guinea, and article 2 of the labor code specifically forbids it. The COE has noted the Government's stated intention to revise or repeal various obsolete laws to bring them into compliance with ILO conventions on forced labor.

The minimum age for employment in practice as well as in the new code is 16 years of age. Apprentices, however, may be as young as 14 years old. Workers and apprentices below age 18 are not permitted to work at night or more than 12 consecutive hours or on Sundays. According to the labor code, the Minister of Labor must maintain a list of occupations in which women and youth under age 18 may not be employed. Enforcement of these provisions outside of the modern sector of the economy, however, tends to be erratic, particularly in rural areas where children of all ages work on family farms.

The Government has not yet enacted minimum wage legislation, but the labor code provides for the eventual establishment by decree of a guaranteed minimum hourly wage. There are also provisions for overtime and night wage rates which are fixed percentages of the regular wage. Wages currently paid the average worker in the public sector are generally not sufficient to provide a decent standard of living. According to the code, regular work is not to exceed 10-hour days or 48-hour weeks, with a 40-hour workweek being the norm. The minimum weekly day of rest must be 24 consecutive hours, usually on Sunday. Every salaried worker has the right to an annual paid holiday accumulated at the rate of at least 2.5 workdays per month of service. Several articles of the code provide for safe working conditions and the continued good health of workers. These as yet represent the goal rather than the practice.

GUINEA-BISSAU

The Republic of Guinea-Bissau is a one-party state with former or present military leaders in key positions. General Joao Bernardo Vieira serves as President of the Council of State and Head of State, Commander-in-Chief, and General Secretary of Guinea-Bissau's sole political party, the African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde (PAIGC). In elections held in June 1989, Vieira, the only candidate, was elected for a second 5-year term as President. According to the 1984 Constitution, the National Assembly decides fundamental questions of internal and external policy, but effective power and day-to-day decisions rest in the hands of the President and the Council of State. Although the President is the most powerful Member of the Council, decisionmaking is collegial. The party selects all candidates for office.

The Armed Forces (FARP) are responsible for state security, both external and internal. FARP leaders are usually members of the PAIGC and often hold key positions in the Political Bureau or Central Committee. Security forces are under the full control of the Government. Persons accused of political crimes are tried by military tribunals.

Guinea-Bissau remains one of the least developed nations, and most of the 974,000 population is engaged in subsistence agriculture. The Government's postindependence efforts to exercise central control over the economy failed to stimulate agricultural production and resulted in chronic shortages of most basic commodities, inefficient state-owned enterprises, high unemployment, and a weak national currency. Beginning in late 1986, the Government launched a series of reforms to promote long-term economic growth by shifting from a state-run centralized economy to a free-market system. While the reforms spurred private commercial activity and improved agricultural production, in 1989 inflation remained high, and urban residents continued to witness a drop in their standard of living.

The Government marked the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by granting amnesty on December 13, 1988, to four prisoners imprisoned for involvement in a 1985 coup plot. However, most human rights remained tightly restricted. Major human rights problems were abuse of detainees in security cases, arbitrary arrest, lack of fair trial, and limits on freedoms of association, speech, and press, the right of citizens to change their government, and worker rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of premeditated politically motivated killing. (Also see Section 1.c.)

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of disappearance.

GUINEA-BISSAU

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits cruel and inhuman punishment. However, security authorities employ severe interrogation methods, especially severe beatings. Amnesty International (AI) stressed in its 1989 Report (covering 1988) that it continued to receive allegations of the use of torture in security cases and deaths in custody due to mistreatment, noting in particular the detention center ("COP-2") in Bissau. AI asked the Government in 1987 to establish an independent commission of inquiry into these and other allegations, but the Government never responded.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrests in Guinea-Bissau are frequently arbitrary, as arrest procedures are undefined, and the use of arrest warrants is the exception rather than the rule. The legal system, inherited from the Portuguese but modified by the Constitution, includes important procedural rights, such as the right to counsel and the right to a judicial determination of the legality of detention (habeas corpus). Bail procedures are observed erratically.

The Government has held persons without charge or trial, sometimes for extended periods of time, including in incommunicado detention. The number of political detainees held at the end of 1989, if any, was unknown. The Government has the legal right to exile prisoners but has not done so in recent years.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Traditional law still prevails in most rural areas, and many urban dwellers continue to bring judicial disputes to recognized traditional counselors. Several traditional counselors from a village in the Farim sector were reportedly arrested in 1989 for their role in punishing, by death, two persons accused of witchcraft.

With some exceptions, the official judicial system is based on the Portuguese model. Intervals between arrest and trial are often lengthy. All defense lawyers are court appointed, as private legal practice is prohibited. The judiciary is a part of the executive branch. Trials involving state security usually are not open to outside observers and are conducted by military tribunals. FARP members are tried by military courts for all offenses. The Supreme Court is the final court of appeal for both civilian and military cases, except those involving national security matters. In this instance the Council of State reviews all decisions.

The number of political prisoners at the end of 1989 was unknown. However, approximately one-half of those convicted in treason trials in 1986 have been released upon the completion of their sentences or upon grants of amnesty. The remaining prisoners, some of whom have been voluntarily joined by their families, are confined to islands in the Bijagos Archipelago. In 1988 the Government released Raphael Barbosa, cofounder of the PAIGC, from a prison camp on the island of Formosa.

GUINEA-BISSAU

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Constitutional guarantees of the inviolability of domicile, person, and correspondence are not always respected in cases of serious crimes or state security. International and domestic mail is subject to surveillance and censorship. Membership in the PAIGC is not forced, although individuals with political aspirations realize the importance of belonging to Guinea-Bissau's sole political party.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of intellectual, artistic, and scientific expression, with the significant exception of cases in which these rights are exercised in a manner "contrary to the promotion of social progress." In fact, these freedoms are restricted. The Government controls all information media and views the press as a vehicle of the party. Journalists are government employees and must practice self-censorship to maintain their positions. The media are permitted to criticize and question some policies, although they may not criticize individual officials.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association, and government approval is not required for peaceful, nonpolitical assemblies and demonstrations. However, all existing organizations are linked to the Government or the party, including the sole labor union, the National Union of the Workers of Guinea-Bissau. Antigovernment meetings are not tolerated.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religious freedom is provided for in the Constitution and has been respected in practice. Christians, Muslims, and animists worship freely, and proselytizing is permitted. However, religious groups must be licensed by the Government. In 1989 there were no reports of groups being refused licenses.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens are allowed to move freely throughout Guinea-Bissau. Foreign travel is not restricted, nor is citizenship revoked for political reasons. Thousands of persons have emigrated for economic reasons. The return of expatriates is encouraged, although the death in 1986 of one opposition member in a car accident during a forced repatriation from Senegal convinced some government opponents that they would not be welcomed back to Guinea-Bissau. In May 1989, several hundred Mauritanian refugees fleeing ethnic violence in Senegal entered Guinea-Bissau. Most of the refugees were quickly repatriated to Mauritania, but some remained in Guinea-Bissau and were integrated into the Mauritanian community residing in Guinea-Bissau. While sympathetic to the principle of asylum, Guinea-Bissau does not host significant numbers of refugees.

GUINEA-BISSAUSection 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right or the ability peacefully and legally to change the government or the form of government. Guinea-Bissau is led by the PAIGC Party and military elite, headed by President Joao Bernardo Vieira. By the terms of the 1984 Constitution, all political activity takes place within the party/state structure. The 1989 electoral slates for the National Popular Assembly at the district, regional, and national levels were party-approved lists, although not all candidates were members of the PAIGC. Affirmative or negative votes on the proposed slates were cast by secret ballot. The President, members of the Council of State, and deputies of the National Popular Assembly are elected to 5-year terms. There are provisions for constitutional amendments and national referendums initiated by the National Popular Assembly, but the Assembly has never taken such initiatives, and it meets infrequently. No single ethnic group dominates party/government positions, but Papel and Creole (mixed-race) groups, predominantly located in and around the capital of Bissau, are disproportionately represented in the Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Although international human rights groups have visited Guinea-Bissau, these visits have been tightly controlled. An AI mission held discussions in June 1986 with President Vieira and other key officials and attended one session of the treason trial. However, the Government has not responded to AI's 1987 request that an independent commission examine various human rights issues. There are no local human rights groups in Guinea-Bissau.

The population of Guinea-Bissau is composed of diverse tribal groups, each with its own language, customs, and social organization. The Balanta, Fula, Mandinka, Manjaco, and Papel are important groups. Creoles enjoy an advantageous position within the society due to their generally higher level of education and their links abroad. Although the President and other influential leaders regularly urge the nation to overcome ethnic differences, the economic dominance of Creoles (and to a lesser extent Mandinkas and Fulas) has created resentment among other ethnic communities. Most of the defendants in the 1986 coup trial were members of the Balanta, the largest ethnic group (30 percent).

While officially prohibited, discrimination against women persists within certain ethnic groups, especially the Muslim Fulas and Mandinkas of the north and east. The practice of female circumcision is still widespread among these groups despite official prohibition and educational campaigns against this custom. Women enjoy higher status in the societies of the Balanta, Papel, and Bijagos groups living mainly in the southern coastal region. Physical violence as a means of settling domestic disputes occurs among all ethnic groups. While police will intervene in domestic disputes if requested, the Government has not undertaken specific measures to raise the public consciousness of women or to reduce violence against them.

GUINEA-BISSAU

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Approximately one-half of the population of Guinea-Bissau is of working age. While the Constitution provides for freedom of association, only one labor union, the National Union of the Workers of Guinea-Bissau (UNTG), exists in Guinea-Bissau. With strong ties to the PAIGC, the UNTG more closely resembles a mass party organization than an independent union. The UNTG is neither aggressive nor effective in promoting worker rights. While not specifically forbidden, strikes do not occur. Since the Government's use of force to disperse students attempting to strike in 1981, the public's perception has been that strikes, like antigovernment meetings, would not be tolerated. The UNTG is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions and is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

Of the estimated 28,000 salaried workers in the country, approximately 50 percent are employees of the Government. Guinea-Bissau's small manufacturing sector employs fewer than 5,000 persons. The scarcity of salaried jobs has forced employees to focus on obtaining and keeping employment rather than on organizing and bargaining. Public employees are permitted to join the UNTG, but the union's activities have not emphasized organizing employees (whether private or public) for the purpose of collective bargaining. The Constitution does not provide and protect the right to organize and bargain collectively, but the General Labor Law of 1986 contains limited provisions addressing collective bargaining. In practice, from the worker's perspective, the right is neither protected nor practiced.

While expressing satisfaction with various provisions of the 1986 labor law, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts noted in both 1987 and 1988 that the Government's provision for the protection of workers against antiunion discrimination does not appear to be accompanied by penal sanctions against employers and that the General Labor Act is not applicable to workers in the public service. The Committee pointed out that public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State should be able to enjoy the right of collective bargaining. There are no export processing zones in Guinea-Bissau, and labor laws are applicable throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is not permitted by law and is not known to exist. There are no penal sanctions for offenders, however, and the Government lacks the means to provide adequate labor inspections.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The General Labor Act of 1986 established a minimum age of 14 for general factory labor and of 18 for heavy or dangerous labor, including all labor in mines. In an overwhelmingly rural and agricultural society, the traditional division of labor practices both between sexes and age groups continues to prevail. Children in rural communities do domestic and field work for no pay. The Government does not attempt to discourage this practice and, in fact, delays the opening of schools until the rice season has ended.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Even in the small wage sector, labor laws are unevenly enforced due primarily to the extreme economic underdevelopment of the country and the vagaries of the legal system. However, there are government regulations governing such matters as job-related disabilities and vacation rights. The maximum number of hours permitted in a normal workweek is 45 hours. Although not consistently enforced, a minimum wage of approximately $13 a month is mandated by the Ministry of Civil Service. The wage is inadequate to maintain even a minimum standard of living, and workers must supplement their income through reliance on the extended family and subsistence agriculture. Existing legal, health, and safety standards for workers are not enforced in a uniform and comprehensive manner.

KENYA

Kenya has had an elected civilian government since independence in 1963. It has been a de facto one-party state almost since independence and a de jure one-party state since 1982. President Daniel T. arap Moi maintains firm control over both the Government and the party, the Kenyan African National Union (KANU). KANU membership is a prerequisite for participation in national political affairs. The popularly elected National Assembly (unicameral Parliament) of 202 members (including 12 appointed by the President and 2 ex officio members) has little independent power in national political affairs, but it is usually involved in local and regional issues or in affirming the President's initiatives.

The Kenyan armed forces constitute a small professional establishment with a total strength of 22,500 members. Kenya has an internal security apparatus that includes the police criminal investigation department (CID), the paramilitary general services unit (GSU), and the directorate of security and intelligence (DSI or Special Branch). The CID and Special Branch investigate criminal activity and are also used to monitor persons whom the State considers subversive.

Kenya's modern, market-oriented economy includes a well-developed private sector for trade and light manufacturing as well as an agricultural sector that provides food for local consumption and substantial exports of coffee, tea, and other commodities. Kenya's well-developed tourism industry has surpassed coffee and tea as the top foreign exchange earner. In 1989 a continued decline in world coffee prices exacerbated a balance of payments problem. Although economic growth continued, a persistently high population growth rate contributed to a serious and growing problem of unemployment. Kenyans are free to engage in private economic activity and own property without government interference.

Human rights continue to be significantly restricted in Kenya, and in 1989 there was further erosion in the respect for civil liberties and political rights. With forced deportations, the environment for refugees worsened in 1989. By-elections were marked by government interference in support of particular candidates and, in some cases, violence. In addition, the Government banned two magazines, and Parliament barred the largest English-language daily from covering legislative affairs for a 4-month period. A number of persons were charged with behaving "in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace," often in connection with making statements critical of the Government or of political figures. There were new charges of police brutality and also growing signs of executive manipulation of the judicial system. In early June, the Government released the seven political detainees held under the Preservation of Public Security Act which allows indefinite detention without charge or trial in national security cases. Eight persons were publicly tried and convicted on security charges (9 in 1988, and 39 in 1987).

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no political killings in 1989. However, deaths of suspects in police custody in suspicious circumstances continued to occur, including the death of former Nairobi student leader Titus Adungosi. The press reported that Adungosi died in Kenyatta hospital of a stomach ailment while serving a 10-year jail term for his complicity in the 1982 coup attempt.

Several deaths of prisoners held on other than security charges occurred during 1989. The Government generally conducts inquests into deaths in custody, though inquest results are not often made public. In February four of the five CID officers charged in connection with the 1988 death in Mombasa police custody of Zairian musician Taabu Kotela Kiombwe were found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced to 5 years each. In September the State agreed to pay Kiombwe's family damages in an out-of-court settlement.

By the end of 1989, no officials had been held responsible for the 1986-87 deaths in custody of two persons allegedly involved in the underground movement Mwakenya.

Human rights activists have also commented that over the past several years numerous suspects have been fatally shot by the police, allegedly while fleeing.

There were no reports of politically related disappearances in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, and Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is proscribed under the Kenyan Constitution. However, torture and police brutality remained an important issue in 1989. While in 1989 there were markedly fewer public allegations of torture and abuse by persons held on political/security charges than in recent years, a number of Kenyans told the press they were physically abused by the police. Professor Maina wa Kinyatti, who was released from jail in 1988, told the U.S. press after fleeing Kenya that "people are still being put in water while in detention," (see Section 1.d.). President Moi and senior government officials publicly condemned police brutality and torture, and some police officials were convicted of human rights abuses in 1989.

Prison conditions in Kenya are poor and sometimes dangerous to life and health. Detainees and prisoners have complained of beatings, poor food, corruption, and inadequate facilities and medical care. Prisoners often must sleep on cement floors. Overcrowding persisted in 1989 and contributed to the rapid spread of meningitis among prisoners. In August the director of medical services said at least 20 inmates at Kodiaga maximum security prison and 12 inmates at Bungoma prison died of meningitis. The Government later provided inoculations for prisoners. In a directive aimed at reducing prison overpopulation, President Moi released 10,274 petty criminals in October on the 11th anniversary of his presidency.

The Preservation of Public Security Act (PPSA) allows for solitary confinement in security-related cases, with no contact with family or legal counsel, although in some cases lawyers and families have been permitted to visit detainees. Correspondence with prisoners is monitored and occasionally not delivered. Prisoners held on other than security grounds are allowed one brief visit per month by family members.

KENYA

Prison or security officers are usually present during visits by family members or lawyers.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that most arrested or detained persons shall be brought before a court "as soon as is reasonably practicable," and that if such person is not brought within 24 hours of his arrest or from the commencement of his detention the burden of explanation is on the authorities. The Constitution was amended in 1988 to allow the police to hold people suspected of capital offenses for 14 days before being brought before a court. Capital offenses include such crimes as murder and treason. In practice, suspects of all types are often held incommunicado for long periods before being brought before a court.

Kenya's PPSA allows the State to detain a person indefinitely without charges or trial. A formal detention order must be signed and publicly gazetted. There is no judicial review of the legality of detention. Detention cases are reviewed by a board appointed by the President which meets in camera every 6 months, but the Government is not bound by this board's recommendations. In 1989 there were no new detentions under this Act, and in June President Moi released all seven detainees previously held.

In other cases, the number of which is difficult to gauge, people were held in police custody and questioned without being charged or officially detained under any specific authority. For example, in 1989 a former Member of Parliament was picked up by Nairobi police and questioned for 1 day. He was not charged or detained. Observers estimate that there are from four to eight people being held by Nairobi police in this fashion at any given time--some held for hours, some for days or even weeks.

Traditionally, neither exile nor threat of exile has been used by the Government as a means of intimidation or punishment. In June, however, Nairobi businessman Idris Osman, an ethnic Somali, was deported to Ethiopia for alleged activities incompatible with national interests and state security. Although Osman held a Kenyan passport, Kenyan authorities claimed his passport had been issued in an illegal manner. Osman was deported despite a court order to airport and immigration officials enjoining such action. In December two other ethnic Somalis were deported under similar circumstances.

A number of Kenyan dissidents have resorted to self-exile. In most cases, the exiles have not been formally charged with crimes. In April, fearing rearrest, historian and former university lecturer Maina wa Kinyatti fled to Tanzania and eventually emigrated to the United States. Kinyatti, who reported being beaten and otherwise mistreated in prison, had completed a 6-year jail term in October 1988 for possession of an allegedly seditious document. In June President Moi publicly announced a general amnesty and pardon to Kenyan dissidents abroad who were willing to return home. Two such exiles returned in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of fair Public Trial

Kenya's legal system, as defined in the Judicature Act of 1967, is based on the Kenyan Constitution, laws passed by Parliament, and common law or court precedent. Customary law is used as a guide in civil matters affecting people of the same ethnic group so long as it does not conflict with statutory law. Kenya does not have the jury system. The court system consists of a Court of Appeals, a High Court, and two levels of magistrates' courts where most criminal and civil cases originate. Civilians are tried in civilian courts, and verdicts may be appealed to the Kenyan High Court and ultimately to the Court of Appeal. Kenyans do not have a right to legal counsel except in certain capital cases. Most persons tried for capital offenses are provided counsel free of charge if they cannot afford it. Military personnel are tried by military courts, and verdicts may be appealed. Attorneys for military personnel are appointed on a case by case basis by the Chief Justice.

KENYA

The President appoints the Chief Justice and appoints High Court judges with the advice of the judicial service commission. The President also appoints the Attorney General. His power over the judicial system has steadily increased through constitutional amendments adopted in 1986 and 1988, one of which gave the Government greater control over the firing of judges. Among other things, these changes give the President authority to fire the Attorney General, the Auditor General, and High Court judges. Many observers in Kenya and abroad have described these amendments as undermining the independence of the judiciary.

The constitutional right to a fair public trial has been circumscribed in many instances, notably in political/security cases such as those involving alleged Mwakenya or Kenya Patriotic Front (KPF) members. In cases involving the PPSA, the courts have upheld the constitutionality of properly executed actions taken under the authority of that Act but have limited themselves to ensuring compliance with procedural provisions. In cases without political implications the right to a fair public trial is normally observed, although long delays and postponements are common.

In 1989 there were 8 public convictions involving security charges. In the first public prosecution in 1989 involving membership in a subversive organization (in this case, the KPF), Zachary Kariuki Paul Mwati admitted in court to three charges of spying on Kenyan military installations, receiving money from self-exile Koigi wa Wamwere, and sending seditious documents to the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC). Mwati was held incommunicado before appearing in court. As in most security-related trials of previous years, his conviction was based on his "confession" that he was a KPF member. Unrepresented, Mwati was sentenced to 4 years.

In March Joseph Andrew Kibagendi and James Ondari Omariba were given 9 months each after being tried and convicted of possession of a subversive document. Both men had legal representation. Also, in March Daniel John Mwangi Theuri was jailed for 20 months on his confession in court that he joined the KPF. He was unrepresented.

In October Dixon Jowe Alieth, unrepresented by legal counsel, was sentenced to 6 years in jail for possessing seditious publications. Also in October, prison warden Wilson Awuor Angonga was jailed for 4 1/2 years for membership in the underground movement Mwakenya. Angonga, who also was not represented by a lawyer, was held incommunicado for approximately 4 weeks before he pled guilty.

KENYA

In November former primary school teacher Benjamin Andayi Muhehe was sentenced to 12 months in jail after confessing to a charge of leaving Kenya illegally to obtain military training from a clandestine movement. Muhehe was held incommunicado for more than a month. He, too, apparently was not represented by a lawyer. Also in November, former community development officer Stephen Mulili Kituu pled guilty and was sentenced to 4 years for membership in Mwakenya. Kituu, who had been held for 1 month before being sentenced, was apparently not represented by legal counsel.

The draft version of the advocates bill which went before Parliament in December contained no requirement that lawyers obtain licenses. The Law Society of Kenya had argued vigorously against the 1988 Government proposal that lawyers be licensed. However, in December, the Kenyan press reported that KANU planned to affiliate the Law Society to the ruling party. The Law Society objected strongly to the proposed affiliation, and President Moi later said that KANU had no plans to merge the two organizations.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Searches without warrants are allowed under the Constitution in certain instances "to promote the public benefit," including security cases. Security officials also conduct searches without warrants to apprehend suspected criminals or to seize property suspected to be stolen. Homes of suspected dissidents have been searched without warrants, as have the residences of foreign missionaries. Security forces reportedly employ a variety of surveillance techniques, including electronic surveillance and a network of informers.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, the exercise of these rights is restricted. No criticism of the President is tolerated in any form. Kenya's sedition laws have been criticized in Kenya and abroad for failing to distinguish between violent and nonviolent opposition to the Government. The threat of detentions and prosecutions have been used to restrict freedom of speech and press. For example, in April three Standard newspaper reporters were picked up by police on separate occasions in and around Embu, in apparent response to their coverage of a political controversy involving KANU and a local bishop.

In 1989 there was an increasing pattern of arrests on charges of behaving in a manner "likely to cause a breach of the peace," often in connection with statements critical of the Government or government officials. For example, in June a man was jailed for 6 months for shouting in a bar that the Government had failed to assist two self-exiles. In September a high school business teacher was jailed for 3 months for saying that the head of the civil service should "drop dead" as he was misadvising the President.

Parliament rarely debates national issues such as foreign policy. Government and KANU action against outspoken politicians, clergymen, and lawyers, as well as the detention provisions of the PPSA and the 1988 amendment, discourage public exchange of views on political topics the Government considers sensitive. Sharp government criticism of churchmen who opposed government policies continued in 1989 (see Section 2.c.). At the end of the year, the leader of the Green Belt movement was heavily criticized by politicians and government officials for her criticism of the plan to construct a 60-story building on open space in central Nairobi. The movement was evicted from its government-owned headquarters on 1 day's notice (see also Section 5).

The single television and all radio stations are owned and controlled by the Government. In June after the Daily Nation newspaper was barred by Parliament from covering house proceedings, the Voice of Kenya Press Review program dropped its coverage of Nation news stories, allegedly on State House instructions, for the 4-month period the Nation was barred. Previously the Press Review program had highlighted main articles in all three English-language dailies.

Privately owned newspapers and journals are published in Kenya, and newspapers, magazines, and books from abroad are readily available. There is no systematic censorship of the press, although the press practices self-censorship and confines its commentary within usually understood but legally undefined limits. The press criticizes some government policies and occasionally government officials but never the President.

At times the Government intervenes to tell editors how to handle sensitive stories. As former Assistant Minister in the now-defunct Ministry of National Guidance and Political Affairs Shariff Nassir commented, "although there is press freedom in Kenya, editors should not be left to write whatever they want." In December 1988, Financial Review editor Peter Kareithi was picked up from his office by plainclothes police, locked up for several hours, questioned, and then released. Later, in April 1989, this popular weekly news/economics publication was banned after it published controversial articles on the Government's economic policies. Financial Review Limited, publishers of the magazine, were also proscribed from publishing under any other trade name.

In August the Government banned another magazine--the Nairobi monthly Development Agenda. The magazine, only two issues old, focused on the economy and current events. Unlike the negative publicity which preceded the banning of the Financial Review, the banning of Development Agenda occurred with no warning; no Kenyan, official or private, had publicly criticized the publication prior to its banning, and the Government made no effort to explain the banning or offer any justification for it.

The most salient example of curbs on press freedom occurred in June when Parliament barred for 4 months the largest-circulation English newspaper, Daily Nation, from covering proceedings of the National Assembly. Parliamentary criticism, which appeared to be well-coordinated, echoed criticisms which had been made by the President several weeks earlier. Members of Parliament (all of whom belong to KANU) debated accusations against the paper's owners and editors, including biased, inaccurate, and critical reporting; foreign ownership (with a subtheme of encouraging foreign reporting against Kenya's interests) and an unduly high percentage of ethnic Kikuyu management.

KENYA

In August, after a year of court delays, the Government conceded the appeal of Bedan Mbugua, former editor-in-chief of the proscribed Christian magazine Beyond (banned last year). Mbugua had been charged and convicted of failure to file annual financial returns. However, it was widely believed that the real reason for the banning was his publication of an article criticizing queue voting and KANU's conduct during the 1988 elections. Mbugua had served 14 days of his 9-month sentence before being released on bail pending appeal. The judicial procedure followed in Mbugua's case was highly irregular. Rather than make a determination on the merits of the appeal, the deputy public prosecutor requested that the court set aside the conviction and sentence. Beyond magazine remained banned at the end of the 1989.

More than 100 foreign journalists representing Western news organizations are based in Kenya. In 1989 the Government continued to criticize the foreign press for its coverage of Kenyan issues. Local reporters increasingly came under attack as well.

While there are no legal restrictions on academic freedom, there are a number of de facto ones. The Government has employed students and professors to monitor classroom exchanges. Past detentions and trials of students and professors for alleged seditious activities have inhibited academic inquiry that might be construed as critical of the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly, while provided for in the Constitution, is seriously limited by the Public Order and Police Act, which gives authorities power to control public gatherings, defined as meetings of three or more persons. It is illegal to convene an unlicensed meeting, and politicians have been arrested for violations of this Act. Although licenses to hold public meetings are rarely denied, Bishop David Gitari had difficulty obtaining permits to conduct fundraising meetings for his church. Bishop Okullu was roundly criticized by the Government for supporting the right of students to protest peacefully.

Freedom of association is governed by the Societies Act which states that every association must be registered or exempted from registration by the registrar of societies. Some groups have had difficulty obtaining registration or have been deregistered. With the exception of civil servants, who are required to join KANU, Kenyans are not legally bound to join any political organization. Although the party and the Government emphasize that it is voluntary, KANU party membership is a prerequisite for voting and holding public office. No other political party is permitted.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Kenya has no state religion. Freedom of worship is acknowledged in the Constitution and generally allowed. Foreign missionaries of many denominations are permitted to work in Kenya, though on occasion the President and other officials have publicly questioned the motives of certain missionaries and accused them of interfering in politics.

KENYA

Four American missionaries were deported in 1989. The four were affiliated with Associated Christian Churches of Kenya (ACCK), a U.S.-based missionary group which was deregistered in 1988. The Government maintained that the four missionaries were working in Kenya illegally.

Churches new to Kenya must obtain government approval to be registered. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints has tried without success for 8 years to obtain registration. In 1987 the Jehovah's Witnesses were deregistered but continued to hold services under a stay order from the High Court.

There is no religious requirement for voting or holding office. Clergymen in Kenya have spoken out on political as well as religious issues from their pulpits. In 1989 senior officials sharply criticized certain clergymen, including Anglican bishops Alexander Muge, Henry Okullu, David Gitari, and Presbyterian Church of East Africa Reverend Timothy Njoya for making political statements. In April, 30 armed thugs raided Bishop Gitari's home, and KANU youths disrupted a sermon given by the prelate. The attacks came after Gitari referred in a sermon to the blatant rigging of the February elections in Kiharu district. The results of a State House-commissioned police inquiry into the attack on Gitari's house, which allegedly found that the raid was organized by a local government official, were not made public. In August Reverend Timothy Njoya was summoned to appear before the Nyeri District security committee and questioned for nearly 4 hours.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Although most Kenyans can travel freely within the country, the Government has in the past used the PPSA to limit the movement of persons deemed to be dangerous to the public security. Persons traveling by road to sections of Northeastern Province are required, due to the prevalence of highway banditry in the area, to travel in convoys headed by Kenyan police.

Kenya does not generally prohibit emigration of its citizens but on occasion does prevent travel abroad, usually by critics of the Government. In particular, it sometimes refuses to return passports or issue new ones to people detained under the PPSA for some time after they are released. The Government does not regard the issuance of passports to citizens as a right and reserves the authority to issue or deny passports at its discretion. In 1989 lawyers Gibson Kamau Kuria and Paul Muite were still unable to obtain their passports. Kuria, who had been jailed for 9 months in previous years after defending three political detainees, has been forbidden to leave Kenya since his arrest 2 years ago (see Section 4).

During 1989 there was no known instance in which citizenship was revoked for political reasons. In the case of Idris Osman, an ethnic Somali, the Government alleged that he had obtained his Kenyan passport by illegal means (see Section 1.d.). In December two additional ethnic Somali businessmen were deported under similar circumstances.

In 1989 Kenya continued to accept some refugees for permanent resettlement, though its acceptance rate dropped from 90 percent in 1988 to under 10 percent in the first half of 1989, subsequently increasing to 50 percent for the rest of 1989. In 1989 the Kenyan Government stopped accepting virtually all Ugandans for permanent resettlement. On April 5, Kenyan officials entered a refugee camp outside Nairobi, rounded up 238 Ugandan refugees, and forcibly returned them to Uganda. Although the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) protested the deportations, the Kenyan Government publicly maintained that the refugees had volunteered to return to Uganda.

In September an estimated 3,000 Somalis fled into northeastern Kenya near the town of Liboi to escape fighting around the Somali border town of Doble. In late September, 60 Somali refugees were involuntarily returned to Somalia. During this time the Government refused to permit the UNHCR and the Kenyan Red Cross to travel or provide food to the Liboi area. In November the Government reversed its decision and decided to permit the UNHCR and the Red Cross to travel to the area. By the end of the year unfavorable weather conditions, an impassable road, and a flooded airstrip prevented UNHCR travel to the border.

In an effort to control the refugee presence (around 12,000), the Government initiated a series of procedures which confined mandated refugees (i.e., refugees not accepted by Kenya and awaiting resettlement to a third country) to the Thika refugee camp. The Government also started limiting refugee cards to 2 years' duration rather than giving refugees indefinite or permanent resettlement.

Citizens cannot change the system of government in Kenya or replace the party in power through the electoral process. The Constitution prohibits formation of any political party other than KANU, and President Moi and a small group of advisers control all major policy decisions within the Government and the party. Since 1964, when Kenya adopted a presidential system, the party's candidate for President has been unopposed. President Moi was reelected in 1988 to a third 5-year term. Numerous candidates compete in party and parliamentary elections--also held every 5 years--but all candidates must be KANU members, and the national party headquarters has exclusive authority to approve candidates for political office.

In 1988 KANU adopted a controversial queuing system for electing KANU nominees. It requires voters to line up in public behind photographs of the candidates. Only those voters who have KANU membership cards are permitted to participate in the nomination process. KANU members comprise at most 50 percent of the voting age population. Candidates who receive 70 percent of the vote in the queuing stage are automatically elected without having to contest the second-stage secret ballot election. In the 1988 elections, one-third of the candidates were elected in this manner.

The public nature of the queuing process continues to raise obvious questions about voter intimidation. In the 1988 elections none of the candidates known to be critical of government/party policies was elected. Allegations regarding the abuse of secret ballots continue as well. There were 24 petitions filed contesting the results of the 1988 races. The High Court did not begin hearing the petitions until 1 year after the elections: 10 were withdrawn by the petitioners, 11 were dismissed by the High Court on technical grounds, and 3 were won by the petitioners.

KANU party branches, which often take their cues from State House, have the power to suspend or expel members from the party. There are no clear guidelines for activities requiring disciplinary action. Thus party officials wield significant power and can remove their political opponents from the party. Since party membership is required to hold public office, expulsion from KANU signifies political death, at least for the short term. Expelled officials may eventually be allowed back into the party but then are expected to adhere to party policies.

In an extensive June 1989 KANU purge, 14 party members, including former Vice-President Josephat Karanja, several former cabinet ministers and 4 sitting Members of Parliament were expelled from the party, thereby precluding their participation in Kenyan politics. By-elections were held to fill six vacant parliamentary seats. In two constituencies, the voting was marred by violence and allegations of polling irregularities. In two others, it was characterized by voter apathy and extremely low turnouts.

The February by-election in Kiharu (necessitated by a resignation from Parliament in December) was perceived by many Kenyans as the most blatantly unfair of recent political contests. In that by-election G.M.K. Mweru was declared the winner (over Julius Kiano) with over 70 percent of the queue vote in the party election, although the press reported credible accounts which indicated that Mweru actually polled no more than 800 votes to Kiano's approximately 9,500. (Kiano was later named to head the Kenya Broadcasting Corporation.) Local KANU officials who spoke out against the election results later recanted after being threatened with expulsion from the party. Despite protests by local KANU party and church officials and petitions circulated among voters, the results in this election were sustained.

The Sabatia seat left open by Moses Mudavadi's death was filled by Mudavadi's son, Musalia Mudavadi, without an election. KANU party officials exhorted voters to elect the young Mudavadi unopposed. The candidates who had voiced an interest in the seat backed out of the race, thereby paving the way for Mudavadi to take the seat without a contest.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government reacts negatively to criticism of its human rights record and discourages Kenyans from providing outside human rights groups with information. President Moi has publicly attacked Amnesty International and other groups for "meddling" in Kenya's internal affairs.

In December 1988, two American lawyers from the Lawyers Committee on Human Rights sought and obtained high level appointments with government officials to discuss human rights concerns. In March a delegation from the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Center visited Kenya to present lawyer Gibson Kamau Kuria with the RFK human rights award. The group met with President Moi and other high-ranking government officials and was able to move about freely in Kenya to speak to human rights advocates. Although the presentation of the award was freely conducted before a large audience, the press conference given by Kerry Kennedy on their last day provoked a series of virulent anti-Kennedy parliamentary speeches and a week-long anti-Kennedy press campaign.

Several Kenyan organizations, such as the Law Society of Kenya and churches, address issues related to human rights, but none focuses exclusively on human rights concerns. Kenya has not ratified the Organization of African Unity's Human and People's Rights Charter, adopted in 1981 in Nairobi.

Kenya is a diverse country that does not mandate legal discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religion, language or social status. However, in November the Government required all Kenyans of ethnic Somali origin to go through a screening program designed to weed out illegal Somali aliens, who, because the international border traverses areas traditionally inhabited by ethnic Somalis, are indistinguishable from Kenyan nationals of Somali origin. The Government stated the screening was triggered in part by security-related incidents (game park poaching and attacks on tourists) in areas accessible from Somalia. As part of this campaign the Government required Kenyan ethnic Somalis to carry an additional form of identification stating that they have proven themselves to be Kenyan citizens. They are the only ethnic group in Kenya required to do so. Some ethnic Somalis have refused to participate as a matter of principle. The clergy, the Law Society of Kenya, and members of the ethnic Kenyan Somali community criticized the screening process as discriminatory and illegal.

Members of all ethnic groups may run for office, and ethnic representation at the minister and assistant minister level is broad. Twelve of Kenya's ethnic groups are represented in the Cabinet. Members of 18 indigenous ethnic groups and 1 Caucasian hold positions at the assistant minister level.

The Asian community, numbering about 65,000, accounts for a disproportionate share of the nation's economic wealth and output. The Government's policy of Africanization of the economy has resulted in some Asian emigration. Kenya amended its citizenship law in 1984, depriving some Asians and Europeans of citizenship. Under present law, persons born in Kenya of non-Kenyan parents can no longer claim citizenship.

There is no legal discrimination against women, but traditional culture and attitudes have long prescribed limited roles for women. For example, in responding to criticism of the Government by an environmental group (led by a female professor) President Moi in December stated that the African tradition is for women to respect men. Women may own property and businesses. Women's roles are particularly restricted in rural areas where they account for 75 percent of the total agricultural work force.

Polygamy is not legal for people married under the Christian Marriage Act, but it is permitted for those who marry under African customary law. Kenya's law of succession, which governs inheritance rights, provides for equal treatment of male and female children (in contrast to much customary law which favors the eldest male children).

KENYA

Violence against women, especially wife beating, has emerged in Kenya as a fairly widespread and growing problem, according to many doctors. While there are legal remedies, police and judicial authorities are sometimes reluctant to intervene or prosecute husbands who physically abuse their wives. The Government has done little to address this issue beyond general support to women's organizations. In the case of female circumcision, which is still practiced by some Kenyan ethnic groups and is not illegal, the Government officially discourages the practice but leaves it to women's groups to actively oppose female circumcision through health education programs. In December President Moi publicly asked Kenyan communities which still circumcise women to stop the practice. Moi called female circumcision "outdated" and said it was "unacceptable in modern Kenya."

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Civil servants, who comprise 21 percent of total wage earners (and 41 percent of public sector wage earners) in Kenya, have been barred from forming or joining unions since President Moi deregistered their union in the early 1980's. Moreover, since 1985 all civil servants have been required to be members of the ruling party, KANU. Other workers are, by law, free to form and join unions but, except for the Kenya National Union of Teachers (KNUT), all unions must belong to the single trade union confederation, The Central Organization of Trade Unions (COTU). KNUT is a separate organization that maintains "fraternal" relations with COTU. During 1989 the Government considered affiliating COTU to the ruling KANU party. In May 1989 the Government decided that COTU and KANU should "cooperate" rather than be affiliated. The Government, COTU, and KANU agreed that there should be no interference by the party in the collective bargaining process.

The Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) of the International Labor Organization (ILO) has discussed the ban on civil service trade unions for the last several years. In early 1989 the CFA expressed concern at the length of time the Government was taking to follow through on the implementation of "measures to permit the establishment of organizations through which the Kenyan civil servants will be able to pursue normal trade union activities" and asked for an update on the plans originally promised in 1987.

The Government and KANU exercise considerable influence over COTU and through COTU the entire trade union movement. The President has the right to appoint or remove union leaders in COTU for the positions of the Secretary General, the Deputy Secretary General, and the Assistant Secretary General, though it should be noted that the President has not exercised this right and has permitted the unions to select COTU leaders. Union leaders are discouraged but not prohibited from holding political positions. Currently Sam Muhanji, the General Secretary of the Kenya Union of Food, Commercial, and Allied Workers (the largest union in Kenya) and W. Ndumbe, the General Secretary of the Local Government Workers Union are Members of Parliament.

The only workers prohibited by law from striking are members of the armed forces, the police forces, the prison service, and the national youth service. Other workers have the right to strike 21 days after a written report of the dispute is submitted to the Minister of Labor. However, this right is limited by the broad power given the Minister by the Trade Disputes Act whereby the Minister has the authority to require the two parties to go to the industrial court for mandatory arbitration of their differences. Public sector workers are not specifically prohibited from striking, but the Minister of Labor enjoys broad authorities to prohibit public sector strikes. In 1988 there were 92 strikes, mostly illegal wildcat work stoppages occurring at a local level over specific issues, often without permission from the national union and often without providing the Minister with written notification. The Government has not prosecuted trade unionists involved in these wildcat strikes unless criminal activity such as vandalism has taken place. The last public sector strikes in Kenya occurred in 1986 when there were two strikes involving 41 workers with 35 workdays lost.

COTU is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and maintains relations, though not affiliation, with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). It sends observers to meetings of the ICFTU and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

Collective bargaining is protected by law and is freely practiced throughout the country. The only government restriction on collective bargaining is that wage settlements not exceed 75 percent of the rate of inflation. Between 300 and 400 collective bargaining agreements are registered with the Government every year and cover most of Kenya's nonagricultural wage sectors. Most public sector workers are covered by collective bargaining agreements but not the large numbers of civil servants (and some university professors defined as "management"). Although no statistics are available, it is estimated that over 50 percent of Kenya's wage workers fall under a collective bargaining agreement, though less than 20 percent are union members. Kenya does not permit closed shops, and unions have been complaining for years over the problem of "free riders." Although no export processing zones exist at the moment, the Government plans to open two in the near future. No restrictions on worker rights are planned in these zones.

The Government promotes voluntary negotiations between employers' and workers' organizations and encourages workers to join unions. Both in law and practice, union officials are protected against discrimination or penalties based on their union activities. There is an industrial court that would hear such complaints, although there have been none in recent years.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Under the Chief's Authority Act, a local authority can require the performance of limited communal activities for the benefit of the local community. While this provision is rarely invoked, the ILO Committee of Experts has called on the Government to bring this Act into conformity with ILO Forced Labor Conventions (to which Kenya subscribes) and has noted that talks are continuing for the introduction of the necessary amendments. There are a number of provisions in other legislation (e.g., Penal Code, Public Order Act, Prohibited Publications Order, Merchant Shipping Act, and the Trade Disputes Act) which the Committee has found to be inconsistent with the Conventions.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum age for employment is 16. Employment and working conditions in some occupations are limited for those under 18. The minimum age regulations do not apply for agricultural employment, where many children work on family farms, or for domestic work. Although enforcement of child labor laws is lax, child labor is not a problem in the industrial sector or in dangerous occupations given Kenya's high unemployment rate. The Ministry of Labor has difficulty enforcing minimum age laws.

Over 80 percent of the Kenyan work force does not hold jobs in the wage sector and is not covered by minimum wage law. For those covered, there is a complicated minimum wage scheme which is divided by age, locale, and occupation. Currently the minimum wage (last revised June 1, 1989) ranges from $14.50 per month for a rural unskilled worker under age 18 to about $82 dollars per month for a cashier in Nairobi or Mombasa. Wage earners get additional benefits including a 15-percent supplement for housing which is not included in the above minimum wages. A Nairobi wage earner making $50 per month would have a great deal of trouble providing for his family--which most likely is very large since Kenya has one of the highest birth rates in the world. Many families supplement a wage earner's salary by selling agricultural produce or by having additional family members in the work force.

The standard legal workweek in Kenya as defined by the regulation of wages order is 52 hours over 6 days, except for night duty workers who can be employed for up to 60 hours per week. Agricultural workers are exempt from this order. Kenyan labor law requires weekly (not daily) rest periods, full payment for public holidays, 21 days of paid annual leave per year, sick leave (7 days of full pay and 7 additional days of half pay) and 2 months at full pay of maternity leave, though women using maternity leave lose their annual leave for that year. Observance of these regulations is mixed and the Ministry of Labor, which has the obligation to enforce them, acts on the basis of complaints, which are few.

The Government does set health and safety standards for factories, the construction industry, and docks. However, the law does not cover the large agriculture work force where many workers are exposed to dangerous pesticides. The Government is considering a revision of the "factories act" which will expand the act's coverage into the agricultural sector and will update its standards to include regulating the use of new chemical products.

Enforcement of health and safety standards remains a problem. Safety and health inspectors have the legal power to "enter, inspect, and examine, by day or night" a factory where he or she has "reasonable cause" to believe there may be a violation. Inspectors usually respond to worker complaints and try to enforce standards, but rarely do they make surprise inspections of factories. The "factories act" does not contain any language protecting workers who file complaints.

LESOTHO

A six-member Military Council, led by Major General J. M. Lekhanya, has ruled Lesotho since seizing power in a coup d'etat in 1986. The Military Council is firmly in control of the State, but it formally conferred all legislative and executive power on Moshoeshoe II, the previously powerless King of Lesotho. The Military Council and the King rule by decree; however, a predominately civilian appointed Council of Ministers administers the day-to-day operations of government. During 1989, while local elections were held, the military regime continued its ban on genuine political activity and gave no indication of its intention to restore constitutional rule, which was abolished by former Prime Minister Jonathan in 1970.

The Royal Lesotho Defense Force (RLDF) of about 2,000 troops is responsible for internal and border security. The RLDF is assisted by a small police force of roughly equal size. Public security stabilized in 1989, and the Government ended in August its 1988 state of emergency (SOE) against crime.

A landlocked country completely surrounded by South Africa, Lesotho is almost entirely dependent on its neighbor for trade, finance, employment, and access to the outside world. Approximately 60 percent of the adult male labor force is employed in South Africa's mines, and remittances from workers (more than $230 million in 1988) are a critical factor in financing imports.

Human rights in Lesotho in 1989 remained circumscribed. Major concerns included: the use of preventive detention without trial to blunt opposition political activity and restrictions on freedom of speech, assembly, and the right of citizens to change their government through democratic means. In 1989 Military Council Chairman Lekhanya was exonerated for shooting to death a 20-year-old university student who was allegedly fleeing from the campus scene of an attempted rape of a local woman (see Section 1.e.). In a significant development, the Government in February permitted the return of Basutoland Congress Party (BCP) leader Ntsu Mokhehle, following nearly 15 years of political exile, together with hundreds of his followers who were peacefully reintegrated into the local society.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The Government made no progress in identifying the perpetrators or their motives for the brutal 1986 murders of former Ministers of Information and Foreign Affairs, Desmond Sixishe and Vincent Makhele, and their wives. However, a judicial inquiry to investigate the killings was convened in November 1989. Amnesty International has also continued to press for inquiries into the suspicious 1988 deaths, while in custody, of Samuel Hlapo, a hijacker, and Mazizi Maqokesa, a South African exile member of the African National Congress.

During 1989 a number of apparently politically motivated murders took place in several rural areas of southern Lesotho, along the border with the South African homeland of Transkei. On June 9, a passenger bus traveling from Xixondo to Quthing was attacked by five unknown gunmen. Three people were killed, four injured, and the bus was set on fire. In early August, a military vehicle was attacked along the Quthing-Mount Moorosi road by three unidentified gunmen, although no one was killed or injured. Later in the year, at least seven people, mostly merchants and shopkeepers, were killed by unidentified gunmen in the Mohale's Hoek district. Authorities believe that a Transkei-based renegade faction of the Lesotho Liberation Army (LLA), which broke with the BCP and repudiated the leadership of Ntsu Mokhehle, was responsible for the killings. This is the same group held responsible for a 1988 Maseru bus hijacking in which five people--three hijackers and two hostages--were killed.

LESOTHO

There were no reports of politically related disappearances in 1989. Independent and church-affiliated newspapers reported several abductions by South African authorities in Lesotho. Victims reportedly included both criminal suspects and political targets. The Government neither condones nor collaborates with South Africa in these alleged operations.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

SOE powers were exercised arbitrarily in some cases; in 1988 there were frequent reports of police beatings, ill-treatment, and even death of some suspects in custody. The police were granted immunity under emergency regulations against prosecution for any acts committed in the course of their duties. Excesses by law enforcement agencies continued to occur in 1989, including false arrests and ill-treatment of suspects. These excesses, however, did not occur with the same frequency as during the early period of the SOE. Several police officers were tried and convicted for human rights abuses during the year.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Lesotho declared the SOE in February 1988 as a measure to combat rising crime. In April 1988, the High Court annulled the SOE on the basis that the emergency had been illegally declared. Eleven days later, however, the Government renewed the SOE, and the SOE remained in force until August 1989. The Government briefly considered renewing the SOE in December.

The SOE gave the police extensive powers of arrest, search, and seizure without a warrant. Persons suspected of armed robbery and certain other criminal offenses could be detained for up to 14 days and for longer periods on order of the Minister of Defense and Internal Security. Under the emergency regulations, an arrest without a warrant could be made on grounds of "reasonable" police suspicion of the commission of a specified crime. The regulations provided no standards for determining reasonableness, however, and the lack of early judicial review left open the possibility of essentially arbitrary detention.

Even during the SOE, established procedures remained in effect for normal civil and some criminal cases, including the right of a detainee to an early determination of the legality of his detention. The 1981 Criminal Procedures and Evidence Act, as amended in 1984, makes provision for the granting of bail. Under the Act, the High Court is the only judicial body empowered to grant bail in cases of armed robbery or suspected homicide.

In political cases, the Internal Security (general) Act (ISA) of 1984 applies. This Act provides for so-called investigative detention without charge or trial for up to 42 days (the first 14 days on order of the police; the second 14 days on order of the police commissioner; and the final 14 days on order of the Minister of Defense and Internal Security). Detainees may be held incommunicado up to 14 days. During the second stage of the detention, ministerially appointed "advisers" (all government employees to date) report on the health of the detainee, investigate whether the detainee has been involved in subversive activities, and advise the Minister of Defense and Internal Security of the need for continued detention. Detainees under the Act may make representation about their own treatment only through the adviser. The Act also allows for detention of witnesses in security cases.

In addition, a 1986 amendment to the ISA allows the Minister of Defense and Internal Security to "restrict" a person, who, in the opinion of the police commissioner, is conducting himself in a manner prejudicial to public order, security, administration of justice, or obedience to the law or lawful authority. A restriction order limits the movements of a restricted person to a certain location and to certain hours of the day and may prohibit association or communication with other persons.

The Government twice invoked the ISA against perceived political opponents during 1988-1989. One case involved Johnny Wa Ka Maseko, a South African-born editor of the independent newspaper, The Mirror, who was deported from Lesotho in December 1988 after publishing a series of articles on alleged government corruption. Maseko, who had lived in Lesotho since 1980 as a political refugee, was first arrested on October 27, 1988, on charges of criminal defamation. He was released on bail the same day but was rearrested on November 14, held for 4 weeks under the ISA, and then deported for alleged subversion and espionage.

The second case involved Joel Moitse, a university lecturer and former cabinet minister in the previous government, and Majora Molapo, a civil servant in the previous government, nephew of the late Prime Minister Jonathan, and active in the banned Basutoland National Party. The two were detained in May following the publication of a highly critical political tract against the King and his Government. Moitse was released from detention on June 7, just as his detention was being challenged in the High Court. On his release, Moitse was immediately issued with a restriction order and confined to his family residence. The order was lifted after 6 days, but it was the first known restriction order issued by the military Government. Malapo was subsequently released without restrictions.

The military Government's general amnesty for exiled Basotho remained in effect. Following secret negotiations in late 1988, BCP leader Ntsu Mokhehle returned to Lesotho in February 1989. The core element of the BCP military wing, the LLA, was disbanded, except for a small dissident group reportedly based in the Transkei. The return of Mr. Mokhehle and most of his followers represented a major achievement for the Government's policy of national reconciliation. There was no indication in 1989 whether Mokhehle would be permitted to engage in political activity.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary consists of the Court of Appeal, the High Court, magistrate courts, and customary or traditional courts, which exist largely in rural areas to administer customary law. Court decisions and rulings are respected by the authorities and are generally free of interference by the executive. Accused persons have the right to counsel and public trials. The courts have acted to limit infringements of law on numerous occasions in past years, e.g., its April 1988 annulment of the SOE on procedural grounds (but which the Government quickly reinstituted). Under the system of Roman-Dutch law applied in Lesotho, there is no trial by jury. Criminal trials are normally adjudicated by a single High Court judge who presides with two assessors, who serve in an advisory capacity. In civil cases, judges normally hear cases alone. The High Court also provides procedural and substantive advice and guidance on matters of legal procedure to military tribunals; however, it does not participate in arriving at judgments. Military tribunals have jurisdiction only over military cases.

A judicial inquest is initiated by the Attorney General on the authority of the Judicial Inquest Proclamation Number 32 of 1954. In the Lekhanya case, the Chairman of the Military Council shot and killed a 20-year-old university student as the student was allegedly fleeing from the scene of an attempted rape of a local woman. After a controversial 2-month judicial inquest into the circumstances of the death, during which General Lekhanya testified and submitted to cross-examination, the Chairman was exonerated following a judicial finding of justifiable homicide.

There were no known political prisoners in Lesotho at the end of 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Both the 1988 SOE regulations and the ISA provide police with wide powers to stop and search persons and vehicles and to enter homes and other places for similar purposes without a warrant. In 1989 there were some reports of violations of individual privacy by state authorities, but these were greatly reduced from the number reported during the 1988 SOE.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Human Rights Act of 1983 provides for freedom of expression but subordinates this freedom to the needs of national security. Following the 1986 coup, a formal ban on politics was announced with stringent restrictions on freedom of speech and political assembly. In particular, Government Order No. 4 prohibits persons and groups from making political speeches and from publishing or distributing political party materials.

LESOTHO

Despite the ban on organized political party activity, political activists met privately in 1989, and leaders of Lesotho's five principal political parties made individual or joint statements criticizing the military Government and calling for a restoration of civilian rule. Except for the cases of Moitse and Molapo, the Government made no attempt to inhibit such political discussion or activity.

The Government controls the official media (one radio station and a weekly newspaper) and ensures that they faithfully reflect government views. However, the Government rarely uses them to attack its critics, and opposition viewpoints were routinely expressed in 1989 in two Sesotho-language weekly newspapers published by the Roman Catholic Church and the Lesotho Evangelical Church. Also, despite deportation of the editor of The Mirror, it continued to be published in 1989, and was sometimes critical of the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The military Government's ban on "politics" was not interpreted to require the dissolution of existing political parties, but the ban does preclude political gatherings and rallies. Nonpolitical organizations and professional groups are freely formed, even encouraged, and are allowed to hold public and regular meetings.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor organizations, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Lesotho. Free and open religious practice is permitted and encouraged. Christianity is the dominant faith of the majority of Basotho, and Roman Catholicism is preeminent. There is a significant Protestant minority composed of the Lesotho Evangelical Church, the Anglican Church, and a number of other smaller denominations. Conversion is permitted, and there is no apparent social or political benefit or stigma attached to belonging to any particular church. There are no bars to missionary activity or work by foreign clergy.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens generally are allowed to move freely within the country and across national boundaries. There were instances in recent years, however, in which the Government restricted passports for political reasons, but none occurred in 1989. Liberal emigration policies exist, and the Government places no obstacles in the way of its own citizens who wish to emigrate.

The refugee flow from South Africa slowed dramatically in recent years to only a few refugees per month. In 1989 there were only 56 refugee cases, 45 of which were South African. In these cases, persons have been treated fairly, consistent with Lesotho's international obligations. Refugees affiliated with South African liberation movements, however, were given expeditious transit to third countries for resettlement. More than 300 refugees without this affiliation have been allowed to resettle in Lesotho.

LESOTHO

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens of Lesotho currently do not have the freedom to change the existing government, nor do they play a role in national decisionmaking. The military Government, which assumed power in 1986, announced that it intends to remain in power until peace and national reconciliation are fully restored. Neither a time frame for this process has been set, nor has any schedule been announced for constitutional discussions, elections, and a return to civilian rule. Elections for local development councils were contested by persons not officially affiliated with political parties.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has been unresponsive on human rights issues, particularly when the call for outside investigation emanates from the domestic political opposition. Representations by several influential human rights and media organizations in the Maseko deportation case had no effect, but similar appeals, including from the National University of Lesotho staff association, may have been a factor in the decision to release professor Joel Moitse.

There are no internal human rights organizations, either official or nongovernmental. Reports of alleged human rights abuses are sometimes carried in the local press, particularly the church newspapers and Lesotho's sole independent weekly, The Mirror.

Most citizens of Lesotho speak a common language and share common historical and cultural traditions. Nonindigenous citizens have generally married into the Basotho nation, which tends to be inclusive and assimilative. Expatriate communities are small and are not considered to be a major factor in the country's political life. Asians (primarily ethnic Chinese and Indians) and South African whites are active in the country's commercial life. In 1987 the military Government formulated a policy aimed at "localization" of Lesotho's commercial retail trade, and, under the trading enterprise order, called on foreign owners to enter into joint ventures with Basotho nationals. Equity transfers would entail compensation. To date, the "localization" order has not been strictly enforced, due largely to difficulties in identifying local entrepreneurs to take over expatriate-owned businesses and in financing such take-overs, and to concern over foreign reaction.

Political exiles from South Africa, who are often viewed as magnets for South African political or military intervention in the country, are sometimes allowed to remain in Lesotho on condition that they neither engage in political activities nor speak openly and critically about the political situation in South Africa.

The Government has still not seriously addressed the issue of women's rights. In Lesotho these rights are severely limited by both law and custom, including in the area of property, inheritance, and contracts. Under Lesotho's customary law, a married woman is considered a minor during the lifetime of her husband, with all of the legal limitations that this status implies. She cannot enter into any legally binding contract, whether for employment, commerce, or education, without her husband's consent. A married woman has no standing in court and cannot sue or be sued without her husband's permission.

Despite their second-class status, women in Lesotho traditionally have been the stabilizing force in the home and in the agricultural sector, given the absence of over 100,000 Basotho men who work in South Africa. More female than male children complete primary and secondary schools.

Domestic violence, including wife beating, occurs, but, as statistics are not available, the extent of the problem is not known. In Basotho tradition a wife may return to her "maiden-home" if physically abused by her husband; in common law, wife beating is a criminal offense and defined as assault under the 1981 Criminal Procedure and Evidence Act. A 1976 High Court case successfully reversed a Roman-Dutch legal tradition which recognized a husband's right to chastise his wife at will. While the Government has made some attempts to enhance the economic prospects of women, very little direct action has been taken to improve their subordinate status in the society.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Lesotho is a party to the International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 87 on Freedom of Association and Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining. At least one new union was formed in 1989 to organize construction workers for the mammoth $2-billion Highlands Water Project.

Roughly 60 percent of Lesotho's active male labor force between the ages of 20 and 44 work in the Republic of South Africa, mainly in gold and coal mines. At least 70 percent of the remainder are engaged in traditional agriculture. The rest are employed mainly by the Government and in small industries in Lesotho. A majority of Basotho mineworkers are members of the South African National Union of Mineworkers (NUM). Because the NUM is an extraterritorial worker organization, it is not permitted to engage in union activities in Lesotho.

There are two trade union federations in Lesotho, the Lesotho Congress of Free Trade Unions (LCFTU) and the Lesotho Federation of Trade Unions (LFTU). The much larger LCFTU encompasses 24 affiliated independent trade unions; the LFTU has 4. Like its predecessor, the current Government supports the formation of a single, umbrella trade union center, and since 1988 has stepped up its efforts to broker a merger between Lesotho's two competing federations. The immediate catalyst for this renewed interest was the embarrassing dilemma faced by the Government recently in deciding which federations should represent Lesotho at international conferences. More fundamentally, the Government believes that the size of Lesotho's work force does not warrant the more than 30 existing labor unions and would like to see these consolidated. A merger would also eliminate competition among unions in their negotiations with employers, and enhance the bargaining power of the work force. There are, however, deep philosophical, political, and ideological differences between the two federations, reflecting the historical differences of the two political parties with which they are affiliated. As the federations were unable to reach agreement in 1989, the Government is considering legislation to force the desired merger.

While a legal right to strike exists for workers in nonessential services, in practice the procedure for calling a strike is so lengthy and cumbersome that it discourages legal strike actions and accounts for the prevalence of wildcat strikes. The 1964 Trade Union and Trade Disputes Act enumerates lengthy procedures which must be followed before a strike is called. The last general strike was in 1961. There were several wildcat strikes in 1988 and 1989 against both foreign and domestic companies, mostly over wages and conditions of work. Usually, wildcat strikes have been of short duration and ended in compromise, although a 1988 strike at the government-owned Lesotho flour mills ended with the dismissal of more than 300 employees. In 1989 workers went on strike against a South African construction firm building an access road to the Highlands Water Project. The workers were protesting differential wage and working conditions and the employment of large numbers of South African workers; the action turned violent and resulted in serious injury to two workers.

The LCFTU is a member of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council, the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The LFTU has fewer international affiliations but is becoming more active internationally. Aside from a 1987-1988 prohibition on the travel of LCFTU Secretary General Jonathan, the Government has placed no obstacles to international affiliations or foreign travel for labor union-related purposes.

In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) asked the Government to report if the SOE was still in effect, and whether any regulations had been adopted under this legislation. The Committee also reiterated its objection to provisions of the Essential Services Arbitration Act which restricts the right to strike and applies compulsory arbitration to disputes in the banking industry.

All trade unions in Lesotho enjoy the right to organize and bargain collectively. These rights were established in the 1964 Trade Union and Trade Disputes Act and in the 1967 Employment Act, as amended in 1977. There is also an unfair labor practices tribunal whose mandate is to investigate unfair labor practices and safeguard worker rights. A government-appointed labor commission is also charged with, inter alia, monitoring wage and working conditions and accepting, reviewing, and investigating worker complaints.

There is clear recognition in Lesotho, however, that its industrial relations system is outmoded. The Government has been working for several years with the ILO to formulate a comprehensive new labor code. In September, following extensive local tripartite consultations, the Government gave preliminary approval to a draft labor code, which includes 242 separate provisions aimed at bringing the country's labor laws into full conformity with ILO standards promoting collective bargaining and greatly simplifying the worker's right to strike.

Lesotho has several industrial estates grouping together companies, mostly textile and apparel firms, engaged in manufacturing for export. There are no prohibitions against organized labor in these industrial zones, and labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by the 1987 Employment Act and is not practiced in Lesotho.

Fourteen is the legal minimum age for employment in commercial or industrial enterprises. In practice, however, children under 14 may be employed in family-owned businesses. There are prohibitions against the employment of working age minors in commercial, industrial, or nonfamily enterprises involving hazardous or dangerous working conditions. Basotho minors under 18 years may not be recruited for employment outside of Lesotho. Enforcement of all laws is lax.

In Lesotho's traditional society, life and working conditions for the country's young "herdboys" tend to be much more rigorous and demanding than conditions in the modern sector. Their quasi-pastoral life, however, is considered a prerequisite to eventual manhood and is a fundamental feature of Sotho life, tradition, and culture.

Lesotho's 1967 Employment Act spells out basic worker rights, including a 45-hour workweek, a weekly rest period of at least 24 hours, 11 to 12 days' paid leave per year, and pay for public holidays. Employers are required to provide adequate light, ventilation, and sanitary facilities for employees, and to install and maintain machinery to minimize the risk of injury. In practice, these regulations are generally followed only within the wage economy, and enforcement mechanisms are weak.

Wages in Lesotho are extremely low. The Government, through the mechanism of a tripartite wages advisory board, raised minimum wages in 1989 for various types of work. These ranged from $72 a month for light unskilled labor to about $100 per month for semiskilled jobs. The vast majority of wage earners supplement their monthly income through subsistence agriculture and/or remittances from relatives employed in South Africa. Many employers in Lesotho now pay more than minimum wages in an effort to attract and retain motivated employees. Government salaries were raised in 1988 at a percentage increase greater than the 1989 increase for minimum wages. A number of government employees were dismissed in 1989 under the Government's International Monetary Fund structural adjustment program.

In collaboration with the ILO, the Government will begin a 3-year project in 1990 to upgrade its national occupational and health safety standards. This is a regional project which will also include Botswana and Swaziland.

LIBERIA

The Liberian Constitution provides for an American-style democratic system of government and guaranteed rights and freedoms for the individual. However, in practice, Liberia is ruled by Samuel K. Doe, who came to power in a coup d'etat in 1980 and transformed his military regime to a civilian government after being elected President in 1986 in elections widely believed to have been rigged in his favor. He and his ruling party, the National Democratic Party of Liberia (NDPL), with strong backing from the military, increasingly dominate Liberian political life. Three opposition parties are legally recognized and permitted to function, but they continue to protest the Government's conduct of the 1985 elections and decided not to participate in the 1989 by-elections.

The army continues to be a bulwark of the current administration and has major responsibility for internal security functions. Military indiscipline continues to result in harassment of civilians. A small police force is used for maintaining domestic order. At the end of the year, a small group of regime-opponents crossed the Liberian/Cote d'Ivoire border into Nimba county, assassinating local officials and killing unarmed civilians. In responding to these attacks, elements within the Armed Forces of Liberia (AFL) are credibly reported to have ignored orders to avoid attacks on innocent civilians, an unknown number of whom were killed. Both dissidents and AFL troops have largely concentrated their actions against civilian members of ethnic groups not their own. This conflict also resulted in tens of thousands of Nimba County residents seeking refuge in the Cote d'Ivoire.

Liberia's mixed economy is based primarily on traditional agriculture and exports of iron ore, rubber, and timber. It continues to suffer from foreign exchange shortages, widespread corruption, a heavy debt burden, and governmental mismanagement. Nonetheless, in 1989 the private sector rebounded after a long decline that finally bottomed out in 1988. The modest recovery was due in large part to higher world prices for Liberia's two main exports, iron ore and rubber. Prospects for the future of the economy remain clouded by the Government's failure to implement a meaningful structural reform program and uncertainty about export prices.

Despite constitutional guarantees, there were extensive human rights violations in 1989. In addition to the year-end violence in Nimba county, major concerns included the use of arbitrary arrest and detention, military and police abuse and harassment of citizens, and tight restrictions on freedom of speech and press, association and assembly, the right of citizens to change their government, and women's rights. Of particular concern was the slow, steady erosion in press freedom. In June the Government closed another independent media outlet, the Catholic Radio Station, ELCM, which, alone among the independents, had sometimes criticized the Government. Despite the success of a joint government-private accreditation agreement for journalists, the possibility of further government interference with the press was raised by the creation of a government-dominated Communications Commission with the power to revoke media operating licenses. The combination of government/NDPL pressures, which brought opposition defections to the NDPL, and opposition boycotts in both the legislature and in 1989 by-elections moved Liberia closer to a de facto one-party system. In these circumstances, the Elections Commission (made up of former NDPL members) has made little effort to engage in substantive dialog with opposition parties to meet their legitimate concerns. The leader and legal counsel of the banned Liberian Unification Party, William Kpoleh and Ceasar Mabande, jailed after a controversial trial in 1988, remained in prison at the end of 1989; at the beginning of the year, the Supreme Court granted them a new trial.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings in 1989 but both dissidents and government forces killed innocent civilians in the year-end violence in Nimba County. Additionally at least one person died after a beating administered by soldiers, and two persons died in official custody in suspicious circumstances (see Section 1.c.). The Government did not undertake any form of official inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of Major General Podier, a former vice head of state, and several others killed, allegedly in combat, by security forces in 1988.

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Criminal suspects are treated harshly and often receive severe beatings from the police. The constitutional rights of the accused are often ignored. In August several dozen people in Nimba County were reported to have been beaten and robbed by a group of soldiers under the direction of an official of the Ministry of Internal Affairs. At least one person, a woman, died from the mistreatment and several others needed medical attention. The beatings were allegedly carried out at the behest of a local clan chief as part of an investigation into alleged occult activities in the area. Although an investigation found the chief to be culpable, President Doe released him at the end of 1989 as a result of the incursion into Nimba County which allegedly lent credibility to his claims of subversion in the area.

Prison conditions, which have long been dangerous to life and health, did not improve in 1989. Cells are often small and without windows or ventilation. Food, exercise opportunities, and sanitary facilities are grossly inadequate. The maximum security prison at Belle Yella in remote Lofa County is notorious for its harsh regimen, including incommunicado detention. There have been credible reports, including in Amnesty International's (AI) 1989 Report, that a number of prisoners have died at Belle Yella in past years under unexplained circumstances. AI reports indicate that at the Post Stockade, a military detention center in Monrovia, civilian detainees have been held illegally for months and forced to sleep on the floor, without bedding, often covered in excrement. In some circumstances, detainees have had to go without water and food for several days. Although the Constitution states that civilians may not be confined in any military facility, this provision is frequently ignored.

LIBERIA

Two defendants in the General Allison trial (see Section 1.e.), Augustine Fanga and Henry Walker, died in custody under unexplained circumstances. Officials attributed their deaths to their "poor health" on arrival at the prison.

Although police are supposed to have a warrant for arrest, and persons should be charged or released within 48 hours, these constitutional provisions are frequently ignored in practice, particularly in cases involving alleged security threats or violations. Three students were detained without charge for 2 weeks for attempting to revive a student organization (see Section 2.a.). A county superintendent was held without being charged for over a month before being released and reinstated. Members of a jury were jailed for a few days by a judge in a Bong County Criminal Court for bringing in the "wrong" verdict.

In many cases, prolonged detention of persons without charge occurs as a result of judicial inefficiency and administrative neglect. Reports appear from time to time that many of those in Liberian prisons have been "forgotten" by the judicial system and continue to remain in prison although they have never been tried. In May a local lawyer succeeded in gaining freedom for over 30 people so detained in Monrovia Central Prison. A writ of habeas corpus was filed on behalf of a list of 205 persons alleged to have been held without charge, some for as long as 2 years, although some were later found to have been released previously or properly charged. In a series of hearings before a judge, more than 30 prisoners were ordered released unconditionally after it was determined that they had never been properly charged in accordance with their constitutional rights. Reliable sources indicate that at the same time, and possibly because of this case, as many as 50 inmates of Monrovia Central Prison were released by prison authorities, because they too had never been charged.

A number of well-known Liberians, such as Professor Amos Sawyer, who chaired the National Constitutional Commission and headed the now banned Liberian People's Party, remained in exile in 1989, many of them in the United States. Human rights organizations have pointed to the case of Nathaniel Nimley Cholopy, who, after returning to Liberia in December 1987, was immediately arrested and held in incommunicado detention for almost a year in both the Post Stockade and Belle Yella. He was released uncharged in November 1988.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Liberia's civilian court system is based on Anglo-American jurisprudence and features similar judicial bodies, with the Supreme Court at its apex. The Constitution provides for public trials and states that there shall be no interference with the lawyer-client relationship. Nonetheless, the judicial system is often subject to manipulation, and reports of financial or political pressure on the courts are common. Corruption in the judiciary has become almost institutionalized: bribes are often paid to delay cases indefinitely, thousands of which are currently "pending" before the courts. Like government agencies, the judiciary suffers from a severe shortage of the basic tools it needs to do its work, such as office supplies, stenographers, and records of precedent cases.

Despite constitutional provision for separation of powers, the judiciary has a history of succumbing to the wishes of the executive, as in 1987 when President Doe insisted on, and received, the resignation of the entire Supreme Court. Moreover, court orders are not always implemented by executive agencies including the military. In 1988, when a leading political figure and nine other conspirators came to trial before the Criminal Court in August, the military authorities continued to deny them access to legal counsel, in defiance of a court ruling. In cases of persons alleged to have been improperly jailed, prison authorities refused to transport them to the courthouse. In many instances executive authorities often demand fees for performance of judicial duties such as serving subpoenas, collecting witnesses, and executing warrants.

Persons have the right to legal counsel and to bail in noncapital offenses. Where the accused is unable to secure his own lawyer, the court is required to provide legal services, although a lack of resources limits this practice to those accused of "serious" offenses. Litigants have the right to appeal. Traditional courts, presided over by tribal chiefs, are bound neither by common law nor by conventional judicial principles; they apply customary and unwritten law to domestic and land disputes as well as petty crimes. These decisions may be reviewed in the statutory court system or appealed to a hierarchy of chiefs. Administrative review by the Ministry of Internal Affairs and, in some cases, a final review by the President may follow. Allegations of corruption and incompetence in the traditional courts are common.

Several prominent political figures convicted of statutory crimes remained in prison at the end of 1989. The leader and legal counsel of the banned Liberia Unification Party, William Gabriel Kpoleh and Ceasar Mabande, convicted of treason in 1988 after a controversial trial, appealed their sentences to the Supreme Court and remained in prison at year's end pending the Court's decision; they have been granted, however, a new trial.

In the major trial of 1989, a military court sentenced Defense Minister Gray D. Allison to death for ritual murder, although at year's end the sentence had not been carried out. Two of the 10 defendants died in prison as a result of lack of medical attention. They had been delivered to the prison after having been severely beaten by unknown assailants. Allegedly Allison and nine others attempted to obtain human blood for a witchcraft ritual that would enable them to overthrow President Doe. Allison claimed that the accusations were politically motivated. The trial did not meet internationally accepted standards of fairness, even though Allison was allowed defense counsel of his own choosing, and both he and his counsel were allowed to make lengthy statements to the court-martial board. The trial was closed to the public and press, only edited transcripts and television footage of court proceedings were released to the public, and questions were raised about possible coercion of witnesses.

LIBERIA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In 1989 the political and military leadership took action against at least 30 soldiers accused of harassing or mistreating civilians. These included a private who was discharged for striking an American citizen at a checkpoint in April, and Major John Solonteh, the Deputy Provost for the AFL, who was sentenced to a year at hard labor for extorting bribes from local businessmen. The number of disciplinary cases increased from 1988 to 1989. Nevertheless, military harassment and intimidation of civilians at checkpoints remained a continuing problem in 1989. There were random shakedowns of civilians, including outside checkpoints, and occasional episodes of violence. During a municipal clean-up campaign in March, soldiers were observed commandeering vehicles, forcing people to work at gunpoint, and occasionally beating those who resisted. In these instances, no action was taken against the soldiers.

Interference by civil and military authorities in the lives of ordinary citizens occurs on a wider scale in rural areas, where local officials wield considerable power over the day-to-day activities of citizens and proper police and judicial procedures are even less likely to be followed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While the Constitution includes provisions for freedom of expression, including freedom of speech and of the press these freedoms were substantially set back in 1989. The Government closed the major private radio station; and two newspapers closed in 1988 (Footprints Today and The Sun Times) remained closed in 1989. The Constitution also stipulates that persons be held "fully responsible for the abuse" of these rights. Decree 88a, passed by the Military Government in 1984, declares the spread of "rumors, lies, and disinformation" to be a felony. This Decree has not been revoked or challenged in court and is therefore still in force. Government authorities have not invoked the decree in the past 5 years, and no one has ever been convicted of violating it. However, human rights activists point out that this Decree has a chilling effect on freedom of expression and of the press and that the Government has not needed to use it to achieve its objectives.

The Liberian press practices self-censorship. All media refrain from direct attacks on the President and certain other senior government officials. As many as five independent newspapers appeared in Monrovia in 1989, though seldom did more than four publish on any given day. The one government-owned newspaper appears twice weekly. The government-controlled radio and television outlets dominate the news and provide almost no coverage of opposition views, despite constitutional guarantees of access.

In 1989, as in the past, government harassment of journalists, ranging from scuffles with police and confiscation of reporter's film to the overnight detention of one newspaper editor, continues to be a constant theme. In a major development, in June the Ministry of Information, Culture, and Tourism (MICAT) shut down Catholic Radio Station ELCM (one of three independent radio stations in Liberia) for reporting that several people had died in a crowd stampede at a local soccer stadium. MICAT originally demanded a transcript of the report and, when none was forthcoming, closed the station. After some public comments by Catholic Archbishop Michael Francis, President Doe made a speech castigating politically active clerics and decreeing that the station would remain "forever closed," a decision the Church declined to contest. Since the closing of ELCM, there has been a marked decline in the airing of opposition views in either the independent or government broadcast media. The banning of ELCM has left two religiously affiliated, largely apolitical, radio stations: the Sudan Interior Mission-sponsored ELWA and Radio Baha'i.

In practice, sessions of the Liberian legislature remain closed to the public, a restriction of the constitutional right of citizens to be informed about their government. In the waning days of the 1989 legislative session, a bill was passed creating a national "Communications Commission" to "monitor and control" the Liberian media. Although the Commission will have a few members representing private entities, and all of the Board's decisions may be appealed to the courts, the independent press believes the Commission could be used as a censorship tool. The Board will have the power to impose fines and revoke operating licenses; its members will be presidentially appointed, mostly from the ranks of government officials, and its head will be the Minister of Posts and Telecommunications (PTT). One of the organizations to be represented on the board, the Press Union of Liberia (PUL), has already declared that it will not participate due to what it considers to be the unconstitutional mandate of the Commission.

The PUL has been outspoken on a number of media-related issues but also has cooperated with the Government. An agreement between the PUL and MICAT for the joint accreditation of journalists has been in place since May, and at the end of the year there had been no reported problems with attempts to revoke or deny credentials. In May the PUL sponsored a seminar on "The Rule of Law in a Democratic Society" in which speakers discussed frankly the need for strict adherence to the rule of law and specifically criticized the Government for various failures to do so.

Academic freedom is limited. The firing last year of a University of Liberia professor for political statements has inhibited some other academics. All student politics were banned in 1988 by Executive Order Number Two of that year, and the ban on student politics has been incorporated into the University of Liberia's handbook of rules and regulations. Although technically that executive decree has expired, two students were suspended from the University of Liberia in October, and three students were detained without charge for 2 weeks for attempting to revive a student organization. There are no functioning student political organizations, and there has been virtually no open political activity on the University of Liberia campus. The Government initiated an investigation when an NDPL official alleged that opposition United Peoples Party (UPP) teachers had "infiltrated" the schools in rural Rivercess County for political purposes.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitutional right to peaceful assembly and association is observed more often in urban areas than in rural areas. Permits must be acquired for public marches and demonstrations; however, no political party or other group attempted to organize any significant demonstrations in 1989.

In 1989 legal opposition groups did conduct public and private meetings and other organizational activities in the Monrovia area without interference from the Government. Freedom of the opposition to organize and operate in the rural areas is largely dependent on the tolerance of local officials who have considerable discretion in dealing with strictly local issues. The opposition UPP party held several rallies in rural areas in July, with no immediate interference from the Government, although some participants later reported harassment. According to Human Rights Watch, the Government employs intermittent surveillance of opposition figures and the harassment, including arbitrary detention, of many political party members to limit the effectiveness of opposition activity. The U.S. Embassy has no record of party activists being detained in 1989.

A 1986 Supreme Court ruling banned the "Grand Coalition," an ad hoc coalition of the three opposition political parties, claiming it was not organized in accordance with the Election Commission's (ECOM) rules. In July 1989, the heads of the three major opposition parties announced plans to hold a joint meeting, and the elections commission declared that any such meeting would constitute an illegal revival of the banned "Grand Coalition." President Doe, however, reversed the ECOM decision, and the meeting went ahead with no further government interference. Leaders of the various political groupings meet on an informal basis without overt government interference. Opposition activists complain of government harassment, including dismissal from employment, but some prominent opposition members hold government jobs. Civil servants are not forced to join the NDPL, but it is highly advantageous for career advancement.

The Government initiated in 1988 a check-off system for party dues to be deducted from civil servants' paychecks, but participation has thus far been voluntary and erratically conducted. Opposition politicians complain that the Government's ability to award jobs and other patronage gives the NDPL an unfair and unconstitutional advantage. The opposition UPP has demanded that NDPL organizers desist from solicitation of funds from local businessmen, an activity prohibited by the Constitution. ECOM has supported the UPP position, although solicitation may still occur under other guises.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution states that freedom of religion is a fundamental right of all Liberian citizens, and in practice there are no restrictions on this right. No religion has preference over others, and there is no established state religion. Christianity, brought by 19th-century settlers and spread through the interior by missionaries, has long been the religion of the political and economic elite, and many public figures refer to the "Christian principles" on which Liberia was founded. The majority of the rural population continues to practice traditional religions. Approximately 25 percent of the population is Muslim. The Liberian Council of Churches, an organization composed of most of the Christian denominations in Liberia, occasionally plays a prominent role in national affairs.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides every person the right to move freely throughout Liberia and to leave or enter the country at any time. Domestic movement, however, is still impeded by a network of internal checkpoints. The number of such checkpoints decreased sharply in late 1987 but rose again in reaction to alleged coup plots in 1988 and large-scale rice smuggling in 1989. Police and military personnel at these checkpoints routinely search vehicles and often solicit bribes from passengers.

Exit visas are required for all Liberians and most non-Liberians leaving the country. These are routinely issued. A prominent Liberian dissident living in the United States asserted in 1989 that the Government had denied her a passport. There were no reported restrictions on the foreign travel of Liberians in 1989. Despite allegations by human rights groups that the Government maintains a "black list" of persons who may be denied permission to travel or who may be arrested upon their return, there is no evidence of the existence of such a practice.

There are 247 refugees in Liberia. Refugees are not forced to return to the countries from which they have fled. In a few cases in past years, however, the Government sought to deport refugees who became involved locally in political activities. As a result of year-end violence in Nimba County, tens of thousands of residents fled to neighboring countries.

Despite universal suffrage and constitutional guarantees of free and fair elections, there is serious doubt that Liberian citizens are free in practice to change their government democratically. The only national election since the 1980 coup perpetuated the rule of President Doe and was widely believed to have been fraudulent. The Liberian Government is structured along the lines of the American model, with three separate but theoretically equal branches of government, including a bicameral legislature. In practice, the executive branch, and the President in particular, has a preponderant share of power. In recent years the number of military men in government has declined, but the military remains a major force in support of the Doe Government.

The legislature (26 senate seats, 62 house seats) is subject to inordinate executive influence, and lacks the assertiveness, resources, and political will to play its constitutionally mandated role of coequal in governance. In 1989 it passed a number of executive-sponsored bills with little or no debate, confirmed virtually all presidential appointments sent before it, and failed to promote any significant legislative initiatives of its own. The executive, moreover, regularly took budgetary and other actions which the Constitution gives exclusively to the legislature. Opposition parties formally continue to boycott the legislature. A small number of legislators, elected in 1985 on opposition tickets, but taking seats as independents, functions as an informal opposition grouping. Its effectiveness was undercut in 1989 due to the death of its most prominent member and numerous defections to the NDPL.

The Constitution provides for an Elections Commission to monitor all political activities in the country. The elections law empowers the Commission to certify parties, conduct all elections, and count election ballots. The five commission members are appointed by the executive for life and currently are all former members of the ruling NDPL. Citing the widespread fraud that occurred during the 1985 elections, the opposition has in the past called for an independent vote-counting mechanism. When the deaths of two legislators necessitated by-elections in two counties in October 1989, the opposition UPP asked ECOM to amend elections procedures as a de facto condition for participation in the by-elections. ECOM denied any need for changes, and all opposition parties boycotted the by-elections where two NDPL candidates ran virtually unopposed.

The Constitution prohibits creation of a one-party state. Four political parties are officially recognized by the Elections Commission--the ruling NDPL, the United Peoples Party (UPP), the Liberia Action Party (LAP), and the Unity Party (UP). The level of activity of the three opposition parties varies, but in the last 2 years each held conventions or other large party gatherings and expressed its views freely in the press and at public forums. A lack of financial resources crippled their activities, however, and prevented the publication of newsletters on a regular basis. Although the UPP expressed willingness to participate in electoral politics for a few years after the disputed election of 1985, and did participate in one by-election, it abandoned its policy of seeking cooperation in late 1988 and joined with the other two opposition parties in 1989 to boycott the 1989 by-elections.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In recent years the Government has permitted representatives of various organizations, including Amnesty International (AI) and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), to visit Liberia and investigate alleged human rights violations. While it did not respond directly to inquiries from AI about the conduct of General Allison's trial, it permitted a visit by representatives of the Lawyer's Committee for Human Rights at the end of the year.

Although no Liberian organizations currently exist for the express purpose of monitoring human rights developments, the Press Union of Liberia, the Liberian Bar Association, and the Liberian Council of Churches have spoken out on human rights issues in recent years. The Liberian Red Cross routinely visits prison facilities, mostly in the Monrovia area, and in 1988 was permitted for the first time in recent memory to carry medical and sanitary supplies to the isolated maximum security prison at Belle Yella.

The Constitution states that "only persons who are Negroes or of Negro descent" shall qualify by birth or naturalization to be citizens of Liberia. The Constitution further states that only Liberian citizens can own real property. These provisions discriminate against many nonblack residents who were born in Liberia and consider it their home. Otherwise, there is no officially sanctioned discrimination on the basis of race, religion, language, or social status. However, members of President Doe's Krahn ethnic group hold a disproportionate share of high posts in the Government and military and are widely believed to receive preference in competing for lower level jobs.

The status of women varies by region, but sexual discrimination is widespread. In urban areas and along the coast, women can inherit land and property. In interior areas, where traditional ties are stronger, a woman is normally considered the property of her husband and his clan and is not usually entitled to inherit from her husband. In newly urbanized areas, many women are subject to both customary and statutory legal systems.

Violence against women, including wife beating, occurs, but as there are no statistics available, the extent of the problem is not known. Police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes, and cases rarely come before the courts. Female circumcision is widely practiced by the majority of Liberians who follow traditional religions and is tolerated by government authorities.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution states that workers have the right to associate in trade unions. Over 20 labor unions are registered with the Ministry of Labor, representing roughly 15 percent of the monetary sector work force. Ten national unions are members of the Liberian Federation of Labor Unions (LFLU), an affiliate of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The Government does not recognize the right of civil servants or employees of public corporations to unionize or to strike. Many such employees, including teachers and port workers, are represented by employee associations. The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations maintains that the invalidation of the teachers' union charter constituted government interference with members rights to establish organizations of their own choosing.

Although organized labor historically has not had great influence in national politics, in recent years it has begun to assert itself on issues affecting workers' interests. During 1989 the LFLU was again active in lobbying the legislature to pass the new labor code. The code, drafted in 1986 with the cooperation of Liberian unions and the International Labor Organization (ILO), would repeal PRC (military) Decree 12 outlawing strikes. It had been awaiting legislative action for 3 years. The House passed the bill in the last week of the 1989 session, and the Senate was scheduled to take it up early in 1990. Labor unions are constitutionally prohibited from participation in party politics.

In July the Supreme Court put an end to a dispute over the LFLU's May 1988 elections that had been running for more than a year. The losing candidates in those elections had appealed to a civil magistrate and then to the Supreme Court in an attempt to have the election overruled. The Supreme Court eventually rejected the appeal on technical grounds, leaving in place the magistrate's decision that the matter was an internal union affair that the Government had no reason to judge.

Promulgated in 1980, PRC Decree 12 outlawing strikes and any other type of labor unrest is technically still in effect, although there were no significant strikes in 1989 to test the Government's December 1988 assertion that unions are free to strike.

With the important exception of civil servants and employees of public corporations, workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively. In contrast to 1988, there were no reports of government interference in union organizing activities in 1989. The Government promotes union/management negotiations and sometimes provides mediation for disputes arising out of such negotiations. Associations represent worker interests with government and management.

The ILO Committee of Experts (COE) has noted that current labor legislation provides insufficient guarantees against antiunion discrimination and supports the passage of the new labor code as a partial remedy.

Labor laws and practices are applied uniformly throughout the country, including in the unique export processing zone.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced labor, and the practice is firmly condemned by the Government. The COE, among others, has raised questions about the degree of enforcement of that prohibition, especially on rural community development projects. In a broader context, the Government has indicated that the draft labor code will provide for penal sanctions in cases of illegal use of forced or community labor.

The Government prohibits employment of children under the age of 16 during school hours. Enforcement, which is limited, is primarily aimed at the wage sector. There is no enforcement for the many children engaged in the large subsistence farming sector. Only a minority of children regularly attend school.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The labor law provides for a minimum wage, paid leave, severance benefits, and safety standards. The minimum wage for agricultural workers is approximately $0.90 cents per day at the unofficial exchange rate. Industrial workers generally receive three or four times this amount. The minimum wage would not, by itself, be sufficient to insure an adequate standard of living for a worker and his family, but many families have other sources of income or receive support through an extended family system. The maximum hours of work which an employer can require are 8 hours per day or 48 hours per week. Safety standards are not rigorously enforced. A new national pension scheme was implemented in 1988 in which most workers and employers are required to participate.

MADAGASCAR

The Democratic Republic of Madagascar, the fourth largest island in the world, is governed by a president and a parliament (National Popular Assembly), both elected by direct universal suffrage. The President selects the members of the Supreme Revolutionary Council (SRC), the highest policymaking body. President Didier Ratsiraka, in power since 1975, has broad constitutional powers, and his position is further strengthened by the influential role of his political party, the Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution (AREMA), which holds an overwhelming majority in the National Popular Assembly. Prior to December 1989, only the eight parties making up the National Front for the Defense of the Revolution were permitted to engage in political activity. The Front, established in 1976 by the Malagasy Constitution, was conceived as a unifying framework--a form of single confederal party--for building socialism and protecting the "Socialist Revolution" in Madagascar while allowing for party diversity. The political orientation of the eight parties in the National Front ranges from moderate and pro-Western to radical and pro-Soviet. The President and his party gained major victories in bitter 1989 elections, which resulted in further sharp divisions between party leaders of the Front and called into question the future of this unusual institution. As a result on December 20 the National Assembly amended the Constitution to remove the Front's special status.

The Malagasy internal security system is composed of the urban police force and the National Gendarmerie, the latter having jurisdiction in the provinces. On occasion, the National People's Army is also used for internal security purposes.

Agriculture dominates the Malagasy economy, employing some 85 percent of the population and providing about 80 percent of the country's export earnings. Since 1982 the Government, with the assistance of the International Monetary Fund, began to introduce a long-term austerity reform program, inter alia, to stimulate declining agricultural production in basic commodities, especially rice. Despite some progress, economic growth (1.8 percent in 1988) has not kept pace with population growth (3 percent), real incomes have declined, and unemployment remains high, especially among youth (60 percent of the population is under age 25). As a result, the Government's reform program became a major issue in the 1989 presidential and parliamentary elections.

Although a wide range of fundamental liberties and individual rights are called for by the Constitution, there continued to be human rights abuses including extrajudicial killings and mistreatment of prisoners, significant restrictions on freedoms of speech, press, and assembly, and questions as to the ability of citizens to change their government through free and fair elections. However, in February the President did suspend censorship of the media. While there were numerous charges of voting irregularities following the hotly contested presidential race, which was won by the incumbent President with 63 percent of the vote, these elections probably were less subject to manipulation than earlier ones due to the monitoring role played by several independent organizations. Still, there were large demonstrations against the outcome, which resulted in violent clashes with police. Officially, 5 persons died, 70 were wounded, and 64 people arrested. In 1989 the Government scaled back its rural security campaign against bandits after extensive charges emerged in 1988 of summary executions by security forces.

MADAGASCAR

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There have been recurring rumors of politically motivated killings in recent years, but little evidence to substantiate them. During a press conference in August 1989, the President stated that there had been a bomb attempt on his life and that there had been a plot to kill Monja Jaona, an aging opposition leader, and cast blame on the President. However, there was no known followup investigation of these charges.

In 1988 military and police forces undertook a major campaign to eradicate the well-armed and burgeoning cattle rustling and banditry endemic to the southern areas of Madagascar, resulting in on-the-spot executions of captured bandits. In July 1988, Interior Minister Ampy Portos announced that 205 bandits had been killed in government-directed security operations. A number of human rights groups, such as Amnesty International (AI), criticized the summary execution of bandits by the security forces, but there appeared to be no major domestic opposition to the government policy of taking forceful actions against the bandits. However, in 1989 the Government sharply reduced the scope of these operations, although reports of banditry increased at the end of 1989. A 1989 trial brought to the surface allegations of military involvement in cattle rustling operations and connected arms trafficking (see Section 1.e.).

There were no known cases of politically motivated disappearance. However, press reports in August 1989 raised questions about the whereabouts of a university student leader arrested in June and detained at the prison of Tsiafahy. Reportedly, he opposed a proposed Government reform plan for the university. The student, Cyrille Rasambozafy, may have escaped in a major prison break at Tsiafahy in July. The student's parents claim that they have not heard from him since his arrest and fear he may still be held by the authorities. The Government has not responded in any way regarding the missing student.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

While there were no documented cases of physical torture occurring in Madagascar, some organizations in the security apparatus, notably the state secret police, have a reputation for ruthless methods. There have also been credible reports that the armed forces used torture in the Government's campaign against outlaw bandits in Madagascar's southwest.

Malagasy prisons are increasingly inhumane in terms of living conditions. Some prisoners are not fed regularly, hygiene is totally lacking, and medical care is not provided. As a result, prisoners suffer a range of medical problems from malnourishment and infections to malaria and tuberculosis. The death toll rises significantly among prisoners during the cold winter months. The Minister of Justice has appealed for foreign assistance to ameliorate these conditions by making prisons self-supporting agricultural and small industrial units.

MADAGASCAR

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In a normal criminal case, the accused must be charged or released within 3 days after arrest. Generally, defendants in ordinary criminal cases are charged formally within the specified time frame and, upon being charged, are allowed to obtain an attorney. Counsel is readily available, and court-appointed counsel is provided for indigents.

Under Malagasy law, persons suspected of activity against the State may be detained incommunicado for 15 days, subject to indefinite extension if considered necessary by the Government. In particular, the Government has held detainees in security cases for extended periods, as with 37 kung fu adherents held from 1985 until their trial and eventual release in 1988. (In 1984-85, these martial arts enthusiasts had been involved in street fighting with a paramilitary youth group and the army.) Also, certain defendants involved in coup-plotting cases have been held in pretrial detention for periods ranging from 20 months to over 5 years.

Since the release of the kung fu defendants, there has been no evidence of other arbitrary political detentions. The Government briefly detained a number of persons after massive demonstrations held in April to protest the presidential electoral outcome and government economic policies.

Exile has not been used as a means of control in the recent past.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Malagasy Constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and in practice the judiciary seems to function in most cases without outside influence from the executive. The judiciary has three levels of courts: lower courts for civil and criminal cases carrying limited fines and sentences; a court of appeals which includes a criminal court for cases bearing sentences of 5 years or more, and a Supreme Court. The judiciary also has a number of special courts designed to handle specific kinds of cases under the jurisdiction of the higher courts. A Constitutional High Court, with a totally separate and autonomous status, may review the constitutionality of laws, decrees, and ordinances and ensures the legality of elections.

A Military Court has jurisdiction over all cases involving national security. The definition of national security is largely a matter of interpretation by the authorities but includes acts constituting a threat to the nation and its political leaders, invasion by foreign forces, and riots that could lead to an overthrow of the Government. In exceptional cases, civilians may be tried in the Military Court if they are charged with having broken military laws.

Military courts, like civilian courts, provide for an appeals process. Furthermore, military courts are presided over by a civilian magistrate. The rank of the four military officers comprising the court is determined by the rank of the accused.

In 1989 two bandits accused of the mass-murder of 11 persons for the proceeds from a cattle sale were tried and sentenced to death by a military court. While the death penalty is legal in Madagascar, it has not been carried out since 1947. The particular viciousness of this crime and the popular outrage it evoked may result in these death sentences being carried out. The trial, known as the "keliberano affair," also brought to the surface allegations of military involvement in cattle rustling operations and connected arms trafficking. The presiding judge called for an investigation and a hearing on these charges. On November 15 the court of Fianarantsoa rendered light sentences of 6 months to a year for those involved in supplying the weapons used in the keliberano killings.

There are currently no known political prisoners in Madagascar.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The State does not generally intervene in nonpolitical aspects of the lives of the people. The home is traditionally inviolable under Malagasy law. However in December 1989, Article 42 of the Constitution was amended to permit authorities to enter the home in cases of persons caught in the act or where the occupants explicitly consent to a search. In their suppression of cattle rustlers and bandits the military have entered some homes without court orders and ransacked them.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms remain significantly restricted despite the loosening of press censorship. Private citizens who criticize government officials or policies must choose their words carefully; direct criticism of the President or the "Socialist Revolution" is not tolerated.

The broadcast media are under state control and provide positive coverage of the Government's activities. While the opposition received some coverage in the presidential and legislative elections of 1989, many observers felt that it was dwarfed by the nightly reports on the activities of the President and his AREMA Party.

In past years, the Ministry of Interior has reviewed and censored the content of newspapers prior to printing. On February 19, 1989, the President suspended censorship restrictions on the print media, and journalists have cautiously been testing their newfound freedom. To become permanent, this suspension still requires passage of a law by the National Assembly. Thus, there is a moratorium on censorship, and the President's ability to restore controls at a moment's notice continues to moderate press criticism and comment of Government policies. The press, in contrast to television and radio, did give broad coverage to the election campaigns and related demonstrations.

In 1988 the Government allowed previously barred journalists from a foreign newspaper to visit Madagascar, and it lifted an 8-year-old ban on the Paris-based weekly Jeune Afrique. There is one government-owned newspaper and two major independent dailies. Several other dailies and weeklies are published by party groups and independent publishers, including the outspoken and candid Catholic newspaper, Lakroa.

MADAGASCAR

Academic freedom is restricted by a constitutional prohibition on any public lectures or teachings which condemn Madagascar's Charter of the Socialist Revolution.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The rights of assembly and association are restricted. Permits are required to hold public meetings and can be denied by the Government if officials believe that the meeting poses a threat to the State or endangers national security. Those denied a permit can appeal these decisions before the administrative chamber of the Supreme Court. Persons and groups belonging to parties of the National Front are permitted to organize and assemble. Nevertheless, since political activity by groups outside the National Front was prohibited, dissenting political opinion has been limited. In 1988 the Government banned an organization affiliated with the Catholic Church (the CEADAM) from holding a national political debate on the state and future of the nation.

Madagascar's campuses continue to constitute a major source of instability for the Government. The range of problems runs from inadequate finances and logistics to overcrowding, ethnic tensions, and squatters. While the widespread student unrest which took place in 1987 has not recurred, the University of Antananarivo campus became the site for popular demonstrations against President Ratsiraka's reelection in April 1989.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government is secular, and there is no official religion. There is no discrimination on the basis of religious affiliation, and people are free to follow the faith of their choice. Over half of the population is Christian, with the remainder following traditional Malagasy religious beliefs or other faiths. Missionaries and clergy are generally permitted to operate freely.

During the visit of Pope John Paul II to Madagascar in late April, several days of violent political demonstrations, protesting the presidential election results, were suspended by the opposition to ensure a peaceful visit.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Officially there is no restriction on travel within the country. However, since May 1988, the start of the campaign to eradicate cattle rustling, villagers in the southwest reportedly must get permission to leave their villages. For all Malagasy, official approval must be obtained for trips outside the country. Foreign travel is impeded by the difficulty of obtaining foreign currency. The Malagasy franc is not convertible abroad, and the Government limits the amount of hard currency that can be obtained for foreign travel. There is no refugee population in Madagascar.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The right of citizens to change their government was called into question by widespread allegations of fraud in the presidential elections. Moreover, the electorate's choice had been constrained by the nature of the political system since, prior to December 20, 1989, the only political parties allowed to operate had to be members of the National Front. The situation is, however, expected to change when new implementing decrees are elaborated to define political activity outside the Front (see below). The electoral process provides the voters a chance to choose among candidates expressing differing views in local and regional elections, as well as in the parliamentary and presidential campaigns. The 137 members of the National Popular Assembly are elected by universal suffrage for 5-year terms. The President is elected to a 7-year term. The President's party has total political control of the apparatus of government. This is partly due to political apathy and a sense of defeatism as expressed in increasing voter absenteeism which reached over 50 percent in the last round of local elections. The President controls all major policy decisions. Most legislation is initiated by the executive branch.

On March 12, 1989, some 4.7 million Malagasy went to the polls to choose from among four presidential candidates. According to the official results, pronounced a month later by the Constitutional High Court, President Ratsiraka won a third consecutive 7-year term with an absolute majority of 63 percent of the votes cast. There was widespread dissatisfaction with this outcome. Opposition leaders claimed fraud and organized rallies protesting the election results. Violent demonstrations erupted and claimed four or five lives. The election results were subsequently contested in the Constitutional High Court, which sustained voter irregularity appeals in 43 cases of the several hundred brought before it. Most of the challenges were denied on technical grounds (e.g., improper filing procedures). The May 28 legislative elections reinforced the President's hand as his AREMA Party consolidated its already preponderant hold on the Assembly with a 120-seat victory. The legislative elections were peaceful. However, due to widespread voter dissatisfaction as evidenced in the earlier presidential elections, there was a low voter turnout. In September local government elections were marked by an even lower voter turnout and led to further AREMA party consolidation.

On December 20, 1989, the National Assembly amended the Constitution. It rescinded Articles 9 and 29 concerning the Front which results in this institution no longer being an official institution of the Malagasy Government but rather a simple alliance of parties which support the President and his Socialist policies. New parties may also now apply to join the Front. Furthermore, an amendment to Article 8 allows for opposition parties to exist outside the Front. However, opposition parties must not have as their objective the undermining of the unity of the nation or as their platform a separatist ethnic, tribal, or religious character. Moreover, a revised Article 16 states that opposition parties cannot oppose Malagasy socialism by illegal or violent means.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has not officially cooperated with groups, either externally or internally based, wishing to investigate alleged human rights violations and has denied visas to AI representatives. In 1989 the President ruled out the suggestion that international observers be present at the polls on March 12, saying that the Malagasy are quite capable of managing their own electoral affairs. Originally, the Union of Malagasy Opposition in Exile (based in Paris) made a public call in 1988 for the presidential elections to be overseen by U.N. observers.

Human rights organizations are considered to be political groups under Malagasy law and must therefore be sponsored by one of the parties belonging to the National Front. Under these circumstances, only one human rights organization is currently operating in Madagascar: The Malagasy National Committee for the Defense of Human Rights which was founded in 1988 and is affiliated with the VITM Party, one of the smaller parties. Some of its members are also on the National Committee for Election Observation which monitored electioneering in 1989.

The Christian churches in the country have taken the lead in advocating human rights and play an important supplementary role in monitoring human rights concerns. The Christian Council of Churches in Madagascar (FFKM) is a major organization in this regard. In February 1988, the FFKM monitored the celebrated kung-fu trial to assure that due process was provided to the 245 accused. It also provided lodging and food for the defendants. In 1989 this organization provided a monitoring role, where possible, in the presidential and legislative elections. It also publicized and condemned those irregularities which it witnessed.

Madagascar is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

Madagascar is inhabited by an estimated 10.3 million people of both Malayo-Polynesian and African origin. While there appears to be no customary practice of institutional or systematic discrimination on the basis of ethnic grouping in Madagascar, a serious outbreak of violence and plunder of Indo-Pakistani-owned property occurred across Madagascar in March 1987. This prosperous community, estimated at some 24,000 persons of Indo-Pakistani origin and referred to locally as "karana," is primarily engaged in commerce. While no Indo-Pakistanis died in these riots, several looters were killed, many were wounded, and property damage was great. The simultaneous outbreak of these riots in cities across the island and the relative absence of damage outside the Indo-Pakistani community gave rise to some speculation that these incidents had been carefully coordinated and organized by the Government. The Chinese and French communities also have experienced some resentment from the Malagasy, mainly because of their success in commerce.

Women have traditionally played a prominent role in the business and economic life of the country, with many of them managing or owning business concerns or filling management positions in state industries. Education at all levels is open to women. However, women in rural areas and among the urban poor face a greater degree of hardship. In addition to the responsibilities associated with raising a family, the realities of subsistence agriculture force these women to engage in farm labor and related activities.

While women are not discriminated against in the workplace, discrimination does exist in marriage and property rights. In the case of divorce or the death of the husband, the wife inherits only one-third of their joint wealth. On the other hand, the wife receives a pension if her husband dies, but the reverse is not true. Women's rights groups do not exist, but groups of professional women and women within the political parties are working to change these aspects of family law. On December 12, 1988, Madagascar became a signatory of the U.N. Charter on Eliminating Discrimination Towards Women.

According to various sources, including magistrates, journalists, and women doctors, violence against women, such as wife beating, is not widespread, and neither the Government nor party women's organizations have addressed this issue specifically. The society frowns on marital confrontation. Married couples generally prefer to avoid divorce and, if necessary, to live separate lives under one roof. In very few divorce cases is there an allegation of physical abuse that could be construed as wife beating. In the rare cases where this condition is detected, police and legal authorities do intervene. However, there is no law dealing specifically with violence against women. Female circumcision is not practiced in Madagascar.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Malagasy have the right to establish and join labor unions. However, the labor force of 4.9 million is mostly agrarian (85 percent), and unionized labor accounts for less than 5 percent of the total. Seven of the national labor organizations in existence are affiliated with the eight political parties within the National Front for the Defense of the Revolution. Two independent unions in 1979 signed a protocol of agreement with the dominant political union belonging to the President's party, pledging support for the Malagasy "Socialist Revolution." The primary focus of the unions is party politics, and they are usually active only during election campaigns. Overall, labor unions play an insignificant role in national life.

Public servants may not form independent trade unions but may join "Malagasy Revolutionary Organizations" (ORM's) under the supervision of the Government. Under the Charter of Socialist Undertakings of 1978 workers' committees are established, but preferential access to these is extended to the members of trade unions belonging to one of the ORM's of the National Front for the Defense of the Revolution. In 1989 the Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) asked the Government to take appropriate measures to ensure that public servants can establish organizations without prior authorization or other restrictions. It also asked the Government to introduce legislation explicitly guaranteeing the trade union rights of seafarers.

Workers have the right to strike, but in reality, strikes in Madagascar are a rarity because of the severe unemployment problem and the politicization of the labor federations. However, there are occasional wildcat strikes. In these, the Government generally sides with management for the restoration of order. The Labor Code, which covers all workers except civil servants and merchant marine employees, prescribes an arbitration procedure which must be followed in labor/management disputes. Should this procedure not lead to a settlement, workers individually, or as represented by a union, may call a strike.

In 1989 the SECES, a labor union comprised of university professors and researchers, went on a major strike over its dissatisfaction with general working conditions at the nation's six universities. It used the withholding of examination results from students as leverage in its dealings with Ministry of Higher Education officials. On August 26, a communique issued by the SECES explained that the freeze on examination results had been lifted because some of its demands had been met.

Several of the unions are members of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions or of the World Confederation of Labor. One union, the Confederation of Malagasy Workers, has links with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Union activity is governed by the Malagasy Labor Code of May 18, 1975, which guarantees free unions and the right to bargain collectively. Article 4 of the Labor Code formally prohibits antiunion discrimination by employers against union members and organizers. According to Article 132 of the Labor Code, collective bargaining may be undertaken between management and labor at either party's behest. When there is failure to reach agreement, the Ministry of Labor convenes a nonconciliation committee which attempts to resolve differences. If this process fails, the committee refers the matter to the chairman of the First Circuit Court for final arbitration.

There are no export processing zones in Madagascar, although legislation providing for such zones was approved by the National Popular Assembly at the end of 1989.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is explicitly prohibited by Article 2 of the Malagasy Labor Code. There is no forced or compulsory labor in Madagascar within the definition set forth by the ILO. Madagascar is a signatory to ILO Convention 29 prohibiting forced labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Malagasy Labor Code describes a child as any person, regardless of gender, under the age of 18. The minimum age for employment is 14, but the use of child labor is prohibited in those areas where there is apparent and imminent danger. The Government enforces these child labor laws in the small wage sector through the Ministry of Civil Service, Labor, and Social Law. However, in the large subsistence agricultural sector many young children work with their parents on family farms at much earlier ages. Similarly, in the urban areas many children earn a living as parking attendants, newspaper vendors, etc.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Malagasy Labor Code and its enforcing legislation describe the working conditions for employees. Malagasy law distinguishes between agricultural and nonagricultural work. There is a 44-hour workweek in nonagricultural and service industries. There are also provisions for holiday pay, sick and maternity leave, and insurance. There are several minimum wage rates in Madagascar according to categories of work. The lowest (for unskilled workers) is approximately $20 per month and is inadequate to ensure a decent standard of living. Accordingly, most workers must supplement their incomes through subsistence agriculture or reliance on the extended family structure.

The Labor Code has rules concerning building safety, machinery and moving engines, operational safety, and sanitation standards. It appears that, in practice, the rules and regulations of the Code are adhered to by employers and are enforced by the authorities. Labor inspectors from the Ministry of Civil Service, Labor, and Social Law carry out regular visits to industrial work sites. Violations of safety, sanitary, operational, and other Work Code laws are the subject of reports by these inspectors. If the violations are not remedied within a specified time frame, the violators are legally charged and subject to various penalties.

MALAWI

Virtually every aspect of Malawi's first 25 years of independence--political, economic, and social--has been dominated by Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda, who led the country to independence in 1964 and was proclaimed "Life President" in 1970. The sole legal party is the Malawi Congress Party (MCP), to whose Central Committee the Cabinet and Parliament are subordinate. Only candidates selected by the MCP and approved by the President are allowed to run in parliamentary elections, last held in 1987. Constitutional amendments and laws passed by the Parliament mirror decisions already taken by the President and his close advisers.

Military, police, and party security organs closely monitor a wide range of activities, particularly opposition to the Government.

Malawi, a small, densely populated, landlocked country with few exploitable resources and a high population growth rate, possesses no significant mineral resources or industrial sector. It is heavily dependent on agriculture for export earnings and employment. Sound agricultural policies have produced a food surplus, despite an influx of 800,000 refugees in recent years, high transportation costs resulting from closure of the rail routes through Mozambique (owing primarily to the Mozambican civil war), and earthquakes and floods in 1989. Its fiscally sound policies have enabled it to qualify for special International Monetary Fund assistance.

Malawi's human rights performance is the reverse of its economic achievements and its exemplary handling of one of the world's largest refugee feeding programs. In 1989 the observance of human rights deteriorated as a leading political dissident was murdered, and arbitrary detention continued to be used to suppress any sign of dissent. Other major abuses included: mistreatment of prisoners and life-threatening conditions in prisons; lack of fair trials; interference with privacy; severe restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, and the right of citizens to change their government; and serious discrimination against northerners.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Some human rights organizations claim that a journalist named Osborne Mkandawire died in prison in November 1988. After extensive research, the U.S. Embassy was unable to identify such a person, although a retired journalist named Mkandawire did die of natural causes in his native village. In another incident, Fred Sikwese, a Ministry of External Affairs officer, was detained in February 1989, reportedly for espionage or embezzlement. He died the following month. Amnesty International (AI) alleges torture. Government sources claim natural causes but denied the family access to Sikwese's body.

Dissident Mkwapatira Mhango, Publicity Secretary of the Malawian Freedom Movement (MAFREMO), and most of his family were murdered on October 13 when his home in Lusaka, Zambia, was firebombed. It followed by a few weeks President Banda's public complaint that Mhango was among those responsible for an alleged foreign press campaign against the official hostess, C. T. Kadzamira. This, and the fact that an earlier dissident leader was murdered in Harare in 1983 following similar criticism from the President, led many to believe that the act was directed by Malawian authorities. The Zambian Government's investigation has not been conclusive, and allegations continued to circulate. Before he died, Mhango told a reporter that the real target may have been Edward R. Chirwa Yapwanthwa, MAFREMO chairman, who planned to slip into Malawi clandestinely and had been staying at Mhango's home.

There were no known political disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Beatings by police during arrest or detention are illegal but occur. Responsible officials are rarely disciplined. Terms of hard labor are the norm for common criminals. AI's 1989 Report focuses on harsh conditions in several prisons. AI also reported a number of deaths in Nsanje and Dzeleka Prisons.

In 1987 Orton and Vera Chirwa were transferred from Mikuyu prison to Zomba Central Prison where conditions were reportedly worse. Margaret Marango Banda, an Anglican women's leader (and Aleke Banda's cousin--see below) who was detained that same year, is imprisoned with Vera Chirwa. They are not permitted to speak with one another and are denied access to visiting clergy. Their diet is insufficient, and Ms. Banda is believed to be in poor health with inadequate medical attention. The Chirwas have not been able to speak with one another for at least 4 years and are not allowed to receive mail from their children.

Frackson Zgambo, an airport official and football referee, was detained with Fred Sikwese. While there have been reports of his death, Zgambo is believed to be under detention in Mikuyu Prison.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Preservation of Public Security Act, the Minister of Justice (a position held by President Banda) may order the arrest, search, and detention of persons considered a threat to the preservation of public order. The Act was amended in 1977 to eliminate a 30-day limit. Persons arrested under this law can be, and often are, detained indefinitely without charge and without trial. The President must review such cases every 6 months, but this safeguard has had no noticeable effect.

Still in detention at the end of 1989 were: Brown Mpinganjira, Deputy Chief of Information, detained in 1986 for providing information to foreign journalists; Dr. Goodluck Mhango, a veterinary surgeon with the Malawi Young Pioneers, detained in September 1987 because his brother (killed in 1989) wrote articles critical of the Government; Jack Mapanje, a prominent professor and poet, also detained in September 1987 for planning to publish a volume of poetry deemed critical of the President; Mr. Mbeye, a senior Ministry of Finance official, detained in August 1988, reportedly for revealing to the foreign press the cost of a presidential trip to Great Britain; Dr. George Mtafu, Malawi's only native neurosurgeon, arrested in early 1989 after making a disparaging remark in a private gathering about the condition of the aging President's brain. Kalusa Chimombo, a prominent member of the teachers' association of Malawi before his arrest in 1978, remains imprisoned as the country's longest serving "prisoner of conscience," according to AI.

Other persons detained in early 1989 for unknown reasons included: Tozer Khonje, a government agronomist; Dave Mumba, an employee of a private company; and George Thindwa, an employee of the Ministry of Trade and Industry. Mtafu, Khonje, and Thindwa may have been victims of an antinorthern campaign (see Section 5). Aleke Banda, once a presidential confidant and high-ranking official, was quietly released from Mikuyu Prison in late 1988 and is currently under house arrest nearby. Detained in 1980, Banda has never been charged.

AI estimates that at least 30 persons were detained in the first half of 1989. Although Malawian secrecy makes an accurate estimate impossible, most observers consider this is a reliable estimate. Detentions continued, albeit at a reduced rate, late into the year. While forced exile has not been used as means of control, there is a small politically motivated outward flow of persons from the country. In late 1988, the Chairman of the Malawi National Education Board, Donton Mkandawire, was dismissed for allegedly packing the education system with fellow northerners. Reportedly fearing imprisonment, he subsequently fled to Botswana.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Malawi has both traditional and modern court systems. Lawyers are not permitted to assist defendants in regional traditional court cases, but legal counsel is permitted in the modern court system. The right of appeal exists in both court systems. The judiciary is not independent, and the executive does not hesitate to intervene in cases of interest to it, particularly those of political or security import.

The modern court system consists of the magistrate courts, the High Court, and the Supreme Court of Appeal. The President appoints the Chief Justice of the High Court and, after consultation with the Judicial Service Commission, other modern court justices. Most are well qualified. Due to much lower salaries, however, magistrates tend to be recent law school graduates with no experience. This is the level at which most poor persons (who cannot afford legal counsel) first come into contact with the modern court system. The latter is open to the public, and defendants are charged publicly. Due process, however, is frequently ignored. In 1989 several municipal officials including the town clerks of Lilongwe and Blantyre, were summarily fired. Some were detained, then released without ever being charged. None was permitted to defend himself in court. Several attempted to sue the Government for wrongful dismissal, only to be informed that their files had been closed by presidential decree.

The three traditional courts at the regional level deal with most capital offenses, including treason (the Chirwas were tried in a traditional court). Police officials handle the prosecution, and defendants conduct their own defense.

Traditional court justices are appointed directly by the President. Of the five members of each regional traditional court, three are chiefs without formal legal training, one is a trained lawyer who advises the court, and the fifth, the chairman, has had a course in law. There is little executive interference in traditional court cases dealing in nonpolitical matters of customary law.

The Forfeiture Act permits the Government to revoke the property rights of those suspected of economic crimes, such as illegal currency transactions. These revocations sometimes have political overtones and are almost always directed against the Asian community. When the Forfeiture Act is invoked, the person loses all worldly possessions, including business, financial, and personal assets. Revocation of property rights is carried out by executive fiat with no judicial review. The Forfeiture Act was not invoked during 1989, suggesting a government moderation in applying its draconian measures. The courts several times tried illegal currency cases instead. Punishments generally fit the crime.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Police can enter houses of suspects at will under special entry authority to conduct searches for suspects or incriminating evidence. It is generally understood that telephones are routinely tapped and that a network of informers reports private statements and actions to the Government. Authorities open some domestic and international mail.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government does not tolerate criticism of any kind of its policies. It is an offense (5 years' imprisonment) to publish anything likely "to undermine the authority of, or public confidence in, the Government." Life imprisonment applies to "false information" sent out of the country which is "harmful to the interests or good name of Malawi." In practice, giving critical information to foreign journalists results in detention without trial. Any discussion of Malawi's political future or speculation about the President's age is prohibited.

Local media do not submit their news and programs to the Government beforehand, but self-censorship "guidelines" are generally understood. Journalists, including senior editors, have been jailed for extended periods for overstepping these "guidelines." Malawi's two newspapers and government-owned radio station exist primarily to catalog the Chief of State's words and activities. Nevertheless, criticism of the efficiency of some government departments occasionally appears in the media and often in parliamentary debate.

Foreign journalists must request permission to enter Malawi and must specify in advance the topics they intend to cover. Correspondents from the New York Times, Washington Post, and Financial Times visited Malawi in 1989 and wrote articles which would have been unheard of in past years. In a major breakthrough, two Western journalists were allowed to set up residence in Malawi. Although a spate of critical foreign press articles (of which they may have been innocent) temporarily compelled the two journalists to leave the country in October, they were allowed to return 2 weeks later.

All publications, recordings, and movies entering Malawi are screened by the Censorship Board. The current list of banned items includes well over 1,000 titles.

Limited freedom of inquiry into the natural and social sciences exists at the University and may include some examination of radical political ideologies, provided this does not extend to criticism of the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political meetings are not permitted outside the framework of the Malawi Congress Party. Persons may be imprisoned if they further the aims of an "unlawful society," defined as "any group considered to be dangerous to the good government of the republic." In the nonpolitical sphere, individuals and organizations generally are free to meet and associate.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state or preferred religion, but religious groups are required to register with the Government. Jehovah's Witnesses, whose religious convictions prevent them from joining political parties, have been banned since 1967. The Government considers the Witnesses' activities to be disruptive of "the prevailing calm, law, and order." Witnesses continue to be arrested and charged. In 1989 a Jehovah's Witness representative claimed that entire families were arrested in the period 1986-88 and are still in Dzeleka prison.

Other religious groups generally may establish places of worship and train clergy. Religious publications, like all others, may not criticize the Government or the party. Most religious groups are free to establish and maintain links with coreligionists in other countries, and members are free to travel abroad. Malawi's sizable Muslim minority conducts its religion and builds mosques freely. President Banda has publicly stressed the importance of providing the same civic services to Muslims which the Christian majority enjoys.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are few restrictions, in practice, on movement within Malawi for most citizens, though legal provisions exist for restricting movement of those convicted of political or criminal offenses. However, Asian residents and citizens, while free to travel within the country, must reside and work in one of four urban areas (Lilongwe, Zomba, Mzuzu, and Blantyre/Limbe). Denial of passports on political grounds frequently extends to family members of persons in political disfavor and to those persons the Government suspects may criticize it if allowed to travel abroad. Civil servants and employees of state-owned enterprises must obtain written permission to travel abroad, even on vacation. Obtaining such a clearance can take from a few days to several months. Formal emigration is neither restricted nor encouraged.

Malawi hosts the largest refugee population in Africa. Nearly 800,000 Mozambicans, located in heavily populated areas with little available land, have seriously strained the economy as well as transportation and social services networks. The Government has shared its own scarce resources and has encouraged and cooperated with international and private voluntary organizations to operate relief efforts. The latter are coordinated by a committee chaired by the Ministry of Health. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international assistance groups travel freely to assess relief needs and to investigate allegations of protection problems.

Citizens of Malawi do not, in practice, have the ability to change their government. Major political decisions are made by the President or his close associates. Opposition political parties or movements are not permitted. Membership in the Malawi Congress Party is not legally mandatory, but it is frequently coerced. Based on the 1987 census, over 70 percent of the adult population holds at least nominal party membership. Membership is expected of those who aspire to government positions (including the civil service) or professional success. Party membership is often required of schoolchildren and of those who seek access to government services or entrance to local markets. The annual renewal fee is only about 35 cents, but this can be nearly half a day's pay for a minimum wage earner. When the President visits an area, financial contributions from individuals and businesses are also levied.

The party structure provides for some choice among candidates for party, parliamentary, and other offices. All nominees, however, are selected by the party and approved by the President. Active political campaigning is not permitted. The National Assembly, consisting of both elected and a few appointed members, is mainly concerned with ratifying government policy. Its powers are broadly based in law but highly circumscribed in practice.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government does not permit organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross and Amnesty International to visit prisons or conduct human rights investigations in Malawi. It does not respond to their appeals. Local nongovernmental human rights organizations are not permitted to exist. Expressions of interest in alleged human rights problems by outside groups or persons are not welcomed. Repeated diplomatic efforts to discuss the case of Vera and Orton Chirwa with the Government have been rejected. Separate efforts in 1989 by representatives of the U.S. and West German Governments to discuss directly with President Banda the Mapanje and Dr. Mtafu cases, respectively, resulted in his angry rejection of what he termed interference in Malawi's internal affairs.

Asian residents, whether Malawian citizens or not, have been compelled to transfer ownership of rural shops and trucking businesses to ethnic Africans. Strict rules governing where Asians may own property effectively limit where they may reside. Changes in the citizenship law in 1986 eliminated a provision whereby persons who held foreign passports could reside indefinitely in Malawi. These changes in the law, together with actions under the Forfeiture Act (which has been applied in large measure against Asians), have led many in the small Asian community (about 5,000 persons) to leave Malawi and others to question their long-term future there. Some Asians began to return, however, in 1989.

Regionalism as a divisive domestic issue resurfaced during the President's annual crop tour in February 1989. Although the Life President evidently supported antinorthern campaigns in years past, this was the first time that President Banda allowed the full weight of his office to sanction regionalism openly. Prominent northerners who lost their jobs included: John Phiri, the Secretary for Trade and Industry. Hastings Chunga, General Manager of Sedom (the Government's small enterprise development scheme); and James Chatupa, the Government's Chief Geologist. Other northerners, notably Police Commissioner G. G. Mtawala and Chief Magistrate S.F.C. Munyenembe, were "retired" and stripped of their pensions. Several lesser officials were transferred to other jobs.

Perhaps to compensate, the President highlighted unity (from Malawi's four doctrinaire cornerstones) at the annual party congress in September, during Mothers Day in October, and at the closing of Parliament in November. It is unlikely that regional sensibilities were assuaged since few northerners who were detained, lost their jobs, or felt compelled to leave the country in 1989 have obtained remedial relief.

Most women are limited to roles defined by a traditional African society and do not have opportunities equal to men, although the President takes a special interest in advancing their status. Violence against women is not tolerated. At the annual party conference in 1989, the President made the entire Central Committee stand and acknowledge that any wife beaten by her husband could approach them directly for redress. Responding as well to a report of telephone harassment against a European woman, the President directed the police to tap phones, find the culprit, and send him off to prison for life without a trial.

Women enjoy access to maternal health services and to extension programs designed to improve their homemaking abilities. Such programs, while beneficial, have not given full recognition to the importance of women as agricultural producers in the rural sector (roughly 70 percent of all smallholder farms and over 50 percent of subsistence holdings are headed by women) and the potential role women can play in the modern sector. Males still have an advantage in education and employment, but the Government has initiated broad-scale programs to reverse existing discrimination. A third of the positions in the public education system, for example, have been reserved for women. Malawi's traditional tribal leadership structures remain primarily matrilineal. Several small ethnic groups grant few rights and privileges to women and occasionally continue to practice female circumcision.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Nongovernment workers have the legal right to associate, form, and join unions, and labor unions do exist in the small wage sector. However, their activities are highly circumscribed by the Government, and they are generally ineffective in achieving gains for workers. Most wage workers are unskilled laborers on large agricultural estates. Labor unions must associate under the Trade Union Congress of Malawi (TUCM).

Malawi law provides for the right to strike, but strikes do not occur in practice. Ministry of Labor officers are quick to intervene at the first hint of labor unrest. With government supervision, the TUCM associates with international organizations and is affiliated with The Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

The Government allowed the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council to open a permanent office in Malawi in 1988. It is headed by a former Malawian labor leader who was once detained for several years on political grounds. The Chamber of Commerce's general manager is also a former political detainee, illustrating that some persons are occasionally permitted to make a comeback in Malawi.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers have the legal right to organize, and the law prohibits antiunion discrimination by implication. Complaints are resolved by the Ministry of labor. Collective bargaining is protected by law, but its use is limited. The Government has set a minimum wage and regulates working conditions, but it does not intervene overtly in the collective bargaining process. Labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country. There are no export processing zones in Malawi.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by law and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum working age is 14, but this applies only to the small urban wage sector where it is enforced by labor inspectors from the Ministry of Labor. In the large subsistence agriculture sector, the minimum age is not enforced, and children work on family farms at a younger age.

Less than 15 percent of the work force is employed in the formal wage sector. For those fortunate enough to hold paid jobs, wages and working conditions are generally adequate, and paid holidays and safety standards in the workplace are required by law. However, enforcement of these standards is limited. Malawi's low wage levels reflect the abundance of unskilled labor and the Government's policy of limiting the urban-rural income gap to stem migration into the towns. Wage earners fare slightly better in living standards than the vast majority of workers engaged in subsistence agriculture. The minimum wage reflects the fact that Malawi is one of the poorest countries in the world.

New minimum wage rates, the first in 3 years, were implemented in May 1989. Minimum daily wages nearly doubled in Malawi's three cities, to 80 cents per day; and wage rates in rural areas increased 125 percent, to 30 cents per day. Wages for experienced skilled workers are increasing sharply as the supply of such workers diminishes, and large numbers of them find better paying jobs in S.A. and Botswana.

MALI

Mali is a single-party state in which effective authority is exercised by General Moussa Traore, President of the Republic and Secretary General of the Democratic Union of the Malian people (UPDM), the country's only legal political party and supreme political entity. President Traore assumed power through a military coup in 1968, and under his leadership the military Government adopted a new Constitution in 1974. Since then, the military have retained a privileged position, but civilians have an increasingly important role in daily government operations and in the party. Military men continue to occupy 4 of the 7 regional governorships, 11 of the 46 districts, and an important number of lower level administrative posts, particularly in the border areas.

Mali maintains an army and air force, which provide both external and internal security. The gendarmerie (paramilitary police) assists in maintaining internal security.

With an annual per capita gross national product of approximately $190, Mali is among the world's poorest countries. Mali is landlocked and lacks major mineral resources. Its economy rests on subsistence farming and animal husbandry. Good rainfalls for the second year in a row increased agricultural production and permitted some export of grains. However, it is too soon to say whether the cycle of drought and economic depression that has affected Mali in recent decades is over. Malnutrition, poor food distribution systems, and widespread unemployment remain persistent problems. Throughout 1989 the Government continued its efforts to modernize the economy, particularly through fiscal reform and privatization of state enterprises, but Mali remains heavily dependent on external aid.

Human rights remained circumscribed in Mali in 1989. The Government did permit publication of an independent newspaper and the establishment of a nongovernmental human rights organization. The infamous Taodenit prison remained closed. However, security authorities mistreated several students and held them incommunicado for several months for distributing pamphlets. Significant human rights problems included arbitrary detention, abuse of detainees, and restrictions on fair trial, freedoms of speech, press, and association, the right of citizens to change their government through democratic means, and worker rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No politically motivated killings were reported.

b. Disappearance

No incidents of disappearance, abduction, or hostage-taking were reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government has issued specific instructions prohibiting brutality against suspects. However, physical abuse of suspected persons sometimes occurs during police interrogation or in confronting demonstrations. In 1989 authorities accused eight students of distributing political tracts and held them in incommunicado detention for 2 months. According to credible sources, they were seriously mistreated, and at least one of the students was tied and suspended by his hands for a prolonged period while undergoing interrogation. No officials were prosecuted or even reprimanded for these actions.

Prison conditions are harsh and characterized by inadequate medical facilities and food supplies. Mali's most infamous prison--Taodenit--was closed in 1988. In the past, the abysmal conditions at Taodenit contributed to the deaths of prisoners, including political prisoners held there. Amnesty International has called for a full and independent inquiry into the Taodenit deaths.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Malian judicial system is based on the French model. Detained persons do not have the right to a judicial determination of the legality of their detention, but arrests cannot be made without formal charges. In political cases, the authorities do not always follow this practice, and incommunicado detention is sometimes utilized, as in the case of the eight students. Malian law does not provide for release on bail, but detainees are sometimes released on their own recognizance. Administrative backlogs often cause delays in bringing people to trial. Detainees are usually allowed access to a lawyer of their choice.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A part of the executive branch, the judiciary is not independent. The Ministry of Justice supervises both law enforcement and judicial functions. The Supreme Court is the highest court, with both judicial and administrative powers. The National Assembly can convene a high court of justice to hear cases against state ministers, but this court did not meet during 1989.

The eight students mentioned above were finally charged in August under a statute prohibiting the distribution of politically inflammatory material. When their case came to trial, seven were acquitted, and the court suspended the sentence of the one student who was found guilty.

Corruption remains a major political issue, and trials against corrupt officials continued in 1989, notably in the Special Court of State Security, a military court. The Special Court met in June and heard 47 cases. Of the 72 persons found guilty of corruption, 30 were sentenced to life imprisonment and 7 received death sentences. In the Special Court, defendants usually admit guilt in the hope of receiving a more lenient sentence and allow their lawyers to argue mitigating circumstances. The verdict and sentence are rendered by a panel of three judges, including civilian judges and armed force officers. The death penalty is mandatory under the law for anyone convicted of embezzling more than $36,000. However, in most embezzlement trials restitution by the accused can decrease the severity of the sentence. Once convicted, a person can appeal for a presidential pardon or request a new trial. The right to request a presidential pardon or a new trial exists in mandatory death penalty cases.

As far as is known, there were no political prisoners being held at the end of 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Inviolability of the home is provided for in the Constitution and generally respected in practice. Police searches are infrequent, and warrants are issued and recorded, though sometimes after the fact. Local authorities sometimes seize and open mail extralegally. Under the law, private letters can be opened only if the country is facing political crisis. In such cases, the only organization which may legally open personal mail is the "Securite d'Etat," a special intelligence service responsible to the Presidency.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Malian Constitution does not expressly provide for freedom of speech and press. Malians take care to express criticism of the Government in accepted forums. In theory, criticism is permitted within the councils of the sole political party, which all citizens are encouraged, but not forced, to join. Questioning of government authority outside party deliberations is rare, although not expressly forbidden.

The Government controls most Malian media, which reflect official positions. In some instances media and public criticism of specific programs and of the performance of some government officials is allowed. An independent biweekly newspaper, Les Echos, which often contains sharp political commentary, began publication in 1989. Independent specialty magazines such as Jamana (a cultural publication) and Podium (a sports journal) also contain some political commentary and circulate freely. International publications, including those having articles critical of Mali and its Government, are available. Satire and social criticism, sometimes with a political cast, are occasionally evident in Malian government publications. Government authorities generally seize political tracts printed by organizations not formally recognized by the Government.

Academic freedom does not include the right to criticize the Government, nor is this right extended to the only recognized labor union, which is considered an arm of the Government. The union has, however, occasionally been critical of government policy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right of citizens to form organizations to protect their professional interests, but in reality only selected nonpolitical organizations such as urban professional associations qualify. The primary groups which assemble freely are the women's, youth, and similar associations of Mali's single political party. In 1989 a number of apolitical "amicales" or friendship groups sponsoring exchanges with foreign countries were established, but these associations do not have an overt political agenda.

MALI

c. Freedom of Religion

Mali is a secular state. The Government generally does not discriminate on religious grounds. Although 90 percent of Malians are Muslim, most other religions may practice their faiths freely and are permitted to establish houses of worship as well as schools. Christian missionaries of various faiths enjoy government cooperation. Proselytizing and conversion are permitted, except in the case of the Baha'i, who may practice at home but may not proselytize or establish houses of worship. The Government prohibits publications in which one religious group defames another.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement in Mali is generally unimpeded, although police checks sometimes occur in which Malians and foreigners alike are stopped, particularly at night. These checks are used ostensibly to restrict the movement of contraband goods and to check vehicle registrations. In practice, some police probably supplement their frequently delayed salaries by assessing ad hoc fines or confiscating goods. Malians are free to change residence or workplace. Foreign travel requires an exit visa, which is easy to obtain. Repatriation is not restricted.

In the past drought years, Mali both accepted and generated displaced persons. Several thousand Malians were repatriated from Algeria in 1986 and 1987. In 1989 Mali agreed to accept additional repatriates from Algeria. Mali also permitted entry to a number of persons who were expelled from neighboring Mauritania.

Citizens have no ability to change their government and only limited and infrequent opportunity to influence it. Important policies and decisions are made by a small group--the President, the 19-member Central Executive Bureau of the UDPM, and the Council of Ministers. The memberships of these groups overlap. The military role in governing Mali remains important, but civilian participation in the leadership groups has been growing. Party congresses are called by the President to consider special issues.

Within the one-party system, multiple candidates often contest party elections at the local level, but for National Assembly elections, which are held every 4 years, only one carefully selected party candidate runs for each seat. Proposed legislation is debated and endorsed in the National Assembly after its acceptance by the Council of Ministers and review by the Supreme Court. Party membership is a prerequisite for voting and for holding a civil service appointment or other government position. All citizens are encouraged to join for a nominal fee.

MALI

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is generally responsive to inquiries by recognized human rights groups, although it apparently has not replied to Amnesty International's call for an inquiry into Taodenit prison. In 1989 the Government permitted the establishment of a nongovernmental human rights organization, The Malian Association for Human Rights. This organization sponsored a number of seminars on human rights issues in 1989 and is attempting to encourage Malian participation in international human rights meetings.

Mali does not practice religious or ethnic discrimination, nor does it have the civil and racial strife evident in many other multiethnic countries. Virtually all of Mali's ethnic groups are represented at the highest state and party levels. Although some nomadic groups such as the Tamashek are not completely integrated into the economic and political mainstream, Mali is relatively free of ethnic tensions.

Social and cultural factors place men in the dominant position in Mali. However, women play an important economic role, both in market life and in farming. There are a number of women in the professions, but economic opportunity for educated women is limited. Women live under harsh conditions, especially in the rural areas.

Violence against women, including wife beating, is accepted in Malian society, but there are no statistics to indicate how widespread it may be. Malian society generally does not tolerate spousal abuse that results in physical injury, but legal action for redress of injury is not normally available. The issue of spousal abuse has not been addressed by the Government. Nor is the National Union of Malian Women (UNFM) actively engaged in this issue. The UNFM focuses primarily on establishing cooperatives, improving health programs, and fostering education. It also campaigns against female circumcision, which is still widely practiced in Mali, including the most extreme form of genital mutilation, infibulation. The Government has taken no public position on this issue.

Traditional practice and existing Malian laws place women at a disadvantage with regard to family law and property rights. A group of female jurists is seeking improved legal protection for women. One issue being addressed by this group pertains to rights of widows. Currently, a widow has no right to her husband's property or custody of children conceived during the marriage.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution specifically provides for the liberty of citizens to form organizations to protect their "professional interests." However, workers' right of association is limited to the National Union of Malian Workers (UNTM). The UNTM comprises 12 unions and is Mali's only recognized workers' organization. At present, there are no unions not affiliated with the UNTM. The UNTM claims to maintain a degree of autonomy from the Government, and unlike the women's and youth associations, it is not officially part of the party. It has on occasion offered limited criticism of certain government programs. Nevertheless, it is subject to considerable government influence and control, and the UNTM Secretary General is a party member, although not a member of the Central Executive Council of the UDPM.

Strikes are rarely permitted, and those deemed to be taken for political reasons are illegal. Given Mali's high level of unemployment, most workers are reluctant to strike for long periods of time. By law, any union planning to go on strike must notify the UNTM and obtain prior approval. In the case of student and teacher strikes which took place in 1988, no approval was given, but the strikes still took place and many participants suffered reprisals. The International Labor Organization's (ILO) Committee on Freedom of Association concluded that the resulting government-directed transfers, dismissals, and arrests of teachers constituted an infringement on their freedom of association. Malian teachers continue to have grievances, specifically over the nonpayment of salaries. There were no teacher strikes in 1989, but there were work slowdowns. In September drivers of minibuses in Bamako protested government attempts to impose stricter regulations on their activities. When there was no response to a complaint lodged through the transport union, drivers organized a 1-day protest strike. There were no government reprisals.

The UNTM maintains contacts with international labor organizations, both public and private. The UNTM is affiliated with two international labor bodies: the Organization of West African Workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

There are no specific constraints by the Government or employers on workers attempting to organize, but in practice, Mali's unitary party system effectively inhibits the workers' right to organize. True collective bargaining does not take place. The UNTM has a policy role in the agreements negotiated by the individual member unions, and the Government, through the Minister of Labor, must approve all wage and related agreements.

There are no export processing zones in Mali.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and this prohibition is generally observed in practice. There have been reports that a form of traditional slavery is still practiced in some isolated parts of the country.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 14, but with parents' permission children can be apprenticed at 12. In practice, children in rural areas join the family farming work force at a much younger age. As workers in the informal sector, they are not protected by laws against unjust compensation, excessive hours, and capricious discharge.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Mali has a detailed labor code specifying conditions of employment, including hours, wages, and social security benefits. The normal workweek is 44 hours. The minimum wage is approximately $42.50 per month, which could provide a decent standard of living if it went to support only one person. However, most wage earners support extended families. Health and safety standards vary, depending upon the category of work, but there is limited enforcement due to the lack of inspectors. Employers are required to pay into a national social security fund.

MAURITANIA

The Islamic Republic of Mauritania has been governed since 1978 by the Military Committee for National Salvation (CMSN). Colonel Maaouya Ould Sid'ahmed Taya, President of the Committee and Chief of State, assumed power in 1984 after the bloodless ouster of the former president, Lt. Col. Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidalla. All 19 members of the Military Committee hold ministerial portfolios or occupy other key military or government positions. The Committee functions as a legislative body, while the President, assisted by his Council of Ministers and a few close advisers, wields the executive power. Political parties are not allowed in Mauritania.

The security forces number about 16,000 and, in addition to the regular armed forces, include the National Guard, the gendarmerie (a specialized corps of paramilitary police) and the police. The National Guard and police come under the Minister of Interior and all have internal security functions. Over the past 3 years, the Government purged security forces of hundreds of suspected dissidents, particularly non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritians and Pan-Arab Baathists.

Mauritania continues to face massive economic and social problems: drought, desertification, insect infestation, the Western Sahara conflict, extensive unemployment, one of the highest per capita foreign debts in Africa, poor infrastructure, inadequate health and education systems, and exodus from rural areas. Although adequate rains fell in 1988 and 1989, the prior drought years forced large numbers of nomads into towns, with a consequent weakening of traditional Maur nomadic culture, and a severe strain on government resources. In addition, mutual expulsions and repatriations between Senegal and Mauritania after April 1989 resulted in the movement of more than 100,000 people, placing an unprecedented economic and social strain on Mauritanian society. Many of the Mauritians who returned had been prosperous merchants in Senegal, and important sources of foreign exchange earnings. At the same time, many of the black Africans who departed had held important technical and skilled positions in Mauritania.

The human rights situation in Mauritania deteriorated dramatically in 1989. In April Mauritania experienced one of its most serious crises since independence, when anti-Senegalese rioting in Mauritania and anti-Mauritanian rioting in Senegal left hundreds dead. In the aftermath of the rioting, tens of thousands of Senegalese citizens as well as Pulaar-speaking Mauritanian citizens were expelled to Senegal. Tens of thousands of Mauritians and Senegalese of Maur origin similarly fled or were expelled from Senegal. Subsequently, the Mauritanian Government dismissed many Halpulaar civil servants and employees of state-owned enterprises from their positions. Although the Mauritanian authorities argued that the expellees were not true Mauritians, but rather Senegalese with false identity papers, the fact remains that in all cases persons were forcibly removed, often without being allowed to retain their possessions, and without due process of law. Reports of unlawful detention and torture also surfaced during 1989, and most other human rights, including political freedoms, remained tightly circumscribed.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There have been no substantiated cases of members of the Government or security forces perpetrating politically motivated killings. However, serious questions remain regarding the role of the Mauritanian security forces in the initial riots on April 24-25. During the early stages of the rioting, some police officers stood by without intervening, or may even have goaded on the rioters. The Mauritanian army was called in to quell the disturbances only on April 25. Whether these incidents reflected official government policy, or were isolated instances of individuals acting on their own, is unknown. The net results of the violence were numerous deaths and extensive property damage. The Government conceded a death toll of several scores, while other sources contended that several hundred persons may have died.

b. Disappearances

There were no substantiated reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Mauritanian law specifically precludes the use of torture. There were, however, recurring reports during 1989 that the security forces used torture against dissidents and against some non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritanians.

On February 27, five leaders of the December 1988-January 1989 student strike at the university of Nouakchott released a report describing their 4-day interrogation and torture at the hands of the police in December 1988. The students said they were deprived of food and sleep, forced to stand without clothes outdoors in the chill of night, kicked and beaten with rubber hoses, and suspended by their hands and feet from a steel beam until they became unconscious. Several also had their heads kept immersed in water until they feared drowning. According to their report, upon their release, several of the students could not walk and remained bedridden for over a week. The students provided the names of several of their alleged police torturers in their report. The Government is not known to have acted against the alleged torturers; neither, however, did it retaliate against the students, although the report was circulated widely.

In the aftermath of the April rioting, there were recurrent unsubstantiated reports of police detention and torture of non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritanians, particularly in the regions along the Senegal river. These reports generally involved incidents in small villages or remote areas and were thus difficult to verify. The recurring nature of these reports, however, lends credence to the overall impression that incidents of torture did in fact take place.

One report issued by Amnesty International (AI) involved the headmaster of a school in Tetiane, who was allegedly detained and tortured by the police in Kaedi in early June. The headmaster reportedly died as a result of this treatment. The same report alleged that four Pulaar-speaking black Mauritanian herdsmen were detained, tortured, and possibly killed by the police in the Kaedi and M'bout region, also in June. Numerous other unsubstantiated allegations of torture surfaced, often involving efforts by the local security forces to intimidate or force Pulaar or Wolof-speaking black Maurititanians into leaving their homes and going to Senegal.

Responsibility for such alleged activities is difficult to determine; there may have been incidents in which local security forces acted independently, without orders from their superiors. Furthermore, in several areas along the river local militias of mostly Hassaniya-speaking white and black Maurs were formed, ostensibly to guard against cross-border incursions from Senegal. Since some of these civilians were armed, it is possible that some cases of torture were carried out by these militias. On balance, even though some senior members of the regime continued to voice opposition to the use of torture, reports suggest that its use increased during 1989, especially in the aftermath of the April intercommunal violence, and there were no known instances of the Government punishing those responsible.

Prison conditions in Mauritania are harsh. Four political prisoners died from disease and malnutrition at Oualata Prison in 1988, in part because the prison commandant was systematically withholding food. As a result of these deaths and the international pressures they caused, the remaining prisoners were subsequently removed from Oualata, and the commandant was dismissed and reprimanded.

Mauritanian law in principle assures expeditious arraignment and trial, access to legal counsel, and the right of appeal. The courts must review the legality of a person's detention no more than 72 hours after his or her arrest. Compliance with this law, however, is inconsistent. For example, the five leaders of the University of Nouakchott student strike were detained for 4 days in December 1988 without a hearing. AI has also reported that one of these students, Abdallahi Ould Bah Nagi, was subsequently detained by the police on May 29 and held without a hearing. The apparent reason for his detention was his role in the distribution of a leaflet criticizing the expulsion of non-Hassaniya-speaking black Maurititanians by the Mauritanian Government.

In the aftermath of the April riots, there were widespread stories--often from persons in refugee camps in Senegal--of detention by local officials of Pulaar-speaking black Maurititanians living in the Senegal river valley. For example, three high school teachers were reportedly arrested and detained by gendarmerie in Bababe and eventually expelled to Senegal. There were numerous reports of intimidation, arrests, prolonged detention, and expulsion centering on security forces in Kaedi and Rosso.

AI also reported that a number of Pulaar-speaking black Mauritanian civil servants, including Oumir Tall, Amidou Tidiane Ly, Memkoudou Diop, Abdanlage Wane, were arrested and detained incommunicado in May 1989 in Nouakchott. These detainees were not charged with any offense, although unofficial sources suggested that they were held because of suspected involvement in movements opposed to the Government.

MAURITANIA

In mid-November, there were widespread, credible reports of the arrest, detention, and possible torture of a number of Halpulaar teachers in the town of Kaedi. As many as 50 persons may have been detained without being officially charged, and by year's end their status remained unresolved.

Internal exile is a method of removing opposition figures from the public eye. Former President Haidalla and five of his associates, who were arrested during the 1984 coup but never charged, reportedly still remain in internal exile in remote locations. There were credible reports of the detention and exile without charges of several black Mauritanian civil servants and military personnel since May 1989. Many more were expelled to Senegal, in lieu of internal exile.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The legal system functions primarily under the Shari'a (Islamic law) put in place during the Haidalla regime. The Ministry of Justice plays the major role in administering the Shari'a and selecting judicial personnel. The Shari'a applies to most crimes and offenses, with the exception of commercial and banking offenses, traffic violations that cause bodily harm, and offenses against the security of the State. These three categories of offenses are all handled by the Special Court, which renders its judgments on the basis of laws modeled after French law. The Taya administration has urged the Islamic judges not to use extreme physical punishments, such as amputations, which occurred during the Haidalla regime. The Taya Government is slowly eliminating a number of unqualified Shari'a judges who were appointed during the Haidalla years. By virtue of a recent government decision, judges cannot be tenured before 7 years of service.

While trials in the ordinary courts are public, the State Security Court, which tries offenses against state security, may conduct secret trials. All defendants, regardless of the court, have the right to be present with legal counsel during the proceedings. If necessary, the accused is provided counsel at public expense. Defendants may confront witnesses and present evidence. They may appeal the sentences of the ordinary courts but not those of the Security Court. While the judiciary is nominally independent, some knowledgeable observers have claimed that judges take their cue from the Government when sentencing opponents of the regime.

The right to a fair public trial in Mauritania was, by any standard, severely abused during 1989. After April, thousands of non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritaniens, particularly in the Halpulaar community, were expelled to Senegal without any recourse to judicial proceedings. Those expelled often had no advance warning of their expulsion and no time or opportunity to carry any possessions with them. According to reports from refugee camps in Senegal, many were forced across the frontier river at gunpoint.

The Mauritanian Government contended that many, if not all, of the persons expelled were in fact of Senegalese nationality, and that their Mauritanian identity documents were fraudulent. Even if this were the case, an arbitrary determination of nationality seems to have been made without according due process to those affected. Furthermore, the Mauritanian Government appears to have ignored its own law, which specifies that all persons, including foreigners, have a right to the protection of their property and possessions and cannot be deprived of them except by a court decision. The widespread and credible reports of confiscation and destruction of identity papers by security forces indicated a conscious and concerted effort to circumvent the legal process.

The number of political detainees and prisoners held at the end of 1989 was unknown. In December the Government released 19 political prisoners, including the head of the outlawed Baathist Party arrested in 1988, and 18 non-Hassaniya-speaking black political activists convicted in October 1986 following antigovernment political agitation.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In the past, government surveillance of individuals was generally limited to patrols on major highways and customs checkpoints, occasional nighttime inspections of vehicular traffic, and inspections of mail suspected of containing currency or prohibited items. Under Mauritanian law, the police require warrants to perform home searches.

The right to privacy was severely abused in Mauritania after April 1989. Expulsions of Pulaar-speaking black Mauritaniens involved systematic entry of homes by security forces and forcible removal of families, without search warrants or any legal proceedings. These activities occurred predominantly in villages along the river, and thus it is unclear to what extent they were officially sanctioned by the Mauritanian Government, and to what extent they were the work of overzealous local officials. After repeated diplomatic protests, the expulsions appeared to slow dramatically after mid-July, and there were reasons to believe that the Government was making efforts to control the situation. Nevertheless, there were continuing reports of government surveillance of suspected dissidents, as well as intimidation and harassment of Pulaar-speaking black Mauritaniens in the Senegal River valley.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is restricted. While Mauritaniens may criticize government policies in conversations with friends and relatives, they are somewhat more inhibited in speaking with foreigners. Military personnel are under tight surveillance, and expression of views that could be construed as even mildly critical of the Government is likely to result in close questioning by military security officers. The Government is quick to react to any public comments it thinks pose a threat to the security of the State. Many of those persons detained without a trial during 1989, including the five student strike leaders as well as many civil servants, were targets, it is believed, precisely because they voiced opposition to the current regime and its policies. In particular, the Government appeared to be sensitive to any expression of ethnic dissatisfaction or criticism of its ethnic policies.

Mauritania's only daily newspaper and the radio and television stations are government owned and operated. During the past 3 years the Government has allowed a limited amount of discussion of government policies within the context of interviews with government officials. In early 1988, the Government authorized the publication of two privately owned monthly magazines, Mauritanie Demain and L'Evenement. These publications periodically carried articles on mildly controversial social issues, but they refrained from any direct criticism of the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Mauritanian law recognizes the rights of assembly and association, but since the 1978 coup the Government has banned all political movements and generally prohibited meetings of a political nature. Any formal grouping must be registered with the Minister of Interior. The Government usually does not interfere with assemblies and associations as long as they avoid political activity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the official religion of Mauritania; virtually all citizens are Muslim. Mauritanian Muslims are prohibited from entering non-Islamic houses of worship and from converting to another religion. Proselytizing by non-Muslims and the construction of Christian churches and other non-Islamic houses of worship require government permission. The Roman Catholic community in Mauritania has five churches which operate freely as long as they restrict their services to resident foreigners.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Traditionally, there have been few restrictions on movement within Mauritania, where nomadism has long been a way of life. Travelers, however, are subjected to routine police and customs checks along all major roads and at the country's international and domestic airports. During the riots of April 1989, dusk-to-dawn curfews were imposed in Nouakchott, Nouadhibou, and some other cities but were reduced and finally lifted as the situation calmed. During the final months of 1989, as cross-border incidents from Senegal increased, curfews were imposed in a number of villages in the Senegal river valley as well. Since 1985 Mauritaniens no longer need an exit visa to travel abroad, although there were reports of some persons being denied passports.

During 1989 large numbers of Mauritaniens had their citizenship effectively revoked and were subsequently expelled to Senegal. The revocations of citizenship, which may have involved as many as 50,000 people, appear in many cases to have been based entirely on ethnicity. Only non-Hassaniya-speaking Mauritaniens, particularly Halpulaar and, to a much lesser degree, other black African ethnic groups, were affected. Many of these displaced persons were not accorded Senegalese citizenship and thus in effect became stateless persons. At year's end, the Mauritanian Government had not taken specific steps to permit access to the courts by expellees who wished to obtain confirmation of their citizenship and right to return home. However, there was a small but indeterminate number of cases of acknowledged Mauritaniens being allowed to return, apparently as a result of individual extrajudicial petitions or intervention by officials.

MAURITANIA

As many as 80,000 displaced persons arrived in Mauritania from Senegal during April and May of 1989. While many of these were Mauritanian citizen repatriates, many others were Senegalese citizens of ethnic Maur origin. The arrival of these repatriates and refugees placed a heavy additional burden on the Mauritanian economy. Although hard pressed for resources, the Mauritanian Government made commendable and largely successful efforts to assist all those arriving from Senegal. The Government also permitted the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to establish temporary offices in Nouakchott to provide aid to displaced persons. There were no reports of refugees being returned forcibly to Senegal.

As a result of the ongoing conflict in neighboring Western Sahara between Morocco and the Polisario Front, a small number of refugees from the Western Sahara have settled in Nouadhibou and other northern towns. They have been successfully absorbed into Mauritanian society.

Citizens of Mauritania are unable democratically to change their government at the national level. All political power rests in the hands of the military regime. The Military Committee for National Salvation (CMSN) remains the "custodian of the nation's sovereignty," and all executive and legislative functions reside with it. Membership is limited to military officers who occupy ministerial positions or important military and security posts. The CMSN is predominately comprised of Hassaniya-speaking Maurs, although members of other ethnic groups are members. However, non-Maur membership on the CMSN, as well as among those holding senior government or military positions, decreased in 1989 in the wake of ethnic tensions.

In early January, the Government held elections in 164 rural communes. All Mauritians, aged 21 years or older and residing in these localities, were entitled to vote, and the ballot was secret. In most localities, two or more slates of candidates competed for the electorate's vote.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Taya Government in the past has been generally responsive to human rights concerns. For example, it cooperated with the U.N. Human Rights Commission Working Group on slavery by allowing a representative to come to Mauritania to obtain information on this issue. In 1987 the Government permitted representatives of AI to visit Nouakchott for discussions on racial and ethnic tensions in Mauritania. In 1988 a delegation from the International Commission of Jurists and the Chairman of the African Jurists Association visited Mauritania to review human rights practices.

As a result of President Taya's public support for basic human rights, the Mauritanian Human Rights League was formed in 1986. The League, which is affiliated with the Paris-based International Federation of Human Rights, is staffed by volunteers who address such concerns as eradicating remaining vestiges of slavery, ensuring the uniform application of

Shari'a law, promoting the status of women, and preventing abuses such as arbitrary arrest, detention, and torture. In 1988, the League hosted the first conference on Maghrebian human rights.

In the wake of the ethnic disturbances of 1989, the League experienced serious difficulties in its efforts to remain a viable and independent human rights organization. On May 3, 1989, League Director Ghali Ould Abdel Hamid was arrested for "threatening state security" at Nouakchott airport after he publicly faulted the Governments of Senegal and Mauritania for failing to address ethnic problems. Ghali was released after 34 hours of detention.

In the weeks following Ghali's arrest, the League continued to speak out on the subject of human rights abuses, and on July 21, 1989, issued a statement critical of government expulsions of non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritians. The League continued to face considerable pressure from the Government, however, and on July 31, 1989, issued a statement critical of AI's declaration condemning Mauritania's expulsions of its citizens.

Mauritania is situated geographically and culturally on the divide between traditionally nomadic Arabic-speaking Maurs of the north and the sedentary black cultivators of the African south. The interaction of these two groups produces the complex cultural diversity as well as the ethnic tensions inherent in Mauritanian society. Historically, the Hassaniya-speaking white Maurs have dominated the political and economic system. Taken together, the Hassaniya-speaking black Maurs--members of the former slave caste--and Mauritania's non-Hassaniya-speaking blacks outnumber the white Maurs by a considerable majority. This racial majority is by no means cohesive, however, since black Maurs identify in many ways more closely with the white Maur population.

Many non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritians have long contended that since independence, white Maur domination in government, state enterprises, business, and religious institutions is a result of ethnic and linguistic discrimination. Their grievances have included a reduction of the numbers of non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritians at all levels of government, and the increasing use of Hassaniya rather than French in many sectors of Mauritanian government and business. They have also pointed to the Government's new land reform law as a means to allow white and black Maurs to take control of fertile land in the Senegal river valley that had been traditionally the preserve of non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritians. Recent movements of nomads into the Senegal river valley as a result of the decade-long drought in the north further exacerbated tensions.

The violence in April that resulted in many deaths was in general more the result of an eruption of underlying ethnic tensions rather than an officially sanctioned government policy, but the expulsions of non-Hassaniya-speaking black Mauritians that followed were largely orchestrated by Mauritanian security forces.

Both white and black Maurs were resettled into the villages in the Senegal river valley from which Halpulaar residents were forcibly expelled. While many of those resettled were themselves refugees from Senegal, others had moved from northern Mauritania in search of richer farmlands. These resettlements have set the stage for future disputes over land tenure and a continuation of ethnic tensions in the Senegal river valley.

Women in Mauritanian Muslim society are often limited to traditional roles, which may encompass considerable financial and civil autonomy, especially outside the few urban areas. The Government is encouraging the entry of women into the professions, government, and business. In late 1988, the Taya Government created a new Ministry of Women's Affairs, Arts, and Tourism, and appointed a woman as the first Minister. The Government has also been instrumental in opening up new opportunities for employment traditionally reserved for men, such as in hospital work. According to Mauritanian law, men and women must receive equal pay for equal work, and Mauritania's two largest employers, the civil service and the state mining company SNIM, respect this law. In smaller private enterprises, wages are often determined by informal bargaining, leading to sometimes significant discrepancies in what two persons are paid for the same work.

While data are very limited, violence against women does not appear to be prevalent in Mauritania. Female genital mutilation (circumcision) is a widespread, traditional practice. The Government has taken no position nor issued any statements on violence against women or on genital mutilation. In some areas of southern Mauritania, the most extreme form of mutilation, infibulation, is practiced. Some evidence indicates that the incidence of female excision is diminishing in the modern, urbanized sector, and for an Islamic country, women are allowed a relatively great degree of freedom.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers are free to establish unions at the local and national level. There are currently 36 trade unions in the country. All, however, must be affiliates of the Union of Mauritanian Workers (UTM), by law the country's only central labor organization. The trade unions and the UTM elect their leadership democratically, and they are free to determine their programs and policies, provided these avoid political issues. The UTM is an active member of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

Mauritanian law grants workers the right to strike. In practice, however, the Government discourages strikes, and they rarely occur. Under Mauritanian law, tripartite arbitration committees, composed of union, business, and government representatives, may impose binding arbitration that automatically terminates any strike.

In recent years, the UTM had been paralyzed by bitter factional disputes. In early 1989, elections and a national congress were held, and a new leadership moved quickly to revitalize the UTM. It did not, however, voice any opposition to the Government's dismissal of numerous non-Hassaniya-speaking black civil servants that occurred after April.

MAURITANIA

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions are free to organize workers without government or employer interference. According to the UTM, close to 90 percent of industrial and commercial workers in Mauritania are members of unions. The laws providing worker's protection against antiunion discrimination are regularly enforced. Collective bargaining, notably to set wages, occurs informally between individual unions and employers but also involves the Government and the UTM. In addition, employees or employers may bring labor disputes to three-person labor courts that are overseen jointly by the Ministries of Justice and Labor. Labor leaders regard these courts as unbiased and effective. There are no export processing zones in Mauritania, and labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The subject of forced labor is tied to the vestiges of slavery which exist in some areas of Mauritania. Slavery was abolished officially only in 1980, and some persons whose ancestors had worked without pay for generations for a particular family still occupied positions of servitude in 1989. This was due in part to the economic hardships they would have encountered if they had left. There were reports, however, that in some remote areas persons were sometimes held against their will and forced to perform unpaid labor. The authorities stop such practices when they come to their attention. The Taya regime is making a systematic effort to appoint members of the former slave caste to high government and military positions as a visible indication of the end of slavery.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Education is not compulsory in Mauritania, but Mauritanian law specifies that no child may be employed before the age of 13 in the agricultural sector without the permission of the Minister of Labor, nor before the age of 15 in the nonagricultural sector. The law provides that employed children aged 14 through 16 should receive 70 percent of the minimum wage, and those from 17 through 18 should receive 90 percent of the minimum wage. In practice, much younger children in the countryside pursue herding, cultivation, and other significant labor in support of their families' traditional activities. Although there are no data available, child labor in the nonagricultural sector is not widespread.

In 1989 the guaranteed minimum wage for adults was equivalent to roughly $70 per month. These wages barely enabled the average family to meet its minimum needs. The standard, nonagricultural workweek in Mauritania cannot exceed either 40 hours or 6 days without overtime compensation, which is paid at the following rates: 41-48 hours--115 percent; 49-54 hours--140 percent; 55 plus hours--150 percent of the base wage. Reliable data on actual wage levels is scanty and unreliable. Enforcement of the labor laws, the responsibility of the Labor Inspectorate, Ministry of Labor, is limited by the shortage of qualified personnel.

A small, densely populated island country, Mauritius is a parliamentary democracy and a member of the Commonwealth of Nations. It is governed by an elected prime minister, a council of ministers, and a legislative assembly. The Governor General, with largely ceremonial powers, represents Queen Elizabeth II, the titular Head of State. Elections at national and local levels take place at regular intervals. There are four major political parties, which reflect a range of ideological views, and several smaller parties. Executive power has changed hands twice in the last 7 years through fair and orderly elections supervised by an independent commission. Prime Minister Jugnauth's coalition had its mandate renewed in general elections in August 1987.

Mauritius has no purely military forces; a paramilitary 700-man Special Mobile Force and a 240-man Special Support Unit are responsible for internal security. These forces, under the command of the Commissioner of Police, are apolitical, well trained, and backed by a general duty police force of approximately 4,000 men.

The economy, based on export-oriented manufacturing (mainly textiles), sugar, and tourism, experienced an economic boom during 1984-88, with an average real growth rate of 7 percent annually. Per capita income, in current terms, almost doubled, rising from $1,065 in 1984 to $1,921 in 1988. Unemployment fell from 21 percent in 1983 to 3.6 percent in 1988, essentially a full-employment situation. With the assistance of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, Mauritius has made remarkable progress in implementing a program combining adjustment, growth, and modernization. Prospects for 1989-90, however, are less optimistic. The emergence of labor and skills shortages, rising inflation, environmental issues, and other physical constraints are expected to slow down economic growth to around 4 percent.

The Government continued to demonstrate respect for human rights. Political and civil rights, including the freedoms of speech and press, are protected under the Mauritian Constitution and respected in practice. The August 30, 1987 elections for Parliament were preceded by intense campaigning, including regular public rallies. The controversial Dangerous Drug Act of 1986 calls, among other things, for the death penalty for traffickers. Under the Act, the defendant is tried by a judge without a jury, which is contrary to established practice.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of government-inspired political or extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance of persons for political causes.

MAURITIUS

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and inhuman punishment are prohibited by law, and there were no reports of degrading treatment or punishment. Vigorous enforcement of the Dangerous Drug Act has led to a decline in drug demand. Drug-related arrests declined in 1988 and 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There have been no reports of arbitrary arrests or detentions since the early 1970's. Detained persons have the right to a judicial determination of the legality of their detention. In practice, this determination is usually made within 24 hours. Bail is commonly granted. The Supreme Court ruled invalid in 1986 a section of the Dangerous Drug Act of 1986 which had provided for detention without bail.

Exile is legally prohibited. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

Mauritius' judicial system, modeled on that of Great Britain, consists of the Supreme Court, which has appellate powers, and a series of lower courts. Final appeal may be made to the Queen's Privy Council in the United Kingdom and is routinely made in the cases of death sentences. There are no political or military courts. The judiciary is independent. The Governor General, in consultation with the Prime Minister, nominates the Chief Justice and, in consultation with the Chief Justice, nominates the senior puisne (associate) judges. The Governor General nominates other judges on the advice of the Judicial and Legal Service Commissions. The legal system has consistently provided fair, public trials to those charged with crimes. Defendants have the right to private or court-appointed counsel. The judiciary is also charged under the Constitution with ensuring that new laws are consistent with democratic practice. There are no political prisoners in Mauritius.

The Dangerous Drug Act, which includes a mandatory death sentence for any person convicted of importing dangerous drugs, has been controversial. Some human rights organizations in Mauritius, as well as individual Mauritians, have criticized the provisions of the law that call for the death penalty and that provide for trial by a judge alone; all other serious offenses are heard by a nine-member jury. At the end of 1989, there were six persons in prison convicted on drug charges and under the death sentence.

The sanctity of the home is guaranteed by law and generally respected in practice. The search of personal property or premises is allowed only under clearly specified conditions by court order or by police decision if an illegal act has been committed. There have been reports from reliable sources that the Government's intelligence apparatus occasionally opens mail and carries out surveillance of local opposition leaders and other major figures.

MAURITIUS

In October 1986, following the Rault Commission on Narcotics, the Legislative Assembly amended the Mauritian Constitution with regard to drug traffickers and drug trafficking in Mauritius. The legislation increased the powers of any commission of inquiry to look into personal finances, including bank accounts; provided for fines of persons who refuse to testify; provided for fining a bank and revoking its license if it refuses to cooperate in a financial investigation; and provided for the seizure of all assets of convicted drug traffickers who cannot prove that their assets were obtained legally.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is protected by the Constitution and by local tradition. Sixteen privately owned daily, weekly, and monthly newspapers present varying political viewpoints and freely express partisan views. Newspapers are subject only to the legal constraints of libel laws. The Government owns the one television and two radio stations (one strictly educational), broadcasting in five languages. The television and radio are reasonably objective in news and entertainment presentation, although opposition politicians occasionally accuse the broadcasting corporation of political bias in its news coverage. Television and radio broadcasts are also easily received from the nearby island of Reunion (a French Department) and are not subject to interference by the Government. However, any foreign satellite broadcasts, or programs from foreign sources, which are deemed controversial are subject to approval by the Council of Ministers before transmission on local television or radio.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Mauritians enjoy the right to form associations, including political parties, trade unions, and religious organizations. Mauritius has a multitude of such private organizations. Political, cultural, and religious assemblies are commonplace. Although police permission is required for holding demonstrations and mass meetings, such permission is rarely refused. The registered political parties freely held large public rallies during the campaign for the August 1987 general elections, the October 1988 municipal elections, and the June 11, 1989, La Caverne/Phoenix by-election.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no official state religion in Mauritius, although Hindus are a majority. Hindus, Christians, Muslims, Buddhists, and others openly practice, teach, and proselytize their religions without prejudice. All religious institutions receive state subsidies in proportion to their memberships. There is no state-sanctioned discrimination against any ethnic or religious community. The Government facilitates the travel of Mauritians who make the hajj. Foreign missionaries are not allowed to enter the country without a prior request from a local religious organization.

MAURITIUS

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on full freedom of movement within the country. Foreign travel and emigration are also unrestricted. There is no blanket guarantee of repatriation, nor general criteria for processing applications for repatriation; applications from the thousands of Mauritians abroad are handled on a case-by-case, and sometimes arbitrary basis.

Citizens have the right to change, and do change their government through democratic means. Mauritius is governed by a freely elected, unicameral Legislative Assembly, with executive direction coming from a Council of Ministers, currently headed by Prime Minister Sir Aneerood Jugnauth whose Alliance coalition won elections in 1983 and 1987. The Governor General has the right to designate the person charged with forming a new government following parliamentary elections or in a parliamentary crisis. Parliamentary, municipal, and village council elections are held at regular intervals. Voting and running for office are rights of all citizens 18 years of age and over.

In the Legislative Assembly, 8 of the 70 members are appointed through a complex "best loser" system designed in part to ensure that all ethnic groups are adequately represented. The governing (3-party) Alliance coalition controls 41 of the 70 seats. Political parties often match the ethnicity or religion of their candidates to the composition of particular electoral constituencies. In the August 1987 parliamentary elections, 89 percent of the 553,364 eligible voters cast ballots. Only 9,512 votes separated the winning and losing coalitions. The opposition controls the five major municipalities, and government parties did not contest the October 25, 1988, municipal elections. The governing Alliance won a June 11, 1989, by-election for the Legislative Assembly in the constituency of La Caverne/Phoenix.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There have been no known requests by international organizations to investigate human rights violations in Mauritius. Several local human rights groups monitor developments without governmental restriction.

Although Mauritius has a Hindu majority, the country's active press and strongly egalitarian traditions militate against discrimination in all forms. However, tensions based on ethnicity and caste do exist.

Women in Mauritius participate in all types of political, business, and social activities, and a few hold important positions. Nonetheless, traditional ethnic and religious attitudes hamper women in achieving true parity. The Mauritian Government seeks to improve the status of women, and recent amendments to laws ranging from emigration to inheritance have removed sex discriminatory sections. An interministerial committee, headed by one of the female ministers, was appointed in 1985 to address remaining discriminatory elements in local laws and practices. In its report in 1988, the committee, which was subsequently disbanded, found that there was little legal discrimination against women. One notable exception, that women cannot serve on juries, may be amended in 1990. The Government decided in July to appoint "desk officers" in the major ministries to oversee women's activities and ensure that the promotion of the interests of women are taken into account.

According to the Ministry of Women's Rights and Family Welfare, physicians, attorneys, and religious and charitable organizations, the problem of violence against women exists and appears to be fairly prevalent, although no reliable statistics are available. There are no special provisions in Mauritian law concerning family violence; there are virtually no institutions that attempt to deal with the problem. The Government's concern about the issue of violence against women has been evident, however. This concern was officially manifested in June 1989 when the Ministry of Women's Rights and Family Welfare established a family counseling service, managed by the National Council of Women, whose mandate is to provide family counseling and legal advice. Some 300 persons have availed themselves of counseling in the intervening period. This counseling has run the gamut of family problems, of which spouse abuse is only one of the issues. However, no specific campaign against spouse abuse has been undertaken. Police authorities are generally reluctant to get involved in instances of wife beating; penalties are rarely imposed and tend to be light. Spouse abuse is not publicly discussed in Mauritius.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Mauritius has an active trade union movement. Almost 300 unions represent about 100,000 workers, more than one-fourth of the work force. Unions are free to organize workers in all sectors, including the export processing zone (EPZ) which employs about 90,000 workers. Less than 10 percent of EPZ workers are believed to be unionized. Unions can press wage demands, establish ties to domestic political parties and international organizations, and address political issues. Three of the five trade union activists who ran in the August 30, 1987, general elections were elected to the Legislative Assembly on the government slate. Wages have become a major issue in recent years as inflation has accelerated.

In theory, unions have the right to strike. However, in labor disputes, the British-modeled Industrial Relations Act (IRA) of 1973 requires a prestrike, 21-day cooling-off period followed by binding arbitration, which has the effect of making most strikes illegal. Refusal to follow IRA procedures in a mid-1988 textile plant strike led to the imprisonment of three union leaders for several days. Government supported labor/management negotiations ultimately led to the reemployment of most of the striking workers. A general strike called by the trade unions for July 4, 1989, received far less support than expected.

One leading federation actively supports the opposition party and is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World

MAURITIUS

Federation of Trade Unions. The largest confederation, the Mauritian Labor Congress, is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

While the right of association is guaranteed by law, there is no legal provision for collective bargaining, which is neither protected nor promoted by the Government. In fact, the Government has imposed restraints on the collective bargaining system which render it ineffective.

The Government has established a National Remuneration Board (NRB) whose chairman is appointed by the Minister of Labor. The NRB establishes minimum wages for 26 categories of private sector workers (sugar, tea, transport, etc.) which apply equally to export processing zone workers. Although originally established to set minimum wages for nonunion workers, the NRB has broadened its powers and now issues remuneration orders that establish minimum wages, bonuses, housing and transportation allowances, and other benefits for almost all private sector workers. About 85 percent of all private sector workers (including unionized workers) are covered by NRB orders. Employers and unions are free to negotiate wages and benefits above the minimums established by the NRB, but this is rare. Wages and benefits for civil servants are established by the Pay Research Bureau (PRB) on the basis of the annual Chesworth Report recommendations. NRB remuneration orders set minimum wages by sector but also establish a wage structure based on length of service and job classification. NRB orders thus set wages for skilled and experienced workers whose earnings are well above the minimum wage. The PRB functions in a similar way for the civil service.

The Government has also established a Tripartite Committee, including employer and trade union representatives, which meets once a year and is chaired by the Minister of Finance. It can only recommend wage increases to the Government based on inflation. Its recommendations are not always unanimous, however, and the Government makes its decision on the basis of all the information it receives.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) has for some time noted that the Industrial Relations Act does not give workers' organizations sufficient protection against acts of interference as provided for by ILO Convention 98 on the right to organize and bargain collectively.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and is not practiced. The COE, however, has noted that sections of the IRA, which empower the Minister to refer any industrial dispute to compulsory arbitration, enforceable by penalties involving compulsory labor, are in conflict with ILO Convention 105 on the Abolition of Forced Labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum work age is 15. The Ministry of Labor is responsible for enforcing child labor laws. In practice, there is minimal enforcement of these laws, especially in EPZ-related industries where a labor shortage exists.

MAURITIUS

Conditions of employment, including wage and leave conditions, are generally sufficient to afford an acceptable standard of living for workers in the agricultural, service, and manufacturing sectors. However, the current rate paid for unskilled labor, $8 per week during the first year and $10 per week thereafter, is barely sufficient for a worker to have a minimum standard of living, and much depends in this respect on the type of additional benefits offered. The Government mandates minimum wage increases each year based on inflation.

A maximum workweek of 45 hours is allowed. Excessive overtime continues to be a problem in the EPZ. The Government addressed this issue in 1987 due to complaints that EPZ employers imposed long hours of overtime on employees--about 10-20 hours per week making for a 55-65 hour workweek. In addition, some EPZ employers still require women to work at night.

The Government sets health and safety standards, and conditions are inspected by Ministry of Labor officials. Enforcement is limited due to the small number of inspectors.

MOZAMBIQUE

Mozambique is a one-party state in which effective power is concentrated in the hands of President Joaquim Chissano and top officials of the party, the Front for the Liberation of Mozambique, or FRELIMO. The Constitution gives the President extensive powers to appoint and dismiss top officials in the ministries, courts, military and security organizations, and provincial governments.

Since the late 1970's, the FRELIMO Government has been under attack from an insurgent group, the Mozambican National Resistance, or RENAMO. Despite agreements between Mozambique and South Africa in 1984 and 1989, and the revival of a joint Mozambican-South African security commission aimed at investigating and ending support to RENAMO, most Mozambican policymakers believe aid from South African and other foreign groups continues.

The security forces include the armed forces of Mozambique (FPLM), numbering about 60,000 soldiers, a people's militia, and the Mozambican National Security Service (SNASP). For its part, RENAMO claims to have 25,000 men under arms and an additional 3,000 trainees. More than 7,000 Zimbabwean troops are assisting government forces, primarily in central Mozambique, with the objective of keeping the Harare-Beira railroad open. Approximately 700 to 800 Malawian troops are assisting in keeping the Nacala rail line open.

Mozambique has a mixed economy, consisting of state-owned enterprises, cooperatives, and private enterprises. Up to 85 percent of the population, however, is employed in small scale, semisubsistence agriculture. Once a self-proclaimed Marxist-Leninist party, the FRELIMO Fifth Party Congress in July removed the reference to Marxism and endorsed the 2-year-old economic reform plan which has fostered currency devaluations, budgetary cuts, and reductions in the areas of the economy reserved exclusively for state enterprises. While growth in 1989 was projected at 4 percent, the continuing civil conflict has undercut many of the benefits of the reforms. RENAMO deliberately attacks economic targets; in some areas, the prevailing anarchy has led to the total breakdown of internal trade. A combination of war and unfavorable weather has disrupted food production to the point that a third of the nation's population is thought to be dependent on international food aid.

Human rights were tightly circumscribed in 1989. Major human rights concerns were harsh prison conditions; the use of arbitrary, incommunicado detention, especially by SNASP; the denial of fair trials; restrictions on freedoms of press, assembly, and association, and the right of citizens to change their government; and serious limitations on worker rights. However, it became more possible during the year for people to voice their views, including in people's assemblies and public meetings. The Government and party, especially at the Fifth Party Congress in July, continued to address some of the abuses, reorganizing the legal system to reduce SNASP and military dominance of the judiciary. A new constitution which included a bill of rights was discussed in party forums at the end of the year and proposed to the public on January 9, 1990. Publication and ratification are expected in 1990.

The most blatant abuses of basic human rights occurred as a direct result of the conflict. Widespread reports of massacres directed against civilians, kidnappings, torture, and looting continued throughout the year. Most of these atrocities were attributed to RENAMO, but some were also attributed to government forces. Seeking an end to the civil war, which has cost 600,000 lives, the Government launched a peace initiative in January, using Mozambican religious leaders and Kenyan and Zimbabwean mediators to explore contacts. Despite these efforts, at the end of 1989 fighting had intensified. An estimated 2 million people were displaced, half of them living in refugee camps in neighboring countries, the remainder living in "accommodation centers" throughout the country.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Both sides were again responsible for the deaths of civilians in the course of their conflict (see Section 1.g.). Most of the killings are attributed to RENAMO forces. Deplorable prison conditions resulted in some deaths (see Section 1.c.).

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of government-perpetrated disappearances in 1989. However, there are thousands missing due to the conflict, including as a result of kidnappings in areas affected by the war. RENAMO, in particular, regularly holds civilians against their will, often employing them as porters or forcibly impressing them.

Amnesty International (AI), in a special 1989 report, expressed its concern about several disappearance cases, including those of Uria Simangi and Joana Simeno, and sought, without success, information from the Government on the whereabouts of a number of political opponents of the Government who disappeared from detention in the mid-1970's.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Both government and RENAMO forces have been accused of torturing prisoners and civilians. Journalist William Finnegan described one 1989 incident in which FPLM soldiers severely beat a farmer they suspected of collaborating with RENAMO. RENAMO's systematic practice of beating or mutilating civilians continued unabated in 1989. According to many reports, RENAMO has cut off lips, ears, breasts, and limbs, burned or buried people alive, and forced family members to witness or participate in the tortures of their relatives. Former RENAMO soldiers claimed that threats of beating and torture were used to keep forced recruits from escaping.

In September the National People's Assembly repealed, for both military and civilian courts, Mozambique's controversial "flogging law" which allowed people convicted of certain offenses to be punished by whipping. In practice, very few courts have imposed the flogging penalty, although military courts sentenced two soldiers to flogging in the final weeks before the law was repealed. In February charges were brought against an agent of the popular police in Maputo, because he had ordered two women flogged without due process.

MOZAMBIQUE

Prison conditions in Mozambique remain life threatening. In June the local press reported that 15 prisoners had starved to death in a prison in Manica Province. Prison officials failed to purchase adequate food. The officials said severe budget cuts and inflation had deprived them of sufficient resources. In the aftermath of the scandal, provincial authorities launched an investigation of prison conditions and increased the prison budget.

Since 1988 the Government has allowed the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) access to the prisons where national security prisoners, both those already convicted and those awaiting trial, are held. RENAMO does not permit ICRC access to areas under its control, claiming that it holds no prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The law requires that in most cases detainees be charged or released within 30 days. However, persons accused of the most serious crimes can be detained for up to 84 days without being formally charged or investigated. With court approval, such detainees can then be held for two additional periods of 84 days while the police complete their investigation. While detained, persons have the constitutional right to counsel and to contact relatives and friends. In some cases, detainees may be released from prison while the investigation proceeds, but the bail system in Mozambique remains ill-defined. The law provides that if the prescribed period for investigation has been completed and no charges have been brought, the detainee must be released. In practice, however, this is often overlooked, in part because of the severe lack of administrative resources and trained lawyers.

The security police (SNASP) organized under the Ministry of National Security, have the power to arrest persons accused of political and economic crimes against the State, such as espionage or sabotage. In September the Government restored the right of political prisoners to submit habeas corpus petitions. These detainees now have the same rights as other prisoners: to contact a lawyer and to be charged or released within a set period of time. In practice, these guarantees are also often overlooked due a lack of administrative resources. The SNASP can also order preventive detention, for indefinite periods, and many persons are never brought before a court. These detainees are often held incommunicado and do not have the right to challenge the legality of their detention.

The number of political/security detainees awaiting trial as distinguished from those that had been convicted was unknown at year's end. An estimated 600 prisoners were held in SNASP military prisons at the end of 1989. In August under the authority of the amnesty law, the Ministry of Justice ordered the release of 1,600 prisoners from civilian prisons, including 100 security prisoners convicted under the defunct Revolutionary Military Tribunal.

There were no reports of anyone being exiled from Mozambique during 1989. The law of amnesty, first promulgated for a 12-month period in 1987, remained in force throughout 1989. The Government maintains that this amnesty permits any RENAMO member to return to civilian life and participate in the political life of the country. Over 3,000 ex-RENAMO members reportedly returned in 1988. The Government claimed that thousands more accepted amnesty in 1989, although many of these were probably civilians living in RENAMO-controlled areas rather than actual fighters. There have been few reports of mistreatment of amnestied RENAMO members.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Mozambique now has two complementary justice systems: the civil/criminal, composed of the judiciary under the Ministry of Justice and a police force under the Ministry of Interior; and the military justice system, under the Ministry of National Security. The latter has jurisdiction over most cases involving crimes committed by military personnel and cases of crimes by civilians which adversely affect the military. A separate court system for national security crimes, the Revolutionary Military Tribunal, was abolished in December 1988. The Minister of Justice appoints judges at the district and provincial level, while the President appoints judges to the newly formed Supreme Court.

With the establishment of the Supreme People's Court and the appointment of Supreme Court justices in the final months of 1988, the Mozambican legal system took on the final form envisaged in the 1976 judiciary organization law. Persons accused of crimes against the security of the people and the State (i.e., the majority of political prisoners) are now tried by the provincial courts under standard criminal judicial procedures, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. This represents a significant improvement over trials conducted by the former Revolutionary Military Tribunal.

Nonpolitical trials conducted by the regular civil and criminal court system are generally fair, are held in public, and carry the right of appeal. However, a large backlog of pending cases has resulted in long waiting periods before cases are brought to trial. Political trials can be held in public; but SNASP can order that a specific trial be closed.

In theory, SNASP's influence over the judicial process has been greatly reduced, although its extensive detention powers are apparently unchanged. Whether provincial courts will be able to resist executive and military influence in political and security cases has yet to be tested. As far as is known, there were no such cases tried at the provincial level in 1989.

In addition to the regular people's courts at the provincial and district levels, there are at the local level customary courts which handle matters such as estate and divorce cases. The proceedings are usually conducted in public by a trained representative of the Ministry of Justice, assisted by two or four popularly elected lay judges instructed to exercise common sense and to apply locally accepted principles.

The Military Crimes and Military Tribunal law which took effect in 1988 established a nationwide system of brigade courts and provincial military courts and specified military-related crimes.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

In areas of active insurgency, homes are entered at will by security or police forces. It is widely assumed that surveillance devices are employed to monitor local and international telecommunications systems and that mail is periodically inspected.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

In 1989 RENAMO staged a series of attacks in every province of the country. The Government responded with a July offensive on RENAMO's headquarters in central Mozambique. Both government (FPLM) and RENAMO forces were again responsible for violations of humanitarian law in 1989, although RENAMO abuses continued to be much more widespread and systematic. Attacks against civilians were reported almost daily, and, given the remoteness of much of the countryside, many more attacks undoubtedly went unreported.

In January refugees crossing into Malawi from Tete Province said that in several separate instances FPLM forces had herded suspected RENAMO sympathizers into their huts, which were then set ablaze. Although the refugees were vague about numbers, scores of people died. In general, however, FRELIMO abuses, especially summary executions, have declined since the implementation of the Government's heavily publicized amnesty program. Government forces occasionally forced rural people into guarded villages, especially in areas where local sympathies for RENAMO were thought to be high. A Maputo daily newspaper reported that civilians, mainly in rural areas, complain of living in fear of FRELIMO soldiers' misconduct, especially in their abuse of women. AI reports that in May and June 1989 six soldiers and militia members were charged with various offenses. The local media have published accounts of punishments for such abuse.

Numerous credible sources report that RENAMO still executes noncombatants after attacks on villages, often hacking or burning people to death, apparently to intimidate would-be resisters. Such assassinations are especially aimed at any representative of the Government, including party officials, school teachers, and health workers. In one such attack on a communal village in Gaza Province in the south, 54 civilians are said to have died. In March RENAMO killed three Italian Capuchin priests and held one captive briefly after attacking their mission. In July, apparently timed for the Fifth Party Congress, RENAMO forces attacked a suburb 6 miles north of Maputo, killing four civilians, and, according to government sources, torturing four others, including an 8-year old child, by cutting off their ears. Also in July RENAMO guerrillas reportedly killed more than 80 civilians in an attack on Ressano Garcia, a town close to the South African border.

Numerous other refugee accounts accuse RENAMO of systematically kidnaping civilians, including children, some in their early teens, who are forced to bear arms for RENAMO. RENAMO also forces civilians, after an attack on their settlement, to carry confiscated items back to RENAMO camps; those prisoners too weak to keep up are sometimes killed. Prisoners allegedly are forced to cultivate food for the insurgents, and violence against women, including rape, is common. RENAMO's policy of deliberate destruction of economic targets, including factories and land transportation facilities, has touched off famine conditions in some areas, particularly Zambezia Province. Relief convoys, health workers, and clinics were frequently targeted for attack.

MOZAMBIQUE

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

In 1989 Mozambicans were allowed to speak freely on many issues, but press freedom was restricted. The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and opinion and citizens are officially encouraged to express their views in grassroots and higher level party meetings. The FRELIMO Fifth Party Congress in July was the culmination of a year-long debate on wide-ranging policy matters in party assemblies nationwide.

The national media remain small and controlled. The two radio stations and one television station are government owned; the print media are owned by private entities, but the Government makes key management decisions and provides subsidies. There is no prior censorship, but it is understood that the press must follow certain guidelines; it cannot contradict government policy, and it must support the general goals of FRELIMO. Within these limits the media can engage in vigorous investigative reporting. In 1989 the media featured frequent press exposes of incidents of official abuse of power, bureaucratic mismanagement, and government and military corruption.

Given the problems of poverty, illiteracy, and shortage of hard currency, the market for books and publications is small. However, some foreign publications, including independent Western news magazines, do occasionally appear in bookstores. Church groups circulate newsletters and pastoral letters. Western journalists (including Americans) are welcome in Mozambique, and the Government assists in their visits. Regular foreign radio broadcasts and South African television are received without interference or restrictions.

Academic freedom is circumscribed. Some attempt is made to encourage teachers to promote pro-FRELIMO patriotism and to provide texts with a similar bias. In fact, resource limitations render these attempts ineffectual. Students at the university level complain of "elitism" on the part of senior professors which discourages the full interchange of ideas more than they complain of ideological limitations on debate.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

No political organization is permitted outside the party. The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association, but it also makes FRELIMO, the "guide of the organs of state power," the only legal political organization. All mass organizations, such as the women's and youth's organizations and the sole labor union, are associated with the party. Nonpolitical association is uncommon, but permitted (e.g., leading private businessmen formed an association in 1988).

Organized protest and demonstrations are rare. One major exception was a student strike in May at Eduardo Mondlane University. Students, while carefully stressing that theirs was not a political movement, demanded improved living conditions, scholarships, and a more representative student organization than that provided by the FRELIMO-linked organization of Mozambican youth. Eventually, high government officials addressed some of their demands, and the students returned peacefully to their classes, without penalty.

MOZAMBIQUE

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution mandates strict separation of church and state and guarantees individuals the freedom to "practice or not practice a religion." Religious institutions, however, are required to "conform with the State's laws." The Government does not require religious organizations or missionaries to register, and foreign missionaries are readily granted visas.

In the early postindependence period, relations between the Government and religious organizations were frequently tense and characterized by numerous expropriations of church property and official criticism of religious activities and beliefs. In recent years, however, the Government has attempted a rapprochement with religious institutions that intensified in 1989. The Government and party leaders praised major denominations for their contribution to Mozambican social development, and the Fifth Party Congress decided to allow private entities, presumably including religious institutions, to operate schools. In December the Government returned the Maputo synagogue to the local Jewish community. In the formal dialog between the Government and leaders from several religious denominations, the discussions centered on a comprehensive law to resolve such issues as the extent to which religious groups can print and distribute publications, the ownership of some expropriated church properties, and whether Muslim women can be exempt from obligatory military service. However, the Government has not yet returned a Maputo church seminary or passed legislation on religious freedom, as it had indicated it would do.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

As an emergency security measure and to prevent evasion of conscription, the Government requires all citizens to obtain travel permits from the local authorities. In practice, this directive is often ignored because of the lack of administrative control and resources in parts of the countryside. However, many religious leaders complain that government security regulations requiring missionaries and others to seek permission for interprovincial travel interferes unduly with their work. The Government also requires people to move from areas designated as security zones. There is no exile or revocation of Mozambican citizenship for political reasons.

Presently, some 385 refugees of various nationalities, including South African, have successfully sought refugee status in Mozambique. These refugees receive material aid from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) with the full cooperation of the Mozambican Government. There are no reported cases in which refugees have been forced to return to countries where they have a well-founded fear of persecution.

Security conditions have forced many Mozambicans to leave their homes. An estimated 1 million are internal refugees, living mainly in displaced persons camps scattered throughout the country. In these camps, they receive emergency aid from the Government and from the international community. Many thousands more have taken refuge in neighboring countries. According to recent estimates, 627,700 Mozambican refugees are in Malawi alone. Other receiving countries include Zimbabwe, with 74,000 refugees; Tanzania, 72,000; Zambia, 24,000; and Swaziland, 10,000. Another 38,000 are thought to be in South Africa, although this estimate is only an approximation, given the difficulty in distinguishing economic migrants from displaced persons and refugees.

While Mozambican law does not address the issue of emigration, in practice the Government does not interfere with those who wish to leave. The Government readily accepts and aids repatriates. An estimated 116,000 refugees have returned to Mozambique, some on their own initiative and some through UNHCR voluntary repatriation programs coordinated with neighboring governments. South Africa routinely repatriates undocumented Mozambicans, although in recent well-publicized instances, they have allowed the temporary entry of villagers who are fleeing RENAMO attack. The Government has protested these involuntary repatriations, including from Zimbabwe, but is unable to prevent them.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right to change their government or the laws that govern them. In practice, the President and the Council of Ministers control policymaking and implementation. The President has extensive appointive powers in both his government and party roles. He sets policy guidelines in consultation with the 12-person Politburo and the 164-member Central Committee of FRELIMO, whose members are elected at party congresses at 5-year intervals. The Constitution does not allow the formation of new or dissenting parties. Non-FRELIMO party members, however, may and do participate in the Government, including at the ministerial level.

People may choose delegates to a series of hierarchically organized peoples' assemblies, including the National People's Assembly, from a slate of candidates prepared by FRELIMO. The peoples' assemblies have been the scenes of occasional spirited debates, but they function largely as advisory bodies, with little real power to initiate policies not sanctioned by high-level authorities.

Following the contacts between church leaders and RENAMO groups in Kenya, the Government and party publicly backed peace talks with RENAMO. The Fifth Party Congress endorsed a negotiated settlement but stipulated that RENAMO must agree to renounce violence and support the current Government, its laws and Constitution. President Chissano also asked the Presidents of Kenya and Zimbabwe to help mediate the conflict. For its part RENAMO demands free elections and a multiparty system. However, there is considerable variance between RENAMO's demands and its practices in its areas of operations. RENAMO has not established any recognizable administrative machinery that might provide a more concrete indicator of its plan of government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government was increasingly receptive to international human rights monitoring groups in 1989. An AI delegation visited Mozambique in September, at the Government's invitation, and AI's subsequent report commanded favorable, if selective, comment by the Government. The decision to repeal the law on flogging may have been influenced by concern expressed by various international groups.

The ICRC now has access to security prisons nationwide and is likely to begin visits to civilian prisons, where some security prisoners are reportedly held. The Ministry of Justice and the ICRC organized a conference on human rights in March to discuss the application of human rights principles in international human rights conventions and the problems of refugees and asylum in Mozambique. U.N. agencies, such as the UNHCR and the International Labor Organization (ILO), also have programs in the country.

There are no internal Mozambican human rights organizations, either official or independent. Current restrictions on freedoms of speech and press would make it difficult, if not impossible, for any group to report fully and objectively on the Government's human rights policies.

According to official government policy and pronouncements, Mozambique is a multiracial, nondiscriminatory society. There does not appear to be any systematic persecution on the basis of ethnicity or race. There are no ethnic or racially based quotas on government employment or benefits, nor is the Government controlled by any one of Mozambique's 10 major ethnic groups.

Nonetheless, the FRELIMO Government tends to include a disproportionate number of southerners, mostly from the Shangaan ethnic group, at all levels. Members of the northern Makonde tribe are well represented. White, Asian, and mixed-race Mozambicans are also heavily represented relative to their numbers in the population, causing a certain degree of resentment. However, whites, Asians, and those of mixed race are not allowed in the military. Most observers, both Mozambican and foreign, believe that ethnic imbalance results from the greater educational opportunities available to southerners and nonblacks under the former colonial administration and not from deliberate government policies. In 1989 the disproportionately high number of Shangaan speakers in higher education was cited by university and government officials as an injustice requiring priority action. It is widely believed that the personnel changes following the Fifth Party Congress were intended to promote greater regional balance. The Government has also been undertaking a little publicized "Africanization" program of moving black Africans into positions formerly occupied by whites.

The leadership of the RENAMO insurgents is predominantly from the Shona-speaking ethnic groups who live near the Zimbabwean border.

The Constitution forbids discrimination on the basis of sex and mandates equal rights and responsibilities for women. Family law requires that women have equal property rights and rights over the children in any marriage. FRELIMO's mass organization for women, the Organization of Mozambican Women (OMM), has made a long-term project of studying the traditional practices of the various ethnic groups and challenging, through grassroots education programs, those practices that are determined to be detrimental to women.

According to medical and other sources, violence against women, especially wife beating, is fairly widespread in Mozambique, especially in the rural areas. The police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes, and cases are rarely brought before the courts. Official government policy is against such violence, but it has not addressed the issue specifically, and its influence is weak, especially in many rural areas affected by the civil war. The FRELIMO women's organization has a campaign to change public attitudes. Other practices, such as female genital mutilation (circumcision) and bride-price payments, also continue in some rural areas. Female circumcision is found most frequently in coastal areas, particularly among Muslim groups.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

All workers are free to join or not to join a trade union. However, all trade unions must belong to a central labor union association, the Organization of Mozambican Workers (OTM), which is loosely affiliated with FRELIMO. Trade unions independent of the OTM are prohibited by law, and there has been no known effort to form another federation. In past years, over half of the salaried workers in Mozambique belonged to OTM-affiliated unions. However, press reports indicate that union membership in Maputo Province, where a disproportionate number of Mozambique's salaried workers are located, actually decreased in 1989. Many factories have been destroyed in the conflict with RENAMO, forcing OTM members who lost their salaried jobs to turn to subsistence agriculture. Other workers have become too impoverished to pay union dues.

Unions do not have the right to strike in practice, and there was no known strike activity in 1989. High unemployment makes strike action ineffective. In mid-1988, a wildcat strike by dockworkers ended when the Government fired the strikers and replaced them with newly hired workers.

The OTM considers its relations with international trade union organizations to be an important element of its mission, and it frequently serves as a conduit for foreign assistance to Mozambican trade unions. The OTM is not affiliated with any non-African international trade union organizations. It is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Council. The OTM participates in exchange and training programs with the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations and with unions from several Western European nations. The OTM also has extensive ties to Soviet and East European unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers are only allowed to organize and negotiate with employers within the OTM structure. Union membership is voluntary, but the Government encourages workers to join and actively participate in unions. The Government sets wage rates, so collective bargaining, as such, does not exist. However, the Government consults the OTM on labor and economic policies which affect unions, and the OTM monitors occupational safety conditions.

One of the OTM's primary activities is to represent workers at disciplinary action hearings and during labor disputes. The OTM sponsors a number of training programs for workers and operates a canteen service to provide low-cost meals at work sites and factories.

Some professional organizations, such as the Association for Journalists, Writers, and Musicians, have attained quasi-union status following a 1988 agreement that allowed them to petition the National People's Assembly for improvements in members' working conditions. The Association of Mozambican Journalists received a significant wage increase for its members as a result.

There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law; there have been no reports of such labor practices by the Government. RENAMO reportedly forces kidnaped civilians to perform various support functions, including portering arms and supplies, and growing food for combatants.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Child labor is regulated, and in the wage economy the minimum working age is 16. Because of high adult unemployment, there are few children in regular wage positions. However, minor children commonly work on family farms or in the urban informal sector, where they perform such tasks as watching cars or collecting scrap metal.

The minimum wage is set at about $27.50 per month at the current official exchange rate, although it is less than half that amount in dollar terms at the black market rate of exchange. This salary is not adequate to sustain an average worker's family, especially under the ongoing economic reform plan which reduced or removed government subsidies on many basic goods. Given the 40 percent unemployment rate and the occasional lack of effective government enforcement, many salaried workers are probably receiving less than the minimum, and workers must turn to second jobs, if available, or more likely to subsistence agriculture to survive. An estimated 85 percent of the work force is engaged in semisubsistence agriculture, which is not covered by minimum wage legislation.

The standard legal work week is 44 hours. Women workers are guaranteed 2 months paid maternity leave, although it is difficult to ensure compliance with these regulations. If firms have day-care facilities, women reportedly have the right to two breaks of 30 minutes duration daily for a year to feed their children.

Most of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture and is not affected by the wage economy and government regulations regarding working conditions. In the small, modern sector, the Government has enacted health and environmental laws to protect workers. On occasion, the Government has closed firms for noncompliance with these laws, but enforcement is difficult in the current economic situation.

NAMIBIA

Formerly German South West Africa, Namibia since 1915 has been ruled by the Republic of South Africa. Under the terms of the Tripartite Agreement signed in New York on December 22, 1988, by the People's Republic of Angola, the Republic of Cuba and the Republic of South Africa, South Africa agreed to implement the U. N. Plan for the independence of Namibia in accordance with United Nations Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 435. Implementation of the UN Plan began on April 1, 1989, and will continue until Namibia becomes independent, which is scheduled to occur by April 1, 1990. Until independence the South African Government through its Administrator-General (AG) will continue to administer the territory under the supervision and control of the Special Representative of the U.N. Secretary-General (SRSG) and the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG).

The South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) won Namibia's first free election in November for a Constituent Assembly which will prepare a new constitution, but it failed to gain the two-thirds majority needed to have a free hand in in drafting the constitution. SWAPO, primarily an African nationalist organization with previous ties to Eastern Europe, Angola and Cuba, had waged a 23-year bush war against South Africa for Namibia's independence. Until recently, SWAPO advocated a Marxist-oriented economic and political system in Namibia, but since implementation of the U.N. Plan it has espoused the importance of a free market economy and democratic principles. At SWAPO's suggestion, the Constituent Assembly adopted the framework for the Constitution which will embody the basic principles governing the organization and powers of the government, the holding of elections, and protection of human rights agreed to in July 1982 by the parties involved in the U.N. Resolution 435 negotiation process.

The Transitional Government of National Unity installed by South Africa in 1985 was disbanded in March 1989 and its functions absorbed by the Administrator-General. A general cease-fire took effect in the guerrilla war in the north in September 1988 and held until April 1, 1989. On that date, SWAPO sent hundreds of armed members of its military wing, the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN), across Namibia's northern border, violating the cease-fire and its obligations under UNSCR 435. Widespread fighting erupted throughout northern Namibia, in which over 300 PLAN fighters and about 30 members of the reactivated special counterinsurgency unit known as "Koevoet" (which means crowbar in Afrikaans) and other security forces were killed. Following vigorous diplomatic efforts by the countries concerned, on May 19, 1989, South Africa, Angola, and Cuba agreed that the situation was under sufficient control so that implementation of the U.N. Plan could proceed.

After mid-May, implementation of the U.N. Plan radically changed the political atmosphere. The South African Defense Force (SADF) withdrew on schedule, and a residual 1,500 SADF men, who were confined to base under UNTAG monitoring, departed shortly after the elections in November. The South West African Territorial Force (SWATF) was disbanded, and its weapons placed under UNTAG control. Over 40,000 exiled Namibians, mostly SWAPO members, were repatriated. Exiled SWAPO leaders, including SWAPO President Nujoma, returned and openly campaigned in the elections. Under the terms of the UN Plan, on July 20 after talks with the SRSG, the AG released 24 political prisoners. SWAPO had called for the release of another 8 being held in Windhoek jail, but the SRSg was advised by an independent jurist that they should not benefit from the political prisoner amnesty program. At year's end, three were still being held: one was serving a 20 year sentence for sabotage and murder as a result of a bomb blast in Oshakati in 1987; the other two were serving lesser sentences for bombings in 1987 and 1988. In addition, amnesty was granted to persons born in Namibia who chose to return under the auspices of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR).

Many of the detainees held by SWAPO in prisons in Angola were released, although 256 remained unaccounted for, and 115 were presumed dead. Many were allegedly murdered by SWAPO while being held in SWAPO prisons in Angola. South West African laws deemed by the SRSg to be prejudicial to holding of free and fair elections--including many security laws used to suppress political activity--were repealed. The AG disbanded Koevoet on September 30. The AG also created the O'Linn Commission, a special commission under a respected human rights advocate with broad powers to investigate charges of intimidation and election malpractice. This commission made two judgments against instances of police and political party misconduct. It found alleged former members of Koevoet guilty of assaulting SWAPO supporters on their way to a police station in Ovamboland to obtain permission to hold a political rally. The Commission also found against a policeman in Caprivi who attempted to cover up an assault on a SWAPO supporter.

Certain persistent problems plagued the implementation process. Reports of misconduct by the South West African Police (SWAPOL), such as intimidation at political rallies and harassment of pro-SWAPOL supporters, continued through September. SWAPOL was also accused of being pro-Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (DTA). In addition, former members of the SWATF were reportedly responsible for many incidents of anti-SWAPOL harassment and intimidation. Press reports issued during the election period from UNTAG and the AG's office indicated that both SWAPO and the DTA practiced intimidation against each other and the smaller parties. Responding to an increase in incidents through August, the SRSg called on the leadership of the political parties in September to agree on a code of conduct aimed at reducing violence and ameliorating the atmosphere of mutual suspicion and tension.

Unfortunately a terrorist incident marred the implementation process. Extremist whites were allegedly responsible for a bombing attack in August on an UNTAG office in Outjo in which a Namibian citizen was killed. Three suspects, members of the "White Wolves," a self-proclaimed white supremacist organization, were arrested and arraigned on charges of arson and murder in September. Press reports citing police investigations alleged that the White Wolves had ties to other extremist groups in South Africa. On December 5, the suspects escaped from police custody and were still at large at year's end. Also in September a prominent white official of SWAPO was assassinated. SWAPOL arrested a suspect 2 days later, who remained in police custody in Windhoek prison at the end of 1989 charged with murder. Anonymous callers identifying themselves as White Wolves claimed responsibility for the murder and threatened other white activists with death. Except for the April 1 incursion, SWAPO has not been linked to terrorist incidents.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were several charges of politically motivated killings during 1989. In Rundu in August, two policemen shot and killed a former Koevoet member who had joined SWAPO. While the policemen claimed they fired in self-defense, local human rights advocates suspected the former Koevoet member was murdered. Also in August, Petrus Joseph was murdered, allegedly because he had complained of police harassment for some time. Petrus, along with Paulus David and four other ex-Koevoet members, had obtained a court order in March 1989 to restrain members of the security forces from intimidating and harassing them. David testified in court that senior officers had ordered Koevoet members to arrest and intimidate people suspected of being SWAPO supporters. Between March and August 1989, Petrus Joseph continued to complain of police harassment, and in early August he was shot dead in his home by police. Police claimed Petrus had threatened them with a pistol, forcing them to shoot in self-defense. The police also said they had found hand grenades in Petrus' home. A formal inquest into the case was convened in Rundu in September, with members of Namibia's Legal Assistance Center acting for the victim's family. The results of the inquest were scheduled to be heard in December, but the accused policemen did not appear in court. The inquest hearing was rescheduled for February 1990. The Legal Assistance Center said the policemen had not been properly subpoenaed.

In mid-August several persons, reportedly white extremists with links to South African extremist groups, launched an attack with guns and incendiary grenades against UNTAG facilities at Outjo; one Namibian security guard was killed. Three men were arrested in September and October and charged with arson and murder in this attack. The three men escaped from police custody December 5 and were still at large at year's end. A policeman shot during the escape died on December 19. In late September, a DTA member was beaten to death by a group of SWAPO supporters in Ovamboland; the DTA claimed that the attack was motivated solely because the person was a member of the DTA. The murder sparked interparty fighting between DTA and SWAPO supporters, leading to the deaths of several SWAPO members. In mid-September a policeman was killed while in hot pursuit of a criminal who sought refuge in the town of Otjiwarongo in northern Namibia. A mob, reportedly of SWAPO supporters, sought to protect the fugitive. The policeman wounded two attackers from the mob before he was overpowered and beaten to death. Also in September, a senior white official of SWAPO, Anton Lubowski, was assassinated in front of his home by unknown gunmen; police arrested a suspect 2 days later, who at year's end was in detention and charged with murder. In each instance of killing the South African authorities convened an inquest. In most of these cases, various perpetrators have been arrested and charged, though none had come to trial by the end of 1989. Local human rights groups expressed dissatisfaction with these proceedings. No security force member has been prosecuted, although a case is still pending for security force members held for the 1986 murder of Immanuel Shifidi at a political rally. Several of the killings did not appear to have been directly motivated by politics, but because of the tense atmosphere preceding the elections, every confrontation between the local population and the police took on political overtones.

Former detainees of SWAPO forces who returned to Namibia in July alleged that many detainees had been executed without trials or hearings in the SWAPO prisons in Angola. The detainees produced a list of 74 persons believed to have been killed by SWAPO security personnel. The deaths dated from 1976 to 1988; none was alleged to have occurred in 1989. SWAPO spokesmen said the movement did detain persons whom it identified as spies for South Africa but had released all of them.

The former SWAPO detainees released a list of 449 names of persons believed to be still held by SWAPO in prisons in Angola. The former detainees claimed that several hundred others, whose names they did not know, were also being held. SWAPO leaders said they had released all of their detainees. The U.N. Special Representative, who has a mandate under the U.N. Plan to ensure the release of all political prisoners held by both sides, sent a team to Angola and Zambia in September to investigate the fate of those reported to be missing. Subsequently, from a list of 1,100 names, the team accounted for over half of the reported missing and detained. By mid-December the number unaccounted for stood at 256. At that time Namibians were still coming forward to identify themselves as persons on the "missing" list. The UNTAG mission continued to meet regularly in Windhoek (capital of Namibia) to resolve the remaining cases.

Prisoners released by the South Africans in June and July alleged that a number of prisoners had died while in custody or been taken into the bush and killed. Under previous security laws police were not required to notify their superiors or relatives of the detainees of detentions, and detainees could be held in any location desired by the detaining officers. Amnesty International (AI), in its August 1989 report on Namibia, noted that it remains impossible to say exactly how many people disappeared while in South African custody.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

Allegations of security force abuses declined in 1989, but the events of April 1 led to a sudden resurgence of charges of brutality by the police and members of the SWATF 101 battalion. Allegations against Koevoet and SWATF surged dramatically following the April 1 SWAPO incursion. There were 400 complaints against SWAPOL elements from April 1 to August 1. Many of these incidents stopped short of armed violence. There were also a number of reports of civilians beaten by members of the security forces, particularly by members of Koevoet, although many acts of violence attributed to Koevoet were committed by active or demobilized members of SWATF. By August 1989 continuing reports of misconduct and harassment, including beatings, of civilians by former Koevoet members reached such a point that the Special Representative, supported by the Security Council, demanded that they be withdrawn from the police force. This was accomplished in October.

NAMIBIA

Former SWAPO detainees, on their return to Namibia, stated they had been beaten and tortured by their SWAPO guards while imprisoned. Some claimed they had been tortured because they were intellectuals or better educated than the SWAPO inner circle. Many, including women, displayed extensive scars. Men were commonly beaten on the back, buttocks, and legs; a number said they were hung upside down from trees or roof beams and beaten. Women were burned on their breasts with lighted cigarettes. Several detainees said they knew personally of victims who were beaten or tortured to death. AI also cited, in its report on Namibia, allegations by detainees of torture and deplorable conditions of imprisonment in SWAPO-controlled camps in Angola.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although security legislation which permitted detention without trial has been repealed in accordance with the U.N. Plan, and while security forces are now obliged to notify the UNTAG police monitors when they make an arrest, reports and allegations of SWAPOL misconduct continued to be a serious problem into September. SWAPOL was accused of making arrests without warrants, and there were a few cases of incommunicado detention. As the election drew near, political tension between DTA and SWAPO supporters increased which resulted in more reports of SWAPOL misconduct. With DTA and SWAPO confrontations on the rise, SWAPOL's role in handling the confrontations increased and so did reports and allegations of misconduct. SWAPOL also conducted the investigation of allegations against itself, since UNTAG served in a monitoring and not investigatory capacity. While UNTAG police monitors have been unable to prevent all abuses, few of SWAPOL's arrests resulted in formal charges, and most of those arrested were released within a few hours. Relatives of people who are arrested often appeal directly to UNTAG police monitors for assistance. UNTAG monitors cannot overturn arrests, but they can confirm the identities of those arrested, monitor investigations of police behavior, and report abusive behavior or police misconduct.

There were no reports of new detentions by the security forces in 1989. Police must now present the accused before a magistrate within 24 hours and lay a formal charge. The accused has the right to be represented by an attorney, although the police do not always facilitate access. The Government stopped funding in 1989 a legal aid program. On capital offense charges, however, the State still is required to provide and pay for an advocate.

Former detainees of SWAPO claimed that no judicial procedures were observed in connection with their detention. They publicly stated to the press and international organizations that they were often not even informed that they had been arrested. Many claimed they were simply thrown into dungeons; they were not advised of any rights or of the charges against them. None was tried or brought before any hearing; the purpose of the torture cited above, according to some detainees, was to extract confessions and to force the victims to implicate others, who would be arrested and tortured as well. Some of these confessions were allegedly videotaped and shown to senior SWAPO leaders as "evidence" of the detainee's guilt; most were accused of spying for South Africa. Many of the detainees believe that they were the victims of a party purge, singled out because of political differences, tribal affiliation, or because they were "intellectuals."

NAMIBIA

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is independent of the executive branch (now the AG), and the Supreme Court in Windhoek is widely respected for its integrity. There are only two court levels in Namibia, magistrate and supreme. The Supreme Court is the high court. For appeals, cases are subject to appellate review by the South African Court of Appeals in Bloemfontein. Although Namibia was in transitional status, the State's Attorney could still appeal politically sensitive cases to Bloemfontein, because the SRSG had neither jurisdiction over the legal system nor any relationship with the Namibian courts. Trials are public, and defendants have a right to counsel. There is little criticism of the courts themselves, which administer a Roman-Dutch legal system, whereby cases are heard by a magistrate or a panel of judges. Former criticism of the legal system concerned the widespread use of detention without trial, notably under AG 9 of 1977 or Section 6 of South Africa's Terrorism Act of 1967. Those brought to trial now can expect a fair hearing based on the legal merits of their case, and there is a right of appeal. Defendants are considered innocent until proven guilty.

In March 1989, a full bench of the Supreme Court of Namibia invalidated South African President P.W. Botha's decision in March 1988 to halt the trial of six security force members charged with the murder of Immanuel Shifidi at a political rally in 1986. An appeal to the South African court in Bloemfontein is still pending. Since implementation of the UN Plan, legal rights groups have noted the light sentences that the Supreme Court has given for crimes caused by or related to political motives of political party supporters or members of the police.

The Namibian courts, supreme and magistrate, also have been careful not to involve themselves in cases which might threaten the implementation of the UN Plan. In May, 11 so-called "headmen" (9 from Ovamboland, 1 from Caprivi and 1 from Kaokoland) brought a case against the Special Representative, UNHCR, SWAPO, the Council of Churches, the AG, and the South African Defense Minister. The headmen were trying to stop the refugee repatriation process from Angola until adequate protection could be provided to them and their communities. They argued that the refugees--who the headmen claimed were really ex-PLAN fighters--represented a threat to their safety. The Supreme Court issued an interim order that the AG provide protection for the headmen but later reversed its decision.

Traditional tribal courts continued to operate in the tribal areas. These courts deal mostly with minor criminal offenses, such as petty theft and infractions of traditional customs. Cases are heard by a village or tribal headman or chief, who may receive advice from a traditional council or civil servant. Procedures are informal and vary from tribe to tribe; observers report that the system can work well to resolve minor problems by communal consensus but, because of the lack of review and the strength of traditional authorities in the rural areas, is also subject to abuse.

NAMIBIA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Security legislation before implementation of the U.N. Plan allowed almost unlimited powers of search and seizure. Invasion of the home was commonplace in the northern areas. Press reports during the April fighting indicated that security forces drove their heavily armored vehicles through the homes of persons suspected of supporting the guerrillas. Allegations of warrantless searches, threats against civilians, and intrusive interrogation to establish the whereabouts and identities of returnees (including PLAN fighters repatriated as refugees) continued to concern UNTAG and other observers until late in the year.

Outside the north, surveillance and monitoring of mail and telephones of political activists appeared to decline. However, legislation pertaining to the gathering of security information, Post Office Act No. 44 and National Security Act No. 19, remained in force throughout 1989 and gave the AG the right to intercept telephone calls and mail without a warrant. There is no evidence that the AG invoked these powers after April 1.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

There were many instances of the use of excessive force and violations of humanitarian law by both South African security forces and SWAPO military units in the course of the 23-year bush war. Over the years, many innocent civilians were killed in the conflict. However, the de facto cease-fire which came into effect in August 1988 led to a lessening of tensions along the border and the reports of violations declined through the rest of 1988 and into 1989.

The events of April 1 led to a resurgence in accusations of serious violations. During the fighting and for many weeks afterward, many reports and allegations surfaced of security forces beating civilians during interrogation in their efforts to locate SWAPO infiltrators.

The fighting itself in April produced lopsided casualty ratios of 10 to 12 SWAPO infiltrators killed for every 1 taken prisoner. Sources who claimed to have examined some of the bodies state that many of the dead appeared to have been shot through the head at close range. Photos of roughly 18 PLAN members taken by a photojournalist from the London-based Sunday Telegraph and shown on the U.S. program "South Africa Now" were examined by a forensic expert from Guys Hospital in London and a U.S. forensic expert. The two claimed that the bodies appeared to have been shot at close range. Local police claimed that their investigations failed to confirm these allegations. The buried bodies were exhumed in July and autopsies performed on each. Most of the forensic facilities and experts were South African. Several inquest hearings were scheduled then postponed. Since the elections no apparent follow-up of the status of the investigation or rescheduling of the inquest have been made.

SWAPO as a guerrilla movement was accused of serious mistreatment of its detainees (See Sections 1.c. and 1.d.). As a political party it, along with the DTA, was responsible for acts of intimidation and violence against voters during the election campaign.

NAMIBIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Many laws circumscribing freedom of speech were repealed in 1989 as part of the U.N. Plan. The SRSG ensured that all laws which would prevent free and fair elections were repealed, in particular those relating to political expression. Restrictions on obscenity remained in effect, but the press reported freely on political, security, and economic matters. The daily newspapers, which are generally party organs, were quite vigorous in their criticism of the AG, UNTAG, the U.N. Plan, and each other.

In late September, a Namibian publisher, two newspaper editors and an American journalist, Scott Stanley, were arrested on the "criminal" charge of defaming the O'Linn Commission, a Namibian government commission charged with investigating allegations of election fraud and malpractice. Stanley had interviewed its chairman, Bryan O'Linn, in July and wrote a commentary for his news organization critical of O'Linn. The piece charged that O'Linn was pro-SWAPO and not fit to head the Commission. O'Linn called the allegation contemptuous, and the State brought charges against Stanley and two Namibian newspapers that published the commentary. The trial judge found that Stanley had misquoted and otherwise denigrated O'Linn. On November 21, all defendants were found guilty on some of the counts against them and received fines. Stanley was found guilty on one of two counts and fined the equivalent of $96.

The South West African Broadcasting Corporation (SWABC) operates under a board appointed by the Administrator-General. SWABC newscasts on radio and television have traditionally been biased in favor of the status quo and against SWAPO, referring to it prior to April 1 as a terrorist organization. Following April 1, 1989, SWABC modified its news policy to permit mention of SWAPO as a political party like the others but continued to be highly biased against SWAPO. Three reports issued at intervals in 1989 by an independent monitoring group, NPP-435, documented instances of SWABC bias. The SRSG insisted that improvement in the broadcast media's performance was essential to creating the conditions for free and fair elections. SWABC's bias did diminish somewhat during the year, but the network's newscasts still had relatively low credibility among many listeners and viewers.

With the repeal of most security legislation related to political offenses, academic freedom is now respected in Namibia. Local scholars are free to publish, travel, speak, and participate in local politics for the first time in many years without fearing loss of employment or prosecution.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Namibians generally enjoy the freedoms of peaceful assembly and association. The repeal of pertinent security legislation has resulted in greater freedom of assembly and unprecedented political rallies were held throughout the country.

Political rallies do not require approval, but parties must provide prior notice of meetings under proclamation AG 23 of 1989, and must conform to certain guidelines relating to safety and traffic. In August a SWAPO rally was peacefully dispersed for failing to conform with the requirement that the police be notified 3 days in advance; party organizers had in fact notified the local magistrate, as was required under old legislation. In late September, the DTA held a march through Windhoek's black township of Katutura. Although the party had received permission from the AG's office in August to use a loudspeaker truck to do political campaigning, it did not have prior permission to hold a march. The AG's office ruled that the march was illegal under the terms of AG 23.

A SWAPOL commander in the north was accused before the AG's Commission on Intimidation (the O'Linn Commission) of having deliberately staged a police attack on a peaceful assembly of SWAPO supporters in Ovamboland in June. In September police in Windhoek used plastic bullets to disperse a group of striking workers (see Section 6.a.). Students and government workers in northern Namibia staged a walkout in July to protest continued police abuses. The aim of the 1-month long school boycott, involving 160,000 students in 518 schools, was to urge the Government to remove ex-Koevoet members from the police force. A number of spontaneous demonstrations occurred, which led to some minor clashes.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Namibians enjoy the free practice of religion. Almost all Namibians are Christian, with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia (ELCIN) being the single largest denomination. Roman Catholic, Anglican, Methodist, Dutch Reformed, and the African Methodist Episcopal Churches are also active. There is one Jewish synagogue in Windhoek, and a small community of Muslims.

Church leaders, who consistently condemned the use of violence in the past, also spoke out against the use of violence and intimidation by the political parties and urged reconciliation.

Past travel restrictions against church leaders have been lifted. Foreign church visitors have without exception been granted visas, although some after delay or protest, to travel to Namibia.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Under the terms of the U.N. Plan, all Namibian refugees who fled the country during the conflict were entitled to register with UNHCR for repatriation. More than 42,000 Namibians who wished to return registered, and 42,736 had returned to Namibia by the end of 1989. This included the senior leadership of SWAPO, other exiled politicians, and several thousand PLAN fighters who repatriated as civilian refugees after their units in Angola were disarmed and disbanded. The former SWAPO detainees who returned were also repatriated under UNHCR auspices. Many of the non-SWAPO returnees accused UNHCR and its implementing agency in Namibia, the Council of Churches in Namibia (CCN), of partiality towards SWAPO, of attempting to cover up or ignore SWAPO human rights abuses, and of disregarding the legitimate needs of non-SWAPO returnees. The non-SWAPO political parties also accused UNTAG of failing to seek out vigorously persons detained by SWAPO whose repatriation SWAPO wished to prevent.

NAMIBIA

UNHCR's and UNTAG's inability to locate these SWAPO detainees in SWAPO or Angolan custody came under particular criticism. SWAPO and the Angolan authorities either could or would not account fully for those believed to be missing.

The dusk-to-dawn curfew in the northern operational area was lifted in early 1989, then reimposed during the April fighting. It was lifted again in May. During the voter registration process several observers claimed that Namibians living in Walvis Bay and traveling to Swakopmund were subject to delays and harassment at the border. UNTAG intervention with the authorities alleviated the problem.

South Africa, through the Administrator-General, still provided travel documents to Namibians. These, however, were provided routinely to all Namibians not charged with or wanted for a criminal offense. Several senior SWAPO leaders have traveled to and from Namibia on South African passports. If denied a passport, a Namibian could apply to the Minister of Home Affairs in South Africa. However, the Minister did not have to provide a reason for denial, and there was no right of appeal through the courts.

There were no known deportations in 1989. The portions of the South West Africa Regulations Act which permitted deportation of aliens who threatened public order were repealed in June.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

In 1989, for the first time in their history, Namibians of all ethnic groups exercised this right over 5 days, November 7 to 11, electing a Constituent Assembly to draft a constitution for an independent Namibia. Ten registered political parties contested the U.N.-supervised elections. SWAPO won the election, receiving 57 percent of the 670,830 votes cast--a turnout of more than 97 percent of the eligible voters. SWAPO gained 41 seats in the 72-seat Constituent Assembly, a majority, but not the two-thirds majority needed to adopt a constitution within the 1982 guidelines. The DTA, which dominated the Transitional Government since 1985, won 28 percent of the vote and 21 seats in the Assembly. The remaining parties were: United Democratic Front, 4 seats; Action Christian National Party, 3 seats; Namibia National Front, 1 seat; National Patriotic Front, 1 seat; and Federal Convention of Namibia, 1 seat. The SRSB certified the elections as "free and fair," and the competing parties agreed.

All parties cooperated in the initial work of the Constituent Assembly, which, in late December, adopted the Standing Committee's report on the outlines of a Namibian constitution. The report reflected the ideas on which all parties have agreed in principle: a 5-year term executive presidency; a bicameral legislature; protection of fundamental human rights; and national elections based on proportional representation. The Standing Committee was preparing a draft, in consultation with legal experts, which would be presented to the full Assembly in early 1990. The majority party along with others in the Assembly will determine how the government will be formed. The Constituent Assembly will likely transform itself into a national assembly, and no other nationwide elections are scheduled for the near future.

NAMIBIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The attitude of the South African Government and the AG has undergone a dramatic change with the implementation of the UN Plan. Many observers from international human rights and humanitarian and religious organizations visited Namibia in 1989 and traveled extensively throughout the country, conducting their own investigations of the independence process, police abuses, and the stories of the SWAPO detainees. Several human rights and information services established full-time offices in Namibia to monitor implementation.

The Namibian Legal Assistance Center (LAC), which operates five offices in Namibia, assisted indigent defendants and has played an important role in political and security cases since its founding in 1988. The Center faced a court challenge from the AG's legal staff in mid-1989, but the Windhoek Supreme Court dismissed the AG's case in August, forcing an out-of-court settlement which fully recognized the right of the LAC to continue its work.

Much of the discrimination based on race built into the structure of the Namibian Government created by South Africa remained in place in 1989. Although the ethnically based second-tier executive and legislative authorities were abolished and their functions transferred to the AG, the separate second-tier civil services and schools were retained. As required by the U.N. Plan, only those laws prejudicial to the holding of free and fair elections were repealed, though many parties and observers demanded the complete abolition of all ethnic classifications, institutions, and authorities. The AG resisted this on the grounds that administrative chaos would ensue and that the complete restructuring of the Government should be left to the country's first independent government.

Pending restructuring, the system of racial classification remained essentially the same as in 1988. Most Namibians carried an identity document under the Identification of Persons Act of 1979. This document identified them as members of one of the following ethnic groups: Ovambo, Whites, Damara, Herero, Kavango, Nama, Colored (mixed race), Kaokovelder, Bushmen, Rehoboth Baster, Caprivian, and Tswana. A large proportion of the taxes collected from a particular ethnic group stayed with that group, resulting in a gross disparity in the distribution of government revenues. The second-tier administration for the country's 80,000 whites had a budget of $23 million while the authority for the 650,000 Ovambos (from which SWAPO derives its political base) had a budget of $350,000.

Social facilities were generally open to all races, although private businesses could--and on occasion did--restrict clientele based on race, and a few refused to admit members of UNTAG. The law did not require segregation in housing, but economic factors produced essentially the same effect, with separate townships for blacks and coloreds remaining part of the structure of local municipalities. Some hospitals, such as the state hospital in Windhoek, admitted all patients but had separate wings for different races.

Nonracial private schools have operated in the territory for several years; most are affiliated with the churches. The public schools were under the ethnic second-tier structure and were segregated. All of the political parties declared that upon independence public education would be integrated but some, such as the National Party, insisted that different ethnic groups should be allowed to maintain segregated private schools.

Women continue to face discrimination in both the traditional and modern sectors, particularly in regard to financial and legal matters. The coming of independence is not likely to change this situation soon; discrimination is almost as deeply entrenched in the "liberation movement" as it is in the current Government. Under traditional practice, which was still in effect for a majority of the population, a woman is not independent. She is usually a ward of her father until she marries; then she is a ward of her husband. There is still de facto discrimination against women in employment in the modern sector.

Family violence appears to be a deep-rooted and common problem. The courts treated cases of wife beating as assaults, but because of traditional attitudes regarding the subordination of women, most such cases did not get to court. The police do not normally interfere in domestic disputes. Some community groups and government bodies were targeting women in their development programs. Among these were the Council of Churches' Namibian Women's Voice, the Women of Namibia, and the Namibian Women's Organization in Ovamboland.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The legal right to associate in labor unions, long enjoyed by white and colored workers, was extended to blacks only in July 1978. Black union membership has grown markedly over the last 3 years. About 70 percent of all workers in the largest private sector of the economy, mining, are unionized. Union officials in 1989 claimed a membership of 50,000 out of a private sector work force of at least 230,000. The total work force is estimated at 400,000. The country's 20,000 to 30,000 farm workers employed on white-owned farms remain unorganized, and many are subject to a regime of paternalistic authoritarianism that gives them little say regarding their conditions of employment and little access to outside assistance.

Labor issues and politics are closely related; most of the unions with a majority of black workers are sympathetic towards SWAPO, and many union leaders are also SWAPO officials. For example, until his murder Anton Lubowski, SWAPO's sole white senior official, was Secretary of Finance and Administration of the National Union of Namibian Workers (NUNW). Unions are allowed to publicize their views and did so in the November elections.

Namibian workers have and exercise the right to strike. With the approach of independence, politically motivated industrial action abated somewhat, but labor-management relations remain turbulent. Workers often stop work before observing all the required steps for the settlement of disputes which are mandated by local labor codes. Employers, in turn, have the right to dismiss legally or illegally striking employees, and in the past have done so with relative impunity. No sanctions are applied against the employer. During a legal strike an employer can try to reach an agreement with workers by means of a conciliatory board composed of management and union members. However, the employer is not compelled to reach a resolution, and in the case of an illegal strike, the employer has the right of lockout. Proclamation R. 101 of 1985, which contained a "bill of fundamental rights" that sought to restrict the advocacy and organization of work stayaways and boycotts, was repealed as part of the settlement process in July.

In 1989 workers continued to strike individual firms over pay and other issues. The firing of a labor organizer from a local brewery resulted in a walkout of sympathetic workers in September. The brewery then dismissed the strikers. When the strikers gathered peacefully outside the brewery, reportedly to get their final paychecks, the police ordered them to disperse and then opened fire with plastic bullets, injuring a number of workers. This excessive use of force led to sympathy strikes against other firms owned by the holding company which owned the brewery; it also produced a boycott against the brewery by local black businessmen.

Namibia has been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since 1978. Trade unions are free to affiliate with international trade union organizations. The ban on the NUNW, a SWAPO-affiliated body which operated from exile in Angola, has been lifted, and it is now operating publicly in Namibia. The NUNW is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Namibian Supreme Court recognized the right of collective bargaining without intervention by a government agency in 1985. The Wiehanan Commission created in 1986 to revamp Namibia's outdated labor laws released its comprehensive report in February 1989. A second report was completed in December 1989 and outlines recommendations on changes in labor practices which may be considered by the independent government. The report covers international labor standards, conditions of service, labor relations, employment, training and development, social security, and labor administration and suggests the establishment of a special judicial body to deal with labor disputes. It also establishes a system of industrial courts. None of the commission's recommendations will automatically become policy; it will be up to the new government to draw up strategies and national labor policies.

Namibia in 1989 used a method of resolving labor-management disputes through conciliation boards under the Wage and Industrial Council Ordinance. Under this approach, employees or employers have been able to apply to the South African-appointed Administrator-General (AG) to appoint a conciliation board composed of members of both management and the unions, whose decisions in principle become binding on both sides. The decisions in principle are binding if publicly declared so by the AG on the recommendation of the conciliation board. The board is composed of both management and union members with no independent arbitrator, a fact that can make it difficult to reach agreement. The conciliation board operates essentially on the basis of a gentlemen's agreement, because no law evokes sanctions against an employer. If a dispute cannot be resolved by the conciliation board, unions can seek the advice of an independent mediator. Should this option fail, the two parties could turn to an arbitrator whose recommendations would be binding.

General unions, i.e., unions representing workers in more than one industry, are permitted in Namibia. A major issue remains the recognition of unions by individual companies and whether these unions can then be registered with the AG. Unregistered unions can bargain on behalf of their members if they are recognized by management, but they do not have access to conciliation boards. Disputes also have arisen, sometimes on political lines, over which union is entitled to represent the workers at a particular company. New wage concessions and a minimum wage were negotiated in the building industry in 1989.

There are no export processing zones or offshore processing facilities in Namibia.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by law. The implementation of the U.N. Plan threw additional light on labor practices in the white farming sector. Reports by 17 former SWAPO fighters who were released from a police-run farm in September indicated that conditions amounting to forced labor existed in 1989. Illiterate and isolated farm workers in some instances received little compensation, were unable to leave the farm without the owner's permission, were forbidden to speak to outsiders, and were, in some cases, subject to physical punishment by their employers. In one court case in September, evidence given by witnesses revealed that workers on one farm were being paid as little as 30 cents a day; the farm workers resorted to poaching game to feed their families.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment across the board is 15. Minimum age regulations are generally enforced in the wage sector pursuant to the Employment Act of 1986, Section 12. However, children below the age of 15 often work on family farms and in the informal sector.

There is no statutory minimum wage in Namibia. Several unions adopted a "living wage," i.e., one adequate to provide a worker and his family with basic shelter, food, and clothing, as a theme in 1988 and 1989. However, trade union leaders have not settled on a figure. An unskilled worker in the mining sector earns an average $275 per month.

Government-mandated occupational health and safety standards are similar to those found in South Africa, but enforcement of these standards outside the formal sector is slack. Improved safety conditions remained a strong union demand in the mining sector, particularly in the wake of an accident in November 1988 which killed seven miners at the Kombat mine near Tsumeb. The inquest proceedings found the company had been negligent and was culpable for the deaths. Namibia also has legislation mandating leave (including maternity leave) and overtime standards. An employer cannot require a female to work in a factory 4 weeks before the expected birth date or 8 weeks after delivery.

The standard legal workweek is 46 hours under the 1986 Conditions of Employment Act, which also allows for 10 hours of overtime per week, at time and a third. The employee must freely agree to work overtime. Legally, an increase of more than 10 hours of overtime per week has to be approved by the Manpower Commission.

Niger is ruled by an authoritarian military regime headed by General Ali Saibou, who took power following the death of former President Seyni Kountche in November 1987. In 1989 the military remained firmly in control, but President Saibou promulgated a new Constitution, approved in a September 24, 1989 referendum, which established a secular one-party state and replaced the Supreme Military Council with a joint civilian and military Superior Council of National Orientation as the nation's highest political body. Presidential and legislative elections in December 1989 offered voters only a yes or no choice on the nominees selected by the sole political party, the National Movement of the Development Society (MNSD).

The Nigerien armed forces number about 2,600 members plus 800 gendarmes (paramilitary police). Other security organizations are: the Directorate of State Security, which reports directly to the President; the National Police, which is responsible for maintaining public order and countering antigovernment activity; and a unit for presidential protection.

Niger is one of the world's poorest countries. The economy is based on subsistence farming, livestock raising, and some of the world's largest uranium deposits. However, cycles of drought, desertification, a 3.1 percent population growth rate, and declining world demand for uranium since the early 1980's have had a serious negative impact on the economy. Niger has a mixed economy with a number of government-owned enterprises and diverse private firms. The Government is attempting to reduce the number of these state firms and to encourage a greater role for private business.

Basic human rights continued to be circumscribed in 1989, but there were significant advances, including the advent of a new Constitution and the release of almost all political prisoners. The new Constitution contains extensive guarantees of citizens' rights, including freedom of speech and press, which, if fully implemented, would represent a considerable step forward. However, significant restraints on freedom of speech and press remain.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated abductions or disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reliable reports of systematic torture of prisoners or detainees in Niger. While occasional abuses by individual law enforcement or prison officers occur, the Government's policy banning physical abuse of prisoners and detainees appears to be applied in most cases. This represents a significant improvement from the situation which prevailed prior to 1988. In two incidents in July 1989, law enforcement officers were punished for mistreatment of detainees. A total of five law enforcement officials were convicted and served 3-month jail terms each.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Article 84 of Niger's new Constitution specifically prohibits arbitrary detention, but its application in practice has yet to be tested. Police do not always need a warrant to arrest a suspect. Once an arrest is made, the law requires that the suspect be either charged or released within 48 hours. This period can be extended for an additional 48 hours by the public prosecutor, who is also the head of the judicial police. In practice, delays beyond those established periods occur, and prisoners often spend months in jail awaiting trial.

Preventive detention is permitted under Nigerien law but must be ordered by an examining magistrate. Suspects are held in preventive detention for the duration of the magistrate's investigation of the case, which in some cases has taken as much as a year. Defendants are allowed access to a lawyer of their own choosing. There is a functioning system of bail for crimes carrying a penalty of less than 10 year's imprisonment. In 1989 President Saibou publicly called on judicial authorities to speed the process of bringing accused persons to trial.

There were no reports of incommunicado detention. Also, there were no reports of arrest, detention, or punishment for expression of views critical of, or different from, those of the Government. As far as is known, there were no political detainees awaiting trial at the end of 1989. Exile is not used as a means of political control in Niger.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

Niger's legal system is an amalgam of French, Islamic, and customary law. Civil and criminal cases not involving security-related acts are tried publicly. Defendants have the right to be present at their trials, to confront witnesses, and to present evidence. The new Constitution reaffirmed the judicial principle that the accused are presumed innocent until proven guilty. Defendants have the right to counsel at public expense if they are minors or if they are indigent and face the prospect of a sentence of 10 years or more. Both the defendant and the prosecutor can appeal verdicts, first to the Court of Appeals and then to the highest court, the State Court. Both courts are obliged to hear appeals. The Court of Appeals reviews both questions of fact and questions of law while the State Court limits its review to questions of law. Under the new Constitution, the Supreme Court, once established, will replace the State Court as the highest court and will review the decisions of the Court of Appeals.

The Constitution calls for an independent judiciary but makes the President of the Republic, as Chief of the Executive Branch, the guarantor of this judicial independence. The President has the right of pardon in criminal cases and invoked this right on frequent occasions in recent years. At the village level, matters such as property disputes are frequently resolved by traditional courts.

In June 1985, the Kountche Government formed a special court to investigate Civil Service corruption. This court meets regularly and now only deals with embezzlement cases involving over $6,000. Another recent modification allows the accused to be released provisionally upon repayment of the sum embezzled.

Security-related cases are tried in the State Security Court, which operates outside the normal legal framework. This Court, which has no permanent organization, was established by presidential decree in 1974. Its deliberations are held in secret. According to the Ministry of Justice, a military officer presides, but this Court includes civilian magistrates. It affords the defendant the same legal rights as he would receive in a criminal case, with the exception of the right to a public trial. There were no known cases brought before this Court in 1989. Amnesty International, in its 1989 Report, criticized the Court's secrecy in retrying (at government request) and convicting 19 persons (4 in absentia) in 1988 for involvement in an unsuccessful coup attempt in October 1983. The Report concluded that a defendant's right to trial by an independent and impartial court had not been respected.

At the end of 1989, there were no political prisoners in Niger. On December 18, President Saibou released the last two prisoners incarcerated for participation in the 1983 coup attempt against former President Kountche.

The police need a search warrant to enter homes except in cases involving major crimes, when they can enter at any time without a warrant. Search warrants do not permit searches between the hours of 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. There is no forced membership in any political organization, including the one legal political party. Violations of privacy, such as interference with correspondence, are illegal but are known to take place.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The new Nigerien Constitution affirms the citizen's right to freedom of opinion, thought, expression, press, publication, and publicity but does not specifically prohibit government action banning offensive material. President Saibou has said repeatedly in his public speeches that free expression of all viewpoints and political opinions will be allowed within the sole political movement, the MNSD. In practice, there are definite restrictions on freedom of speech and press. Major print and electronic media are government owned and controlled. Limited criticism of certain government officials and some policies is allowed, but attacks on the Chief of State, his major policies, or the legitimacy of the regime are not tolerated. As a practical matter, journalists are familiar with these guidelines, and there were no known cases of journalists being sanctioned in 1989.

There were no reports in 1989 of censored or banned magazines or other publications. Foreign films are subject to censorship by the Ministry of Interior on grounds of public morality and political content.

NIGER

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Niger is a one-party state which does not permit the assembly or establishment of rival political groups. Permits must be obtained from the Ministry of Interior or local police authorities for public gatherings. Permission is routinely granted only to recognized groups, e.g., trade unions and churches. The Government requires the registration of private associations with the Ministry of Interior and grants such registration only to organizations which operate within the framework of the Government's policy. Ethnic or racial associations as well as associations which the Government believes threaten national unity are prohibited.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

Niger is a secular state. While the population is over 90 percent Muslim, the Government permits the practice of other religious beliefs. Foreign missionaries can live, work, and travel in Niger but must obtain permission from the Ministry of Interior for all of their operations. Religious groups are allowed to maintain links with fellow believers in other countries. Religious groups may maintain places of worship, train clergy, publish religious material, provide religious education, and participate in charitable activities.

The Government, concerned by the Islamic fundamentalist violence that erupts periodically in nearby northern Nigeria, monitors Muslim religious activity through the Islamic Association. This Association is funded by the Government and assists in an informal screening process of local religious leaders. Islamic services that go beyond strictly religious subjects are not permitted.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel within Niger is closely monitored, although there was further relaxation during 1989. Police checks, often entailing thorough searches, take place upon entering or leaving major towns and cities. The former requirement for an exit visa to leave Niger has been abolished. Neither emigration nor repatriation are restricted. By law, married women must have the permission of their husbands to travel abroad.

Niger is a party to the U.N. Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees and has cooperated with the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees in handling the few registered refugees currently in Niger. There was no forced resettlement in 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The armed forces, under President Saibou, continue to dominate the State leaving no realistic means for the citizens to change the Government. Niger's new Constitution calls for a one-party state and a strong presidency. Legislative and presidential elections are held every 5 and 7 years respectively. They offer voters only a yes or no option on a slate of candidates selected by the sole legal political body, the MNSD, created as part of Niger's return to constitutional government after 15 years of direct military rule.

Other new institutions include the Superior Council of National Orientation (CSON) and a National Executive Bureau (BEN). The President appoints most of the members of both the CSON and the BEN as well as all of the members of the Cabinet. The top three positions in the National Executive Bureau are held by military officers as are a third of the seats on the CSON. President Ali Saibou heads both the CSON and the BEN and appoints all regional governors, who are military officers. Through these new institutions, the former military regime hopes to improve consultation with, and participation by, civilians in government while protecting the political interests of the military and avoiding competition from alternative political organizations.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is cooperative in answering inquiries on the status of political prisoners of interest to international human rights groups. There are no domestic groups which monitor the human rights situation in Niger. Niger is not active in regional and international human rights organizations.

Four major ethnic groups, each with its own language, make up the bulk of the population. The two primarily nomadic groups, Tuaregs and Fulani (Peul), have less access to government services, partly because their transient lifestyles make it difficult for the Government to supply them with services.

By tradition and practice, women occupy a subordinate place in Nigerien society. Males have considerable advantages in terms of education, employment, and property rights. In cases of divorce, custody of all children under 8 years of age is given to the husband.

Conscious of the adverse situation of women, the Government has begun work on a new family code, tried to provide better employment opportunities to women, and supported a national women's association. Women are paid comparable wages to that of men and are active in the business community, although commerce is dominated by men. The first professional associations of women traders, educators, and bankers were formed in 1988. About one-third of Nigerien doctors are women, and many of the nation's magistrates are women. The Government continues to encourage family planning and in 1988 formally legalized the use of contraceptives. Female genital mutilation (circumcision) occurs but is not believed to be widespread. It has not received extensive attention from the Government, but during 1989 government media covered in detail campaigns by the U.N. Children's Fund and the World Health Organization to abolish this practice.

Violence against women and children, including wife beating, occurs, but the extent of the problem of violence is unknown. However, it is considered antisocial behavior in Nigerien society, and women often turn to both traditional and modern judicial authorities in cases of abuse. The new family code now under preparation specifically addresses domestic violence and is reported to strengthen existing legal provisions in this area. In 1989 a Ministry of Women's and Social Affairs was created which has a broad mandate to improve the lot of women in society. The Association of Nigerien Women focused on the topic of violence against women at several of its conferences, which received substantial publicity in the government media.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Approximately 90 percent of Niger's work force is employed in the rural, largely subsistence sector. In the small modern economy, workers have the right to establish and join trade unions, which are organized under an umbrella group, the National Union of Nigerien Workers (USTN). The USTN is nominally independent but is partially funded by the Government and is usually responsive to government policies. The USTN has an observer in the MNSD but is not part of the party structure. The head of the USTN is elected by its members. The USTN represents about 30 percent of the approximately 60,000 salaried workers in Niger.

Strikes in Niger are legal if conciliation and mediation procedures have been exhausted. During 1989 there were strikes by bank employees, miners, and airline employees, all of which were resolved by negotiation.

The USTN is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and abides by its policy of having no formal affiliations outside the African continent.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is legally authorized, but the Government is deeply involved in the process. Individual unions are permitted to bargain for more favorable agreements at their work sites. The Government promotes voluntary worker-employer negotiations but does not sit at the bargaining table in private sector negotiations. If these negotiations fail, the Government becomes the arbitrator.

There is a basic framework agreement which has been in force since 1972 between the USTN, employers, and the Government. The agreement covers wages and benefits and is extensively applied to all sectors of the urban wage economy. This agreement protects workers against antiunion discrimination.

Labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country, and there are no export processing zones in Niger.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Niger's labor code prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and it is generally not practiced. The last reported instance of forced labor was during the 1985 drought emergency when displaced herders, primarily ethnic Tuaregs and Fulanis, were in some instances required to work on food-growing projects.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children between the ages of 12 and 18 may be employed, but there are strict provisions concerning the hours of employment and types of employment for children in this age group. All labor provisions, including those concerning child labor, are applied in practice only in urban areas. In the subsistence agricultural sector, which employs most Nigeriens, children work on family plots under conditions which are not in compliance with the provisions of the labor code. Education is by law free and compulsory from age 7. However, only about a quarter of Nigerien children of primary school age actually attend schools, with an even lower proportion attending middle school and high school.

The legal minimum wage for salaried workers is approximately $66 per month. According to union officials, this wage is not sufficient to provide a decent living for workers and their families. Because of the country's depressed economy, the Government has increased salaries by only 6 percent since 1980, despite the rising cost of living.

The legal workweek is 40 hours. However, according to the labor code, certain occupations requiring irregular hours are authorized longer workweeks, with a maximum of 72 hours. The labor code also provides occupational safety and health regulations which are enforced by the labor inspectors in the Ministry of Civil Service, Labor, and Professional Training. Because of staff shortages, this office focuses mainly on the mining, building, and industrial sectors for safety violations. According to a Ministry official, compliance is often difficult to enforce because of the attitude of the workers who are relatively uneducated and are therefore not fully cognizant of the safety risks posed in their jobs. They often complain and refuse to wear protective clothing because of Niger's hot climate. For the most part, employers have been responsive in providing safety equipment.

NIGERIA

Nigeria is ruled by a military regime headed by President Ibrahim Babangida, who came to power by a military coup in August 1985, overthrowing a previous military regime which in turn had seized power from civilians in December 1983. A 19-member Armed Forces Ruling Council (AFRC) is the country's main decisionmaking organ, while a mixed military/civilian cabinet presides over the Federal Military Government's (FMG) executive functions. Military governors head each of the 21 states, while a minister heads the Federal Capital Territory, Abuja. The 1979 Constitution remains partially in effect, but significant provisions, namely those guaranteeing free elections, political parties, due process, and habeas corpus are suspended. Federal and state legislation, promulgated by decree, is largely exempt from challenge in the courts. The FMG continues to plan a transition to democratic, civilian rule with a prescribed two-party system by 1992 (postponed from 1990).

The Constituent Assembly, consisting of 450 locally elected members and 111 FMG-nominated members, submitted its revisions to the 1979 Constitution to the AFRC in March 1989. The AFRC in May approved the draft constitution, which is influenced by the U.S. Constitution; it remains substantially similar to the 1979 Constitution and is scheduled to become law on October 1, 1992. In October, however, President Babangida abolished newly emerged political associations for failing to meet guidelines for registering national parties. Then in December the AFRC established two national parties, one "slightly to the left" and the other "slightly to the right." It also delayed local and state level elections to allow the new parties to become organized but maintained the October 1992 date for the return to civilian rule.

The FMG enforces its authority through the Federal security apparatus--the military, the State Security Service (SSS), and the national police--and through the courts. Deficiencies in organization, management, and control often lead to ongoing human rights violations: arbitrary arrests, detention without trial, and excessive use of force by law enforcement officers.

Most of Nigeria's 100-million-plus population still lives in rural areas, engaging in small-scale agriculture. Nigeria is dependent upon its oil exports (90 percent of all export revenues in 1988) to pay for needed imports and service its massive foreign debt ($33 billion at the end of 1988). The decline in world oil prices caused a drop in Nigeria's oil revenues from $26 billion in 1981 to $6 billion in 1985. To address the massive contraction of the economy, President Babangida imposed in 1986 a Structural Adjustment Program (SAP), which required radical adjustments to economic policies. These factors taken in combination have led to a substantial decline in the standard of living over the past decade.

Human rights continued to be subject to limitation in 1989. While the Government frequently voiced its commitment to human rights, it took a harder line with its critics following riots in Lagos and other southern cities in May and June. These disturbances, triggered in part by increasing prices, encompassed allegations of corruption against top leaders, including President Babangida, and criticism of the SAP. The security apparatus responded with force, killing at least 22 persons according to official reports, injuring many others, and arresting hundreds, many of whom remained imprisoned at the end of 1989. Many universities and several newspapers were closed temporarily, and journalists and activists were detained for alleging corruption of certain high officials and challenging the SAP. In December, however, the Government abolished "wandering" as a criminal offense (akin to vagrancy), which could benefit hundreds of Nigerians held without formal charge. Furthermore, on December 31, 1989, the FMG announced an amnesty of prisoners to alleviate overcrowded prisons.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There was no evidence of politically motivated killing at government or private instigation in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

A portion of the 1979 Constitution still in effect outlaws torture and mistreatment of prisoners, and Nigerian law provides penalties for excesses. There was no evidence of the systematic use of torture by Nigerian authorities in 1989, although in April a High Court Judge ruled against the defendant in one police torture case. Moreover, there were persistent, though unsubstantiated, allegations that capital punishment of convicted armed robbers is sometimes carried out in an inhumane way. Other public allegations and evidence of police brutality surfaced periodically in 1989 in connection with the treatment of common criminals and with relation to the Ketu incident (Section 1.g.).

There are also frequent charges of police brutality or arbitrary treatment at police checkpoints. Ostensibly to combat the high crime rate, these checkpoints are set up throughout the country, and police are often accused of demanding bribes or producing false arrests. Human rights activists and other observers claim that police make arbitrary arrests and attempt to extract small bribes during transport to detention facilities. There have also been cases of military personnel harassing citizens or taking the law into their own hands over personal disputes without being disciplined or punished. The Government has spoken out against these practices, but there have been few prosecutions for them.

The press reports that prison conditions remain poor and that the prison system is operating at 200 percent of capacity. Conditions likely worsened from the large influx of new detainees following the riots in May and June. The Government has acknowledged overcrowding and has announced a program to build new prisons, although little construction began in 1989. The combination of overcrowding, disease, and malnutrition in prisons has resulted in a heavy death toll. According to reputable press sources, the Ikoyi prison in Lagos, housing 2,500 though designed for 800, recorded 42 deaths in the first 3 months of 1989 and over 300 deaths in 1988. Most Nigerian prisons have no toilet facilities and no water in the cells. Press sources report that the Benin prison has one water tap for its 800 prisoners. They are often forced by overcrowding to sleep in shifts, crouched on the cell floor. Prisoners often accuse underpaid prison wardens of stealing food supplies. The insane, the diseased, juveniles, convicts, and suspects are all housed in the same cells.

The existence of a secret government prison on Ita Oka Island was revealed in 1988 by the Nigerian Civil Liberties Organization and was publicized by a leading Lagos newspaper. The Government announced 10 days later that the facility had been closed, but in 1989 there were new allegations that the facility still houses prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Cumbersome administrative procedures and bureaucratic inefficiency can result in persons suspected of criminal offenses being held for extended periods without charge or trial. This is so even though provisions of the 1979 Constitution still in force guarantee persons charged with crimes a fair public trial in civilian courts within 3 months of the date of arrest. Criminal justice officials, however, freely admit that the system is so overburdened that the 3-month time limit is rarely met. A report was submitted to the Attorney General in 1989 which included unpublished recommendations for correcting these abuses. In December, however, the Government abolished the criminal offense of "wandering," a hold-over from colonial statutes designed to exclude Nigerians from government-restricted areas. The statute had been misused as a vagrancy law and an excuse for police officers to detain persons without charge. On December 31, 1989, the FMG announced a broad amnesty of convicted prisoners to alleviate greatly overcrowded prison conditions.

Certain high court chief judges continued in 1989 to exercise their right to release detainees who have already spent more time in prison than they would serve if convicted of the crimes of which they are accused. However, human rights activists claim that 60 percent or more of a prison population of 58,000 are awaiting trial--often for many years--for offenses that carry a sentence of 2 years or less.

The Babangida Government has retained the authority to detain without charge persons suspected of acts prejudicial to state security or harmful to the economic well-being of the country, as well as those suspected of being a threat to the Government under Decree 2 of 1984, the State Security (Detention of Persons) Decree. This Decree suspends sections of the 1979 Constitution guaranteeing citizens the right to fair trial, due process, and judicial determination of the legality of detention (habeas corpus). While it imposes no time limit and disallows challenges of the detention in a court of law, the Decree provides for administrative review of such cases every 3 months.

Arrest authority under this Decree was expanded in 1989 and was shared by the Chief of General Staff, the Minister of Internal Affairs, and the Inspector-General of Police. The Government showed a penchant for using Decree 2 arbitrarily to detain persons it considered a threat to "public order"--which critics charged too often meant simple opposition to key government policies--for an indefinite period of time. Human rights activists and lawyers groups sharply attacked the Government on the issue of Decree 2 throughout 1989. The Government, through its civilian Minister of Justice, publicly defended the security merits of Decree 2 and claimed that the Babangida regime has invoked it less often than the Buhari regime or other previous military regimes using similar decrees. Human rights observers, however, accused the Government by its stance on Decree 2 of paying only lip service to human rights. They claimed in late August that there were currently about 90 persons detained under Decree 2, 80 of whom were in Lagos prisons.

The most celebrated Decree 2 case of 1989 was that of outspoken government critic and Lagos lawyer, Chief Gani Fawehinmi. Fawehinmi, with several other persons, was arrested soon after the May/June riots, ostensibly for attempting to organize a conference on alternatives to the SAP. Soon after his arrest, Fawehinmi was transferred clandestinely to a prison facility in Borno State. In September, after 3 months of public outcry, Fawehinmi was brought back to Lagos, charged with disrupting the transition to civilian rule, granted bail, and immediately rearrested under Decree 2 and returned to Borno State. In October 1989, however, the FMG released Fawehinmi while awaiting trial. Since he continued to speak out on political issues, there were apparently no restrictions on his freedom of speech, and his passport was restored to him.

In another highly publicized Decree 2 case, the FMG released Alhaji Balarabe Musa, former governor of Kaduna State on October 10 after 155 days of detention for unauthorized political activity. Musa launched the People's Liberation Party in May, even though he is banned from politics until 1992 (see Section 2.b.).

Many detainees are held on grounds other than Decree 2. Human rights activists claim that detainees being held without charge in connection with the May/June riots and as a result of shortcomings in the administration of the criminal justice system still numbered in the hundreds at the end of 1989 and that the families of those still in jail or who have "disappeared" in the system refuse to go public for fear of arrest.

In 1989 the Government continued a process, begun in 1986, of reviewing the cases of persons detained or convicted under various decrees during the previous military administration (1984-1985), many of whom have already been released. In addition, all of those arrested as a result of the 1985 coup which brought Babangida into power have been released, including former Head of State Muhammadu Buhari and his second-in-command, Tunde Idiagbon.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The 1984 Decree modifying the 1979 Constitution left the judiciary relatively intact, but it shifted judicial responsibility for certain specified offenses to special military tribunals established outside the regular judicial system. The latter is composed of both federal and state courts and includes procedures for appeals from courts of first instance to appeal courts at state levels, then to the Federal Court of Appeal, and finally to the Federal Supreme Court. Courts of first instance under the 1979 Constitution include magistrate or district courts, customary or area courts, religious or Shari'a courts, and, for some specified cases, the state High Courts. In some instances, the nature of the case determines which court has jurisdiction. In principle, customary and Shari'a courts have jurisdiction only if both the plaintiff and the defendant agree to it, though in practice fear of legal costs, delay, and distance to other alternative courts push a number of litigants into these courts. Under the 1989 draft constitution (which is scheduled to come into force in 1992) Shari'a (Islamic) courts are limited to followers of Islam and effectively confined to the 11 northern states of Nigeria.

Trials in the regular court system are public and respect certain constitutionally guaranteed individual rights. These include a presumption of innocence, the right to be present at a public trial, to confront witnesses and present evidence, and to be represented by legal counsel, if so desired. In capital cases, the Government provides counsel for indigent defendants. In other cases, indigents must rely for counsel on the Nigerian legal aid council, which has limited resources. Assistance is extended under the Legal Aid Act of 1976 to persons with incomes of up to about $200 (at the current official rate of exchange) per year. There is legal provision for bail, though the Nigerian Bar Association charges that bail is underutilized with the result that many accused persons remain in jail while awaiting trial for petty offenses. Bail is denied to those charged with murder and armed robbery.

The AFRC has weakened the regular court system through decrees promulgated by the previous military government that are still in effect. Under these decrees, the AFRC has transferred jurisdiction over cases involving corruption, currency violations, armed robbery, and a variety of miscellaneous offenses, such as drug trafficking and illegal oil bunkering, from the civilian judicial system to special military tribunals. In these cases, those charged have access to legal assistance, bail (except in the case of armed robbery), and the right to appeal (except in the case of armed robbery and conviction under the civil disturbances decree). In contrast to the previous regime, however, civilian judges now head all special tribunals. Military and police officers sit on these tribunals as coequals with the judge. Sentences by these special tribunals are generally severe. Convictions for armed robbery by the Special Robbery and Firearms Tribunals carry the death sentence and no right of appeal, although the sentence must be confirmed by the state's military governor before it is carried out. Conviction under the Treason and Other Offenses Tribunal (formed in 1986) also carries the death sentence and provides for appeal only to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Special Appeal Tribunal began its first hearing in September 1987. Its recommendations cannot be appealed but are subject to AFRC confirmation.

Legal observers have been particularly critical of the mandatory death penalty without right of appeal, especially for convictions for armed robbery where the sums involved are minor and there appear to be irregularities in procedure. Armed robbers have been sentenced to death for stealing sums as small as about $40. Amnesty International, in its 1989 Report, asserted that these special courts do not meet international standards for a fair trial, especially because they do not allow the right of appeal.

Judicial convictions for political offenses (as opposed to detentions) are rare in Nigeria. Some observers claim that there are political prisoners in Nigerian jails, but can give no numbers and often make no distinction between those detainees held without charge and those convicted of political offenses.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Nigerian society is generally free of arbitrary interference by the State in the private lives of its citizens. Provisions of the 1979 Constitution still in force provide for rights of privacy in the home, correspondence, and oral electronic communications. While there have been isolated instances of unauthorized forced entry by security elements, the State does not carry out general surveillance of the population. However, in the aftermath of the May/June riots, the wife of the editor of The Republic newspaper was arrested in her home and the dwelling unlawfully searched when security forces failed to locate him for arrest. Human rights observers also alleged that government security forces intimidated potential witnesses after the May/June riots to prevent them from giving details on human rights violations by threatening arbitrary search and arrest. Such allegations, however, were unsubstantiated.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

The issue of police brutality was a major focus of the press and human rights activists in the aftermath of the May/June 1989 riots in many parts of Nigeria. Security forces responded with force, killing at least 22 persons nationwide according to official reports. Human rights observers claim the death toll was much higher--over 200 by some estimates.

In one highly publicized incident, police forces allegedly rounded up several hundred persons on the street in Ketu, a Lagos borough, and transported them to the nearby police station where many were forced into a small cell. Up to 50 persons reportedly died from suffocation and being crushed. Despite the widespread publicity, no source could verify these claims. The Government conducted an investigation, placing the station's superintendent on administrative leave. He was later cleared and transferred.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The modified 1979 Constitution continues to provide for freedom of speech and the press, but it also reserves for the federal and state governments the exclusive right to own and operate radio and television stations. There are no restrictions on ownership of print media and Nigeria has a lively press. Among the many Nigerian daily newspapers are seven privately owned national dailies with large circulations, one daily owned by the federal Government, and another in which the federal Government owns a majority share. Many states operate their own daily or weekly newspapers. In some states privately owned dailies compete with state papers. Six weekly news magazines vie for national readership.

Broad criticism of the Government is tolerated, and there is open discussion of political, social, and economic issues. However, officials frequently caution journalists, both publicly and privately, on their responsibility and the limits on press activity. Although there are no published guidelines or decrees that limit freedom of speech and the press, most journalists make a well-considered decision in advance of publication before they step over what they sense to be the Government's line. The issues considered most sensitive by the Government are normally associated with naming top government officials in connection with corruption, publication of subjects the Government believes will incite the public to riot or otherwise undermine state security, and subjects which fall under "disrupting the transition to civil rule program." As a result, journalists maintain that self-censorship is common.

In 1989 federal and state governments continued to arrest, interrogate, and detain individuals who made, or were preparing to make, public statements the Government considered threatening. The arrest in June 1989 of Chief Gani Fawehinmi and several others (noted in Section 1.d.) is an example. Also in June, The Republic newspaper editor and 12 staff members were arrested and the newspaper closed to prevent distribution of an issue reportedly containing an expose of the illegal financial transactions of the Chief of General Staff. All copies of the issue were confiscated on the grounds that it included material which was "offensive to the nation." All detainees were subsequently released and the newspaper allowed to resume publication within several days. Other journalists were detained and several newspapers temporarily closed throughout 1989; all have subsequently been released and the affected newspapers have resumed publication.

Academic freedom is generally respected by the Babangida Government. There were no reports of censorship of books or other academic publications in 1989 or of intimidation of university faculty. Some observers allege that the State Security Service maintains an active undercover presence on university campuses and reports directly to the Government on acts or attitudes deemed to threaten state security.

The National Association of Nigerian Students and the Academic Staff Union of Universities remain banned for "radical activities." However, the Government has tolerated formation of new organs of student government on individual campuses. University vice-chancellors are held directly responsible for maintenance of public order on campuses and are given broad authority to close universities. Such closures were commonplace in 1989 in response to a spate of violent student demonstrations over campus conditions. In May and June 1989, the focus of student protests turned to government corruption and the SAP. In response, the Government announced the closure of six southern universities for a full academic year, then later reversed itself, allowing the campuses to reopen on October 31.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Nigeria's 1979 Constitution assures all citizens the right to assemble freely and to associate with other persons in political parties, trade unions, or other special interest associations. Permits are not normally required for public meetings indoors, unless administrative approval is needed to use a government facility. Permits are required in many areas for outdoor gatherings, but the requirement is routinely ignored by both the authorities and the organizations holding the meeting or rally. In a few isolated incidents in 1989 security forces broke up public meetings for lack of a permit when the Government found the subject matter of the meeting objectionable or threatening--namely criticism of the SAP. In most states, open-air religious services outside a church or a mosque continue to be prohibited.

The provision regarding the right to form and join political parties was suspended by Decree 9 of 1984. The decree-imposed ban on political activity was lifted in May 1989 in the run-up to registration of the two national political parties in October 1989. However, hundreds of present and former government officials and politicians remain banned from running for elective office in the local, state and federal elections scheduled for 1990-1992. Nevertheless, the Government often turns a blind eye to their participation in political events, provided they remain discreet and do not openly challenge the government Decree.

Before the ban was lifted in May 1989, the police broke up several gatherings suspected to be political in nature. Several persons, including former Kaduna State governor Balarabe Musa, were arrested for violating the ban on political activity and held under Decree 2. In Musa's case, the Government also claims that he is a banned politician by virtue of his former office, though no comprehensive list of all banned politicians has been published, and the definition of "banned politicians" is vague. After a prolonged court battle over both accusations against Musa (violation of the ban on political activity and status of a banned politician), the case was dropped, apparently on a technicality, although the FMG continues to maintain that Musa is a banned politician.

Nigerians form and participate in a wide variety of special interest organizations, including religious groups, trade groups, women's organizations, and professional associations. Organizations are not required to register with the Government and are generally permitted free association with other national and international bodies. Following the March 1987 religious disturbances, however, the Government required that religious groups be sanctioned by either the Christian Association of Nigeria or the Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Nigeria's 1979 Constitution prohibits the federal and state governments from adopting any state religion. This is adhered to in practice, though some Christians have maintained in the past that Islam or northern origin have provided a political advantage. Constitutional provisions guaranteeing freedom of religious belief, religious practice, and religious education are generally respected. Reports are common that various ethnic groups (including local and state officials belonging to that group) discriminate against minorities (both ethnic and religious). Such actions often take the form of employment discrimination and bureaucratic obstacles to church or mosque construction that delay projects, sometimes indefinitely. There are no restrictions on the numbers of clergy trained nor on contacts with coreligionists in other countries. Religious travel, including the hajj, is permitted and is even subsidized by the Federal Government. Publications in Arabic and the teaching of Arabic are freely allowed, even in predominantly Christian areas. Missionaries and foreign clergy, though limited by quotas, are permitted to work in Nigeria. The Government places no obstacles in the way of Nigerian missionaries working in other countries.

Tensions between the Muslim and Christian communities remain high in some parts of Nigeria. Though scattered incidents continue to be reported, religious violence on the scale of the rioting which took place in the northern state of Kaduna in 1987 has not been repeated. In the aftermath of those disturbances, the Government instituted a ban, still in effect, on all religious organizations on postprimary campuses, while reaffirming the right of individual students to practice their religion in recognized places of worship. Several state governments temporarily banned religious preaching and playing of religious cassettes outside places of worship, without the written permission of police. Publication of advertisements paid for by religious organizations remains banned, although the ban is not strictly enforced as such advertisements occasionally appear in the press. Religious programming on radio and television, both controlled by the FMG, remains limited in some areas. The 1982 ban on the Maitatsine Muslim sect, the source of bloody disturbances in 1982 and 1983, also remains in effect. The group still exists but is closely monitored by the police.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Nigeria's Constitution entitles citizens to move freely throughout Nigeria and to reside where they wish. The same provision prohibits expulsion from Nigeria or the denial of entry to or exit from Nigeria to any citizen. In general, these provisions have been observed. Following the elections in December 1987 and March 1988, chairmen of local government areas were ordered in June 1988 to inform their respective state governors of travel outside of their areas. Traditional rulers are also obligated to inform local government chairmen of their travel. Nigerians travel abroad in large numbers, and many thousands are studying abroad. Exit visas are not required. But passports of editors and reporters have been seized to prevent them from traveling after their publications have printed stories offensive to the Government. Also, under Nigerian law, wives--including expatriate wives--must have the permission of husbands to take children out of the country. Security officials in the past have prevented wives from leaving the country with children, but there were no reports of such interference in 1989. Citizens who leave Nigeria have the right to return. Citizenship cannot be revoked for any reason, including political reasons. No known penalties have been levied on Nigerians who have emigrated, settled abroad, or acquired another nationality. However, Nigeria does not recognize dual nationality, and naturalization in another country does not exempt Nigerians from Nigerian laws.

Nigerians are free to change their place of work within Nigeria, but local laws and custom sometimes disadvantage citizens not indigenous to the area. For example, access to limited places in elementary and secondary schools is more difficult for children of residents of other areas who must also pay higher school fees than the children of local residents. There has been no forced resettlement of Nigerian citizens.

Nigerian law and practice permit temporary refuge and asylum in Nigeria for political refugees from other countries. Nigeria supports and cooperates with the Lagos office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Repatriation of refugees is normally conducted in accordance with UNHCR standards. In 1989 several hundred Chadian refugees were repatriated at their request. No refugees were expelled in 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The 19-member AFRC headed by President Babangida is the highest political authority in Nigeria. There is no elected legislative body. In 1989 citizens did not have the right to change their national or state governments through the electoral process.

President Babangida has repeatedly stated that 1992 is the date for returning Nigeria to complete civilian rule. An appointed civilian Constitutional Review Commission completed its work in early 1988 and in April presented a draft constitution to the AFRC. In June 1988, the Constituent Assembly, made up of representatives elected by Local Government Areas (basic government units) and including representatives of special groups (labor, women, religious leaders) appointed by the Government, began the process of refining and ratifying the Constitution in Abuja. The Constituent Assembly presented its recommendations and a revised draft to the Government in March 1989. Following AFRC approval of the new draft constitution, the FMG lifted the ban on political activity in May 1989 to allow political groups to form and compete for registration of two national political parties. Thirteen political associations emerged to compete for party registration.

In August 1989, the FMG by decree removed from office all elected chairmen of Local Government Areas to prepare for the new local government elections originally scheduled for December 1989. This decree established that during the period of transition to civilian rule, the Federal Military Government may suspend elected officials without reference to the judicial system.

In October 1989, the National Electoral Commission (NEC) reported to the AFRC that the emerging political structure was riddled with irregularities and that none of the 13 political associations met the guidelines for party registration. The NEC concluded that the party registration competition had failed to meet its objective of transforming Nigeria's political culture by creating a "new breed" of politicians free from control of the "moneybags" and regional, ethnic, and religious bias. On October 7, President Babangida abolished all 13 political associations and announced that the FMG would create two new political parties: one "slightly to the left" and one "slightly to the right." In December 1989, the FMG enacted a decree establishing the new political parties and signaling its intention to maintain strict control over the transition process. Another December decree upheld completion of the transition by October 1992 but altered its timetable by allowing the two new parties to coalesce and identify candidates during the first 9 months of 1990, postponing local elections from December 1989 until the last quarter of 1990 and delaying gubernatorial and state legislative elections from 1990 until the fourth quarter of 1991.

Thousands of former Nigerian government officials, both civilian and military, are prohibited from participating fully in the transition process, although they remain eligible to vote. In September 1987, the Government significantly extended a ban announced in 1986 on partisan political activity for a large number of former politicians from the last civilian regime (1979-83) to include many political figures from the first civilian republic (1960-66) and past and present high-ranking military leaders. These persons, including President Babangida himself, will be barred from contesting any election until after the transition is completed in 1992. Also, former politicians who were officers of the previous parties will be forbidden to hold office in any political party or to run for elected office until that time. Furthermore, any person convicted or removed from office for various misdeeds at any time since 1960 will be banned for life from contesting elections or holding any political party office.

Along with the July 1987 announcement of the political transition program, the Government promulgated Decree 19 of 1987, which makes persons who might in any way forestall or prejudice the transition program liable to a prison term of up to 5 years. The Special Tribunal authorized to try offenses under Decree 19 was formed in October 1987. Its decisions may be appealed to the Special Appeal Tribunal.

The composition of the AFRC and Cabinet reflects greater ethnic and religious diversity than any government in the recent past.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

As far as is known, there were no visits or requests for investigations of alleged human rights violations in Nigeria during 1989 by any international human rights group. The Babangida Government repeatedly renewed its pledge to uphold basic human rights and to tolerate criticism from local human rights advocates in 1989. The Human Rights Committee of the Nigerian Bar Association monitors the domestic human rights situation and characteristically speaks out against human rights abuses. At least four major local groups are active in human rights matters: the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights, led by a prominent Lagos physician; the Nigerian Council for Human Rights, chaired by a leading Senior Advocate of Nigeria (SAN); Human Rights Africa, led by a prominent Lagos lawyer and President of the Nigerian Trial Lawyers Association; and the Civil Liberties Organization (CLO), led by several Lagos attorneys and a prominent journalist. Nobel laureate Wole Soyinka also frequently speaks out on human rights issues. The Nigerian Bar Association, Soyinka, and leaders of all four human rights groups all made strong public statements criticizing the Government's continued use of Decree 2 and other forms of detention without charge. A former president of the Nigerian Bar Association, who also served as the chairman of its Human Rights Committee, continues to hold the post of Attorney General and Minister of Justice. He has been severely criticized by human rights activists for his defense of Decree 2.

While most human rights monitors were relatively free from government interference in 1989, four officers of CLO were briefly questioned by police in January 1989 about a CLO report on the status of human rights in Nigeria, but no action was taken against them. The CLO continues to investigate prison conditions and monitors developments at the Ita Oke Island detention center, in addition to speaking out against Decree 2. Nigeria is a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

There is no official policy of discrimination against any of Nigeria's 250 ethnic groups, and laws do not overtly favor one group over another. The Government generally makes a conscious effort to strike a balance among different groups in its decisionmaking and in appointments to key government positions, and ethnic and regional hiring quotas are observed in most public sector employment. However, Nigeria has a long history of tension among its diverse ethnic groups, and tradition continues to impose considerable pressure on individual government officials to favor their own ethnic or religious group. Religious and ethnic favoritism or harassment persist and are widely perceived to persist. Persons not indigenous to their state of residence frequently experience difficulty in jobseeking, school enrollment, and other areas.

Women have always had economic power and have exerted influence in Nigerian society through women's councils or through their family connections. As primary school enrollment increases, women are gaining greater access to education. There has been a dramatic increase in the number of women who have university degrees and who have become professionals, including teachers, lawyers, doctors, judges, senior government officials, media figures, and business executives. Despite a degree of economic independence, women suffer discrimination in employment and other areas, and experience social prejudice. The pattern of discrimination against women varies according to the ethnic and religious diversity of Nigeria's vast population. In some states, husbands can prevent their wives from obtaining employment or passports. In many states, a widow cannot inherit her husband's property, which in the absence of children usually reverts to the husband's family. Women do not receive equal pay for equal work, and male professionals receive fringe benefits not extended to their female counterparts.

While violence against women, especially wife beating, exists, there are no statistical data to help determine the extent of the problem. Police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes. Reports of wife beating tend to come from rural areas, where women are generally uneducated and the use of the legal system to protect themselves is a foreign concept and unlikely to be used because of pressure from traditional authorities. The Government has neither actively addressed nor sanctioned this practice, which is subject to the provisions of criminal law if brought to the courts. There is no reason to believe that the legal system would not intervene to protect women from wife abuse if a husband were formally accused. In the case of female circumcision, the Government publicly opposes this practice, which reportedly affects about 50 percent of the female population. The most dangerous form, infibulation, is practiced in some areas. However, because of the deep cultural roots of this practice, the Government has relied primarily on education through women's and public health organizations to help induce change in attitudes, rather than trying to criminalize the practice. The Government also opposes the selling of young girls for marriage by poor rural families, again primarily through education.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Nigerian workers may join trade unions, with the exception of members of the armed forces and employees of government services designated essential by the FMG. Employers are obliged by law to recognize trade unions and must pay a dues checkoff for employees who are members of a registered trade union. In 1981 organized labor claimed 3 million members out of a total work force of 30 million. Since then, the available work force has increased as the population has grown, while trade union membership has probably declined due to low economic growth.

While the trade union movement has had, within limits, considerable latitude for action, it is subject to government oversight, which has increased during the past 2 years. Despite provisions in the 1979 Constitution and Nigeria's ratification of 28 International Labor Organization (ILO) conventions, government decrees and policy continue to restrict labor freedoms. A 1978 decree established a single central labor body, the Nigeria Labour Congress (NLC), created 42 industrial unions through forced mergers and deregistered all other unions. Since then the Government has publicly announced its intention to merge the present 42 unions into 19. The Government has not acted upon an ILO Committee of Experts' finding, first enunciated in 1979 and subsequently repeated, that this 1978 decree violates ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize, to which Nigeria is a party. Nor has the Government accepted the Committee of Experts' recommendation that the decree be amended.

In December 1988, elections were held for NLC national and state councils to replace the councils which had been dissolved by the Government earlier in the year. The Government permitted only a single slate of candidates acceptable to the Government, comprised of members of the two major NLC factions, to run in the national council election. The other candidates who attempted to run were disqualified.

The right to strike is recognized by law, except in the case of essential services as defined by the Government. Work stoppages, strikes, and protests during 1989 were relatively few and focused primarily upon pay issues. In February railway workers went on strike, for the second time in 3 months, to collect back wages and allowances owed them; the strike ended when the railway authorities paid the arrears. At about the same time eight civil service unions threatened mass rallies to support their demand for restoration of fringe benefits which had been canceled or reduced by the 1989 budget. The Government responded by making funds available to restore the benefits.

Since 1975, government policy has permitted international labor affiliation only with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and affiliated Pan-African labor federations. Government policy does permit, however, informal "fraternal relations" with foreign unions and international trade secretariats as long as there is no formal affiliation.

Eleven senior employees of the National Electric Power Authority remain in prison, their life sentences reduced to 10 years, for conspiracy in connection with the October 1988 disruption of the national electrical power grid. For a number of years the ILO Committee of Experts has urged the Government to amend its legislation to cover various categories of workers excluded from protection against acts of antiunion discrimination.

Labor unions did not participate in the May 1989 protests and riots against the Government's Structural Adjustment Program.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The labor laws of Nigeria permit both the right to organize and the right to bargain collectively between management and trade unions. Collective bargaining is, in fact, common in many sectors of the economy. Nigerian law further protects workers against retaliation by employers for labor activity through an independent arm of the judiciary, the Nigerian Industrial Court.

The FMG, however, retains broad authority over labor matters. In many areas of contention, the unions often take their demands directly to FMG authorities rather than to the employers. At the same time, the FMG can intervene forcefully to end debate on issues which it feels contravene the Government's essential political or economic programs. (The dispersal of the labor-organized conference on alternatives to the SAP, which led to the arrest of Gani Fawehinmi--Section 1.d., is a case in point.) Moreover, decisions which have a major impact on labor are often taken unilaterally. NLC President Bafyau complained, for example, that his organization was excluded from the formulation of the 1989 budget, which, in effect, mandated continued austerity for most workers and included a variety of cost cutting measures of concern to the unions.

There are no export processing zones in Nigeria.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Nigeria's 1979 Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and this prohibition is generally observed. The Government does operate a National Youth Service Corps under which all youths or young adults who have completed college or university training and are under the age of 30 must complete 1 year of work in jobs ranging from agriculture to office work and teaching. The Government also has an environmental clean-up campaign in which all citizens are required to spend the morning of the final Saturday of each month tidying their house, yard, and neighborhood and to refrain from moving about during this period. Both programs enjoy widespread public support.

The ILO Committee of Experts has noted that various provisions of the Labor Decree of 1974, the Merchant Shipping Act, and the Trade Disputes Decree of 1976 impose sanctions that obligate work for breaches of labor discipline or for taking part in a strike. The Committee has urged the Government to adopt the necessary measures to bring these laws into compliance with ILO Convention 105 on Forced Labor to which Nigeria is a party.

d. Minimum Age of Employment of Children

Nigeria's 1974 Labor Decree prohibits employment of children under 15 years of age in commerce and industry and restricts other child labor to home-based agricultural or domestic work. The Labor Decree does allow the apprenticeship of youths aged 13 to 15, but only under specific conditions. Apprenticeship exists in a wide range of crafts, trades and state enterprises. With respect to apprentices over the age of 15, their activity is not specifically regulated by the Government. These laws are enforced only sporadically, particularly in the rural areas where most Nigerians live.

Nigeria's 1974 Labor Decree also established a 40-hour workweek, prescribed 2 to 4 weeks of annual leave, and set a minimum wage for commerce and industry of about $17 per month at the current official rate of exchange but at the time of enactment worth nearly $200 per month. This wage is now sufficient only for the most minimal standard of living in the cities, and the Nigeria Labour Congress has called on the Government to increase it. The 1974 Decree contains general health and safety provisions, some aimed specifically at young and female workers, enforceable by the Ministry of Employment, Labour, and Productivity. Employers must compensate injured workers and dependent survivors of those killed in industrial accidents. The ineffectiveness of the Ministry in enforcing these laws in the workplace is regularly criticized by labor unions.

RWANDA

Rwanda is a one-party state which has been ruled by Major General Juvenal Habyarimana since his accession to power in a nonviolent coup in 1973. Founder of the single party, the National Revolutionary Movement for Development (MRND), Habyarimana was reelected for another 5-year term as President in December 1988 by nearly 99 percent of the electorate. The President sets government policy after consultation with the Council of Ministers. The National Development Council (the legislature), established in 1982, votes on and adopts laws but is not independent from the MRND. Legislative candidates must be approved by the party, which normally approves two candidates per seat.

The major organizations responsible for administration of justice include the Ministry of Justice, which organizes and administers the prison system, the judicial police, which is composed of employees of several ministries who are responsible for apprehending criminals, collecting evidence, and maintaining case records, and the gendarmerie, a special branch of the Rwandan armed forces. In addition, the Central Intelligence Service in the office of the President can make certain decisions, such as denial of passports to Rwandan citizens or the extension of visas and residence permits to foreigners. These decisions may be appealed directly to the President.

The overwhelming majority of Rwandans are poor subsistence farmers. There is little industry, and imports are expensive because of the high cost of transport to this landlocked country. Food production has managed to keep pace with the high population growth rate. Rwanda's economy depends heavily on foreign aid and on exports of coffee and tea. The Government has a liberal policy toward trade and investment.

Although human rights continued to be restricted in 1989, some progress was made: the Government held a national conference of magistrates and judges to discuss improving the administration of justice; and organized an international conference on the observance of human rights in Africa. President Habyarimana released nearly 25 percent of the 13,000 prisoners in Rwandan jails, reduced many sentences, and changed all death sentences to life imprisonment. Prisoners guilty of crimes against national security, corruption, or multiple offenses were not included. In 1989 there remained several major human rights concerns, including the use of long-term detention in political and security cases without charge or trial and restrictions on the freedoms of religion, speech, association, and the right of citizens to change their government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There was no evidence of politically motivated killing at government instigation in 1989. In May 1988, an army sergeant accused of the murder of a prominent colonel reportedly died during interrogation by military and security authorities. Subsequently, three officers were arrested in connection with the case. These officers remained in prison at the end of 1989 awaiting the outcome of an ongoing judicial inquest.

RWANDA

There were no unexplained disappearances in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture or other cruel, inhuman treatment in 1989. Prison conditions continued to improve in 1989 as part of a major reform program instituted by the former Minister of Justice.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Except for suspects caught in the act of committing crimes, arrests are normally made with a warrant following an investigation. Persons may be detained for no more than 48 hours without a warrant. There were no known exceptions in 1989 to the legally mandated warrant procedures. In most cases, charges must be stated formally in the defendant's presence within 5 days of arrest. Failure to meet this requirement constitutes grounds for dismissal of the charges. In practice criminal offenders arrested by judicial authorities are not imprisoned without arrest warrants and formal arraignment. Persons arrested by Rwandan security forces for political crimes may in fact be detained indefinitely without being formally charged (see Section 1 e.).

Under broad preventive detention provisions, persons may be held for 30 days if public safety is believed to be threatened, if the accused might flee, or if the penalty carries a minimum sentence of 6 months. At the end of that period, judicial review is mandatory. Detention may be prolonged indefinitely for 30-day periods. Persons charged with serious crimes often wait 6 months before trial. Detainees may appeal their incarceration, and the appeal must be heard within 24 hours by a competent judicial authority. Ministry of Justice personnel conduct daily official visits to prisons to assure that proper documentation exists for each detainee. These officials can order detainees released if arrest conditions do not conform to the law.

Rwandan security forces occasionally employ arbitrary arrest and detention on political or security grounds. Most detentions are short-term, often for less than 24 hours. In January 1988, two associates of a Rwandan exile who had been implicated in a 1980 coup attempt were arrested and held without charge or judicial review. They remained in prison without charge in 1989. The security authorities arrested in May another Rwandan accused of involvement in the 1980 coup attempt and held him throughout the year pending completion of an investigation.

Exile is not practiced. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Rwanda has three separate court systems for criminal/civil, military, and state security cases. All but security cases ultimately may be appealed to the Court of Appeals. Convicted criminals must file an appeal within 3 months of the date of judgment. The State Security Court has jurisdiction over national security charges such as treason. Decisions of this Court may not be appealed before the Court of Appeals. If procedural violations are alleged in security cases, these may be brought before the Court of Cassation. If the Court of Cassation finds that procedural violations occurred, the case is sent back to the State Security Court and tried by a different panel of judges.

RWANDA

The judiciary is statutorily independent and expected to apply the penal code impartially, but in practice the Government exercises influence in political and security cases. The President appoints and dismisses magistrates. Laws passed in 1982 strengthened the independence of the judiciary by improving the process of selecting judicial personnel and more closely defining their functions. The administration of justice has been hampered by poor management and a generally low level of education among civil servants. The Ministry of Justice conducts training programs for officials and judges and plans to establish a magistrate training center. In 1989 approximately 70 of the top judges and prosecutors attended a magistrates' workshop organized by the Ministry of Justice.

All defendants are constitutionally entitled to counsel, but because of a shortage of lawyers (there are only about 20 private lawyers in Rwanda, most of whom work in Kigali), defendants normally are not represented at trial. Family and other nonprofessional advisors are permitted. Trials are public, and those which arouse extensive public interest are often broadcast to the street to permit persons who cannot be seated in the courtroom to follow the proceedings. Persons charged with minor crimes usually are released on their own recognizance pending trial.

Bail is not available in Rwandan law. The majority of Rwandans awaiting trial or sentencing enjoy "liberte provisoire," or provisional release, which is routinely granted provided that the defendant is not likely to flee justice, has a fixed residence, and is not likely to harm or be harmed by the public. A Rwandan awaiting trial or sentencing in prison may petition the court for provisional release. In the Kigali court district, approximately 85 percent of all prisoners awaiting trial or sentencing receive provisional release.

At the end of 1989, Rwanda was holding three political prisoners who allegedly are close to an exiled minister implicated in a 1980 coup attempt. Dr Aloys Sebiziga, a medical doctor, has been detained in Kigali prison since May 1989 for allegedly supplying medicines and funds to Col. Alexis Kanyarengwe, a former Minister of the Interior, who is currently in self-imposed exile in Tanzania. Dr. Sebiziga has not been formally charged with any crimes, nor has a date been set for trial. In addition to Sebiziga, Callixte Sinaruhamagaye and Claude Bahitansi, the brother and a close friend of the former Minister, have been detained in Kigali prison without charges since January 1988.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although Rwandan law forbids arbitrary searches, Rwandans are subject to occasional interference in their private lives. Police normally are required to have warrants before entering a private residence, but, using the pretext of checking required documentation, authorities in practice gain entry into homes without warrants. There is no evidence that the Government monitors private correspondence, and the receipt of foreign publications is permitted.

All Rwandans are required to be members of the MRND and to pay party dues.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The law theoretically guarantees freedom of speech and press, but these statutory assurances are not observed. Open criticism of government policies and officials is rare, although in 1989 published criticism of state-managed industries was not uncommon. Candidates in the 1988 legislative elections were restricted to expressing opinions and advocating policies consistent with party doctrine. Members of the National Development Council in the past have criticized government policies from the floor of the Council.

The Government controls radio broadcasting (the most important medium in reaching the public since there is no functioning television system in Rwanda) and produces a daily press bulletin and a weekly newspaper. Two Catholic church publications sometimes print muted criticism of political and economic conditions. Such criticism is tolerated and occasionally even encouraged by the Government. There is no record of any journalist having been arrested for what he has written. The Government has cautioned the press to avoid what it regards as "harmful" criticism of leaders. It maintains that the press should devote its efforts to "promoting development." Books and imported publications are not censored. Academic freedom is limited, but there were no known incidents in 1989 involving restrictions on academic freedom of inquiry and research at the university.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is limited. No public meetings or demonstrations are permitted if there is any chance they will result in expressions of overt opposition to government policies. The Government permits private associations, but it requires that they be registered officially and accorded legal recognition.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution, but the Government continues to discriminate against, and local officials harass, several small groups, including the Jehovah's Witnesses. The Government denied the Witnesses' request for legal recognition in October 1988 on the grounds that they constitute a threat to law and order and disturb the peace. Government officials have said that the Witnesses' right to practice their religion will not be otherwise impeded (see Section 5).

Foreign clergy are able to practice their religion and organize missionary activities. Worship is freely permitted, and Christian churches are numerous. There are several mosques in the capital and elsewhere; Muslims are permitted to practice their religion throughout the republic.

RWANDA

The population is 70 percent Christian and approximately four percent Muslim, with the remainder following traditional African or no religious practices. Probably 80 percent of the Christians are Roman Catholic, but Protestant denominations are active. The Government depends upon church-sponsored schools for a considerable portion of education in Rwanda (over 85 percent of secondary schools are church-sponsored).

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement and residence within Rwanda is restricted by laws and regulations which require all residents to hold national identity cards and residence and work permits. People who wish to spend more than 3 days in a township other than their own must obtain permission from the authorities of the area they will be visiting. Police conduct periodic checks, especially in urban areas, and return all those not registered in the locality to their own township. Property owners who do not require tenants to show valid documentation are subject to fines and even imprisonment. Undocumented tenants are subject to expulsion.

A major deterrent to foreign travel was eliminated in 1987, when the Government abolished the requirement for posting substantial deposits (as much as $600) with passport applications. Citizens now need only pay a $20 nonrefundable fee for a passport, but they still must apply for and receive an exit visa before undertaking foreign travel. The exit visa process involves a security check conducted by the Central Intelligence Service. Unexplained refusals appear to be less frequent than in the past. Properly documented Rwandans may emigrate.

There are an estimated 225,000 Rwandan refugees in neighboring countries. Most are ethnic Tutsis who fled Rwanda during the revolution of 1959 and subsequent ethnic violence associated with independence in 1962. Official policy permits these people to be repatriated on a case by case basis if the refugee does not represent a security risk, and if land is available in Rwanda. The lack of land in this tiny and heavily populated country effectively precludes any significant repatriation. The Government's stated view is that demographic pressures and strained economic resources preclude any large-scale return of these refugees. It has encouraged countries hosting the refugees to naturalize them; this has not been well received by Rwanda's neighbors. Despite these difficulties, in 1989 approximately 50 refugees returned to Rwanda from Burundi, although many more reportedly returned outside official channels.

Rwanda hosts 19,000 Burundi refugees (mainly Hutu) who fled the 1972 massacres. In mid-1988, 47,000 Burundi nationals fleeing ethnic violence again sought refuge in Rwanda. The Rwandan Government refused to accord official refugee status to this latest group but did grant temporary asylum. Rwanda has received widespread praise for its efforts to meet the temporary humanitarian needs of these refugees. Most of them returned voluntarily to Burundi by the end of 1988 as the result of a procedure negotiated by a quadripartite group composed of Rwanda, Burundi, Zaire, and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. In late 1989, there were approximately 1,200 Burundi refugees remaining in Rwanda. Nine hundred were from the August 1988 influx, and about 300 arrived from the same area of Burundi in October 1989, apparently as a result of an isolated incident.

RWANDASection 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Rwandans have no opportunity to change their government through democratic means. The MRND, the sole body permitted political activity, makes all policy decisions and nominates all candidates for public office. It, in turn, is dominated by the President who also holds the position of president of the MRND. He chooses the Central Committee members and is the only constitutionally recognized candidate for President. Every citizen is automatically a party member and is required to pay party dues representing 2 days' pay per year. Delegates are both elected and appointed to the Party's governing national congress, which meets every 2 years. The essential function of the congress is to endorse the programs presented by the party leadership. The 1988 congress rejected calls for the election of local party officials by secret ballot rather than the raising of hands.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Rwanda cooperates with visiting delegations from such human rights groups as Amnesty International (AI) and the International Committee of the Red Cross. U.S. Embassy officials visited Kigali prison to inspect conditions and interview political prisoners on several occasions in 1989. There were no reports of requests for outside investigations of alleged human rights violations in 1989. The Ministry of Justice hosted an international conference on human rights in March which was attended by representatives from all neighboring countries as well as representatives from the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity, and AI. The conference focused on the observance of human rights in central Africa.

There are no local organizations monitoring and reporting on human rights practices in Rwanda.

In 1959 the majority Hutu ethnic group (89 percent of the population, according to the 1978 census) overthrew the Tutsi monarchy. In 1962 Belgium granted internal autonomy and then independence to a Hutu-led government which overwhelmingly won a U.N.-supervised election. These developments marked the end of the traditional, feudal society in which the Hutu had lived in subjugation under the Tutsi for centuries, and the beginning of a more modern society that places greater emphasis on individual rights.

The Constitution states that "all citizens are equal before the law, without any discrimination, notably that of race, color, origin, ethnicity, clan, sex, opinion, religion, or social position." The legal requirement that ethnic origin be listed on identity documents serves to ensure that informal quotas corresponding to the Hutu/Tutsi ratio in society are not exceeded. This system tends to limit the access of Tutsis to education and important positions in the Government and military. Private business is the only aspect of society in which the Tutsis wield any significant influence.

RWANDA

The Government actively prosecuted Jehovah's Witnesses in Rwanda from 1984 to 1986. In 1986, 296 Witnesses had been convicted of penal code violations including disrespecting the national flag, and 400 Witnesses were being held in custody pending trial. Under growing international pressure, the Government reversed its position on Witnesses in 1988, released all Witnesses held in prison, and ended its legal campaign against them. Since then, the Minister of Justice has held meetings with local officials to sensitize them to the Government's policy regarding Jehovah's Witnesses. Jehovah's Witnesses occasionally are arrested by local officials acting in ignorance of government policy, but they are normally released immediately when their cases are brought to the attention of the general prosecutor in Kigali, who has jurisdiction over all such cases. Despite this revised policy, there was renewed harassment of Witnesses in 1989 and incidents based on religious discrimination; one businessman lost his position for reasons related to his Jehovah's Witness religion.

Women perform most of the agricultural labor and have benefited less than men from social development. Despite the language in the Constitution, women's rights to property are limited, and women are not treated equally in divorce proceedings. Moreover, women have fewer opportunities for education, employment, and promotion. Family planning services are inadequate but are improving, and the President has been an outspoken advocate of family planning efforts. There are few organizations promoting women's interests. URAMA, a women's association which is an adjunct of the sole political party, was formed in 1989. The Government has completed revision of the Rwandan family code, which was awaiting at the end of 1989 the President's signature to take effect. The new code modernizes Rwandan laws concerning marriage, divorce, the status of children born out of wedlock, child custody, and other elements of family law.

Violence against women is socially accepted, especially in the countryside, but it is neither encouraged nor permitted by law. In public places, women are often observed to be subject to low level aggression: shoving, pushing, etc. Wife beating exists, but there are no studies available which show the extent of the problem. When reported, wife beating is punished by the courts, but rarely do these cases come to litigation. The Government has not addressed the issue of violence directly, but it has acted to improve the situation of women, largely by encouraging family planning and appointing women to positions of responsibility in the Government. The President has publicly advocated greater rights for women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Rwandan economy consists predominantly of small scale subsistence farming. There is very little industry, and hence few workers in the modern wage economy, which accounts for perhaps 7 percent of the work force in both private and public sectors. Labor organizations have only recently begun to develop, and the Government is guiding this evolution through a sole labor union, the Central Union of Rwandan Workers (CESTRAR). The Union is integrated into the sole political party, the MRND. Other workers' associations no longer have the right to exist independently but must affiliate with CESTRAR. Union membership (open to all salaried workers) is optional. CESTRAR's leadership is focusing on nonwage-related work conditions and on providing training opportunities and credit union facilities to its members.

In theory, CESTRAR members have the right to strike, but only with the approval of the Executive Committee--in effect, the Government. There was one strike in 1989. On October 21-22, a number of employees struck at the Bralirwa brewery in Gisenyi, apparently over a dispute with a fellow employee. The CESTRAR director played a pivotal role in mediating the dispute. As part of the settlement, the employee in question was transferred to Kigali.

CESTRAR is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the Organization of Central African Workers. It maintains friendly ties with foreign trade union organizations, including the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations. Rwanda has been a member of the International Labor Organization since 1962, but has ratified neither Convention 87 regarding freedom of association nor Convention 98 on collective bargaining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize "professional organizations" and to engage in collective bargaining with employers granted by the labor code is exercised within the framework of CESTRAR. Government control of CESTRAR combined with the small size of the wage economy is a significant constraint on the collective bargaining process. In practice, collective bargaining for wages does not occur in Rwanda. There are no export processing zones in Rwanda."

c. Prohibition of Forced and Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by Rwandan law and does not occur in practice (see Section 6.e.).

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Except in the subsistence agriculture sector, which is the area of employment of most Rwandans, children under 18 are not permitted to work without their parents' or guardian's authorization, and they may work at night only under exceptional circumstances on a temporary basis. The Minister of Labor may grant work permission to a child under 14. Child labor outside the agricultural sector is uncommon.

Minimum wage rates in the small modern economic sector are set by the Ministry of Labor. The current minimum wage is approximately $1.50 per day; higher minimum wages apply to certain professions. The minimum wage is inadequate to provide a decent standard of living for urban families and is often supplemented by work in petty commerce or agriculture. Hours of work and occupational health and safety in the modern wage sector are controlled by law and enforced by labor inspectors from the Ministry of Labor. Government offices and most private sector companies have a 43-hour workweek, which includes Saturday morning community service. Rwandan wage earners in both the public and private sectors are accorded 1 weekday afternoon free for participation in sports and leisure activities. Saturday morning community service hours are counted as part of the regular work service hours, and therefore supplemental wages are not required.

SAO TOME AND PRINCIPE*

Sao Tome and Principe is a one-party state which has been headed by President Manuel Pinto da Costa since its independence from Portugal in 1975. He also leads the sole legal party, the Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe (MLSTP), whose Central Committee is the country's key policymaking body. Most of the Ministers and Ministers-Delegate in the 15-member Cabinet (headed by the Prime Minister) are members of the Central Committee. The country's legislative body, the Popular Assembly, acts only to ratify bills proposed by the President.

A series of radical political reforms was endorsed by the MLSTP Central Committee and a widely attended national party conference in December 1989. The recommended changes include the establishment of a multiparty democracy, liberalization of the economy, direct election of the President by universal suffrage, the creation of an independent judiciary, and a guarantee of the right to strike. To be enacted, these reforms would require a rewriting of the party manifesto and national Constitution.

The police power is held by a 300-member paramilitary Security Police Force which reports to the Chief of Security Police in the Ministry of Defense. Sao Tome's small armed forces are supplemented by 450 Angolan soldiers, who have been present on Sao Tome since a 1978 invasion threat and who help guard the airport and other strategic locations. There are approximately 40 Cuban technical security advisers. Sao Tomean armed forces, acting with the help of the Angolan troops, successfully repulsed a March 1988 invasion attempt by 43 mostly unarmed "commandos," part of an exile group located in Portugal.

Since 1984 the Government has moved away from Marxist-Leninist economic practices and sought help from Western nations and international institutions to help reinvigorate the economy. Previous inefficient, state-directed agricultural practices and policies, combined with a birth rate of about 3 percent, had resulted in serious need for international food assistance, primarily from the United Nations' World Food Program. President Pinto da Costa reorganized his Government in January 1988 to try to cope more effectively with the continuing economic crisis and to implement reforms being negotiated with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. One key aspect of the economic reforms is a land distribution plan which will allow individual farmers and cooperatives to obtain multiyear leases to farmland.

Human rights are tightly circumscribed in Sao Tome and Principe. Principal problem areas include: the use of incommunicado detention; restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, and the right of citizens to change their government; and limitations on worker rights. The Government publicly committed itself in 1988 to permit due process, including an open trial, for the 41 commandos detained after the coup attempt. The trial ended in September with four of the accused acquitted and the remainder sentenced to jail terms ranging from 2 to 22 years.

*There is no American Embassy in Sao Tome and Principe. Information on the human rights situation is therefore limited.

SAO TOME AND PRINCIPERESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings by the Government in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is little information available on this subject. Prison conditions are known to be severe. Amnesty International (AI) made a special appeal to the Government in 1988 expressing concern about possible mistreatment of the arrested commandos. AI reported that the detainees were held incommunicado for a lengthy period, without access to family or legal counsel, although families ultimately were allowed access to the prisoners. The authorities claimed that none of the detainees had been ill-treated while in custody.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is very little information available on the laws regulating arrest and detention or the manner in which the authorities carry out these powers. Political/security cases normally come under the jurisdiction of the Special Court for Counterrevolutionary Acts established in 1975. In these cases, suspects may be held for 30 days for interrogation before being released or charged. In actual practice, the Government can detain security suspects for much longer periods, without charge and usually incommunicado, as in the case of the commandos arrested in 1988.

At the end of 1989, the number of political detainees still being held was unknown but was believed to be small. It is known that in addition to the commandos, several other people were arrested in the wake of the coup attempt and presumably they were tried in 1989 with the others (see Section 1.e.). Fears that the Government might use the "invasion" as an excuse for wide-scale arrests of suspected government critics did not materialize.

Carlos da Graca, former Minister of Health, accepted President Pinto da Costa's standing invitation to return home in 1988 and subsequently was named Foreign Minister. Former Prime Minister Miguel Trovoada and several lesser known government opponents still remain in self-exile.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Justice is administered at the highest level by the Supreme Tribunal, named by and responsible to the Popular Assembly. Thus the judiciary's independence is limited. Lower tribunals are appointed to try military cases. In most cases, common criminals are given a hearing and are sentenced by a judge. There is no tradition of independent defense counsel or jury.

SAO TOME AND PRINCIPE

The Constitution does not address the right to a public trial, but there have been instances of public trials in recent years. Criminal trials occasionally are reported by the local media.

The trial of 41 persons accused of involvement in the 1988 coup attempt took place in 1989 before the Special Court for Counterrevolutionary Acts. The defendants had access to legal counsel, and the trial was open to the public, including the government-controlled press. In September the Court acquitted four persons and sentenced the others to prison terms from 2 to 22 years. There was no information available on appeal procedures.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government seeks to identify potential dissidents through a loosely organized system of informers and monitoring of political activities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The national party conference in December was broadcast live by national radio and television and showed wide-ranging debate and at times sharp criticism of the party and Government. Previous to this event, little public criticism of, or opposition to, the Government was tolerated.

Sao Tome media, consisting of a television station, a radio station, and occasionally a newspaper, are government controlled and reflect faithfully the government and party line.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are strictly limited. Historically, political assembly and activity have been legal only within the context of the MLSTP and its mass organizations. Since 1987, when the MLSTP Central Committee authorized a constitutional amendment permitting nonparty groups to propose candidates for election to the Popular Assembly, there has been an easing of assembly and association restrictions. Functions sponsored by cultural and social organizations require government authorization. In another recent development, cooperative and professional associations are now permitted with government approval.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religious freedom is provided for in the Constitution, and the three major religious communities--Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Seventh-Day Adventist--are allowed to practice freely.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The geographic isolation and poverty of this country severely limit foreign travel by its citizens. The Government closely controls exit visas for the few people who travel--almost exclusively those on government missions or medical evacuation trips. Citizens move freely around and between the island of Sao Tome and the smaller island of Principe, 90 miles away. Because interisland transport is only by slow ferry or twice weekly propeller airplane, such travel is difficult. Many Sao Tomeans live in Gabon and Angola, due mostly to the lack of employment opportunities on the islands.

Citizens did not have the right to change their government through democratic means in 1989. However, prospects for a pluralist democracy appeared to be enhanced by the December 1989 recommendations of the Central Committee and national party congress to establish a multiparty system. To maintain his leadership position, the President requires the support of a majority of the MLSTP Central Committee, a group which represents diverse economic and political ideologies. Government policy is formulated by President Pinto da Costa in consultation with the Prime Minister and other key cabinet and security officials.

Following changes in the party constitution proposed in October 1987, the MLSTP now encourages multicandidate elections for Popular Assembly seats and direct election by secret ballot of the President of the Republic (previously, election was by vote of the members of the Popular Assembly). All candidates must still be approved by the MLSTP, although they need not be party members. Elections of the President and the members of the Popular Assembly are held every 5 years, most recently in September 1985.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Sao Tome and Principe is an isolated nation with little outside contact. The Government reacted positively--promising and delivering an open trial for the perpetrators of the coup attempt--to Amnesty International's 1988 appeal for the well-being of, and due process for, those arrested invaders. No groups in the country are known to monitor human rights developments. Sao Tome is a member of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights.

The Sao Tomean population (94,000 on Sao Tome, 20,000 on Principe) is relatively homogeneous in a common Luso-African culture. There have been no reports of political discrimination on a tribal, regional, sexual, or religious basis. Sao Tome citizens of Cape Verdean origin are regarded as overly ambitious, and there is resentment of them by the rest of the populace. The inhabitants of Principe often feel neglected by the central Government, an attitude accentuated by the current economic crisis.

Like men, women face drudgery and low wages on the large cocoa plantations. Only a small number of women have gained access to professional positions. Violence against women in Sao Tome and Principe is believed to be infrequent and is not part of the traditional social context. The few incidents reported from time to time generally are presented within the context of domestic disputes. There is no information on the frequency of wife beating or other forms of domestic violence. As far as is known, the Government has not addressed this issue publicly.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of association is restricted. The sole trade union exists mainly on paper. The National Organization of Workers of Sao Tome and Principe was formed in September 1989, but little is known of it apart from the fact that it is affiliated with the MLSTP. Most salaried workers in the country are on the large state-owned empresas (plantation-like agricultural enterprises) and do not often leave the estate, which includes all community facilities.

There is no explicit legislation forbidding strikes, but no strikes have been held, although the new political reforms, when implemented, would legalize the right to strike. Sao Tome and Principe joined the International Labor Organization in 1982 but has not yet ratified either Convention 87 on Freedom of Association or Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively. The sole trade union organization is nominally affiliated to the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no information currently available on whether collective bargaining is legally permitted, but the Government is the determining force in setting wages and working conditions. Because of mismanagement, neglect, and unproductivity of state-run empresas, workers are sometimes not paid salaries for up to 6 months. Labor legislation and practice are uniform throughout the country, and there are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor, which is prohibited by law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

A legal minimum employment age of 18 years in the modern wage economy is generally respected in practice. However, in the subsistence agricultural sector, children work on family plots at all ages.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The beginning basic salary for an empresa worker is about $34 per month, with the median salary about $50 per month. These wages are not sufficient to provide a decent living for workers and their families. The empresa workers survive by running up debts at the company store, which are deducted from their "paper" wages. Workers are provided free (but very poor) housing, rudimentary medical care, and access to the subsidized company store. The standard workweek is 40 hours.

The implementation of a structural adjustment program (backed by the World Bank) has led to measures such as a sharp devaluation of the currency and reductions in food subsidies which have caused short-term economic hardships for empresa workers and others. A few state-owned farms are now under private management, and the conditions of workers on these estates is slowly improving as cocoa production increases and modern management techniques replace Socialist collective farming.

Basic occupational health and safety standards are contained in the Social Security Law of 1979. It is not known to what extent they are enforced.

SENEGAL

Senegal is a republic with an elected president, unicameral legislature, and governmental institutions modeled on French lines. Although Senegal has 17 legal political parties, the Socialist Party has dominated the political scene and controlled the Government since independence from France in 1960. Prime Minister Abdou Diouf automatically succeeded the retiring President Leopold Senghor in January 1981. Diouf was elected President in his own right in the regularly scheduled elections 2 years later, and his Socialist Party won 111 of 120 National Assembly seats. In the hotly contested presidential elections of February 1988 (the results of which continue to be disputed by the opposition), Diouf was declared reelected with 73 percent of the vote. In the concurrent National Assembly elections, the Socialist Party took 103 seats and the opposition Senegalese Democratic Party (PDS) 17 seats.

The Senegalese armed forces (about 15,000 men, including the paramilitary gendarmerie) are a professional, disciplined organization which traditionally maintains an aloofness from politics and is respected by the population. Due to heightened tensions with Mauritania, the armed forces assumed a higher profile in 1989, e.g., in restoring order in the Dakar area under the state of emergency declared in April-May. Civilian security forces are fairly well trained and generally respect the laws they enforce; those who do not face criminal prosecution.

Senegal has a mixed economy with a substantial private sector. Since June 1983, Senegal has actively pursued a structural adjustment program, with the support of the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and major bilateral donors, designed to liberalize the economy and stimulate economic growth. There is concern, however, about the short-term political impact of the austerity reforms, particularly in Dakar, where high unemployment and deteriorating social conditions contributed to marked opposition gains and civil unrest in the 1988 elections. The economy remained fragile at the end of 1989.

Events in 1989 subjected Senegal's democracy and its generally creditable human rights record to its most sustained test since independence, particularly the mass violence against ethnic Maurs origin. Strikes plagued the education sector during the first quarter of the year. The leader of the Senegalese Democratic Party, Secretary General Abdoulaye Wade, returned to Senegal in March after a long absence abroad. Wade, who disputes the legality of President Diouf's reelection in 1988, held party rallies and called for mass antigovernment demonstrations, which were promptly banned by the authorities. Some demonstrators turned out anyway, and street violence and vandalism broke out in Dakar on March 14 and on National Day, April 4. Subsequently, touched off by a fatal border shooting on April 9, there were several waves of violence directed against Mauritians resident in Senegal and the declaration of a state of emergency. The violence resulted in scores dead in Senegal (and a similar rash of killings in Mauritania), the destruction of the greater part of Senegal's Maur-dominated small retail trade sector, a massive repatriation of populations by both countries, and both armies arrayed along their 500-mile border. Differences with other neighbors--a maritime border dispute with Guinea-Bissau and the breakup of the confederation with The Gambia--further raised the political temperature.

SENEGAL

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There was no evidence of any killings for political motives. However, government actions in both Senegal and Mauritania fueled the April unrest involving citizens of both countries. Senegalese authorities were slow to comprehend the scale of the violence directed against Maurs and their property. There has been no definitive public accounting of casualties, but senior Ministry of Justice officials estimated the number of dead at 80. Order was not restored until the army was called out, and a state of emergency imposed in the Dakar region.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Government and police officials in Senegal generally respect the section of the Criminal Code prohibiting physical abuse. Nevertheless, there are periodic accounts of occasional abuse (including beatings and denial of food, water, and clothing to prisoners) under interrogation during the period of custody ("guard a vue") between arrest and appearance before a magistrate.

Amnesty International (AI), with the consent of the Government, sent a team to Senegal in October to discuss charges of alleged torture of suspected Casamance separatists during the period 1982-1988. The Government refused to accept the delegation's suggestion that a special committee be established to investigate human rights abuses, saying that existing legal mechanisms were sufficient. The Government, however, publicly reaffirmed its opposition to torture and promised to improve oversight procedures in the courts and security forces to prevent abuses. AI's 1989 report notes that ill-treatment of prisoners by police in 1988 resulted in at least one death.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The constitutional prohibition against arbitrary arrest or detention is generally respected in practice. The Senegalese legal system is patterned after the French. A person suspected of a crime may be legally held without charge for 48 hours after arrest and may be held up to 72 hours if ordered by a public prosecutor. In fact this period of detention, during which the prisoner has no access to family or attorney, may be much longer.

Temporary detention or custody is permitted when civil authorities determine that there is a threat of civil disturbance or that a person is a threat to himself or others. Temporary custody is valid for a maximum period of 6 months, but it may be renewed for additional 6-month periods if the investigating magistrate certifies that this time is required to complete the investigation. There is no limit to the number of times it may be renewed. These laws are generally respected by law enforcement officials, and charges are formally and clearly drawn. By law, every person has access to legal counsel during every step of the legal process from the time his case is presented to a magistrate. Persons with means will have private attorneys. The court may appoint public defenders for indigents charged with felonies; in practice, however this rarely happens. The Association of Young Senegalese Attorneys provides free legal counsel to accused indigents.

During the state of emergency from April 28 to May 19, the Government had the authority to order house arrests and administrative internment for up to 2 months and to hold suspects for up to 8 days before charging them. However, with the exception of the curfew, no extraordinary powers were exercised, and such arrests as were made (all for crimes against property) were under the ordinary penal code.

However, the Government used its detention and other legal powers broadly in 1988 and 1989 to strike at critics, including journalists (see Section 2.a.). In judicial cases which are tried before the State Security Court, 23 persons remained under indictment for membership in an illegal organization, the Movement of Democratic Forces of the Casamance (MFDC), which advocates violent means to secure the independence of Senegal's southernmost region. All but five of these were free at year's end while awaiting trial; those still incarcerated are also accused of plotting against the security of the state. The five were arrested after having tried to solicit money and arms from Guinea-Bissau security officials to support guerrilla operations in the Casamance. Three men remained in detention awaiting trial for involvement in the fire-bombing of an official vehicle, allegedly for political motives, in December 1988. Seven members of the opposition PDS also were arrested, on the basis of an anonymous tip, in connection with the same incident. They soon were granted provisional liberty, and, although charges had not been formally dropped, the case appeared to be inactive at the end of 1989. In addition, 11 Maurs were being held at the end of 1989 for alleged espionage.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Senegal has an active and well-trained judiciary, which is constitutionally independent of the executive, the legislature, and the armed forces. Court officials are lawyers who have completed a number of years of required apprenticeship. Trials are public, and defendants have the right to a defense attorney from the time the case is presented before an examining magistrate. Ordinary courts are presided over by a panel of judges which in criminal cases includes a panel of citizens as a form of jury. Magistrates are appointed by decree and in principle are not subject to government supervision; however, low pay, poor working conditions, and family and political ties may make magistrates vulnerable to outside pressures.

There are four categories of special courts: the High Court of Justice, the State Security Court, the Court for the Repression of the Unlawful Accumulation of Wealth, and the military courts. The High Court of Justice, created for the sole purpose of trying high government officials for treason or malfeasance, has never met. The State Security Court, consisting of a judge and two assessors, has jurisdiction over cases involving politically motivated crimes. The "illegal enrichment" Court, which has only judged three cases since it was created in 1981, is not presently active. The military court system has jurisdiction over offenses committed by members of the armed forces during peacetime. Civilians may not be tried by military courts.

There were no reports of political prisoners in Senegal at the end of 1989. However, a military Board of Enquiry in April 1989 disciplined three officers, including the former armed forces chief of staff, for allegedly plotting a coup during the turbulent events surrounding the 1988 elections. Early in 1989, the Government indicated its intention to appeal a judge's decision of November 1988 in Louga which dismissed charges against members of two opposition political parties for unlawful assembly and inciting a riot; no appeal, however, had been entered at the end of 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is relatively little government interference in the private lives of Senegalese citizens, particularly in rural areas. There are constitutional safeguards against arbitrary invasion of the home. Search warrants are required and under normal circumstances may be issued only by judges and in accordance with procedures established by law. In practice, searches without warrants occasionally take place. There is no evident pattern of monitoring the private written or oral communications of Senegalese citizens. There are reports, however, of active supporters of the political opposition being subject to wiretaps, unusually close scrutiny of tax records, and other forms of petty harassment.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is protected in the Constitution and is generally respected in practice. Subject to restrictions relating to public order, a wide variety of political expression is possible. While Senegal's only daily newspaper is controlled by the ruling Socialist Party, there are many regularly published magazines and newspapers reflecting a broad range of political opinion from conservative to Marxist. The independent press often breaks stories ignored by the establishment daily newspaper (e.g., the trial of military officers accused of planning a coup d'etat) and the opposition newspaper, Sopi, regularly denounces the Government as illegitimate and calls on President Diouf to resign.

Notwithstanding this diversity, the official media (including the government-controlled radio, which is by far the most important medium of news dissemination), are subject to controls over their news coverage. Activities of the ruling party are always covered, while the opposition parties are mentioned only occasionally and selectively, e.g., communiques are not read in their entirety, or certain factions are excluded in favor of others less hostile to the Government. More equitable access to the media emerged as a principal opposition demand during and after the 1988 elections. The National Assembly in October enacted a new law, which must still be implemented by decree, regulating access to television and radio by "regularly constituted political parties." It is not yet clear whether the law will result in more transmission and air time to the Government's opponents.

There are laws prohibiting personal attacks against the Chief of State or the institutions of the Republic, and a 1965 law prohibiting the dissemination of "false news" has been criticized for having a possible chilling effect on journalists. The Government used these legal powers in 1989. A university professor, who wrote an article in an independent newspaper on January 5, 1989, on the Senegalese police strike of 1987, was threatened with charges that he tried to discredit the institutions of Senegal; the case was dropped by the end of the same month. The publication director for Sopi was convicted on December 16 of spreading false news and discrediting public institutions. The charges arose from an article he had written in the spring claiming that agents of the Government had falsified the 1988 presidential election returns--certified as authentic by the Supreme Court--and publishing what were purported to be the true figures, showing PDS candidate Wade a clear winner. The director appealed the verdict and was released from custody until the appeal is heard. On September 12 and 13, four Sopi journalists and the chairman of the PDS parliamentary delegation were indicted for a series of Sopi articles attacking a senior member of the Government and exposing alleged equipment deficiencies in the armed forces. Immediately after charges were filed, all were granted conditional liberty (requiring the accused to keep the authorities advised of their whereabouts). The cases were still pending at year's end.

Publishers are required to register with the Central Court prior to starting publication, but such registrations are routinely approved. Publications, including foreign publications, are almost never censored or banned in Senegal. An exception occurred in February 1989 when Salman Rushdie's "Satanic Verses" was banned. The action came after the Organization of Islamic Conference (of which Senegal is a member) called on member states to ban the book and all others published by Viking/Penguin until the publishers withdrew the offending title. However, no other Viking/Penguin books were withdrawn, and foreign periodicals reporting on the Rushdie affair and quoting the book's controversial passages continued to circulate freely in Senegal.

In general, academic freedom is enjoyed by the schools and Senegal's sole university.

A National Commission reviews all films prior to public showing. Movies deemed offensive to Senegalese moral sensibilities are censored or banned. No instances are known of films being banned because of offensive political content.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

In general, Senegalese freely exercise their constitutional rights of assembly and association. However, prior authorization for public demonstrations is required, and demonstrations or protest meetings against government policies are closely monitored by security services. The Ministry of Interior refused permission for the opposition PDS to hold mass demonstrations in Dakar March 14 and April 4 (National Day) on the grounds that public safety was threatened by the vandalism and random street violence which increasingly has accompanied such political demonstrations. Senegalese wishing to form associations must register them with the Ministry of Interior (except for business-related associations, which are registered with the Ministry of Commerce). By law and in practice, the Ministry is obliged to register such groups, so long as the objectives of association are clearly stated and not in violation of the law.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Senegal is constitutionally a secular state, and freedom of religion is a legal right which exists in practice. Islam is the religion of over 85 percent of the population, but no attempt has been made by the Government to introduce Shari'a (Islamic) law. Other religions, the major one of which is Roman Catholicism, are freely practiced. Missionary activity is permitted, and foreign Protestant missionaries are active in several regions of the country. Conversion is permitted, and there is no discrimination against minority religions. Adherence to a particular religion confers no official advantage or disadvantage in civil, political, economic, military, or other sectors. Both Islamic and Christian organizations publish periodicals. Koranic and Catholic schools exist alongside the public schools system, and the Mouride Brotherhood is constructing an Islamic University in its headquarters city of Touba.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution states that all citizens have the right to move and establish themselves freely anywhere in Senegal, a right that is respected in practice. Exit visas are not required for travel outside the country. There is no restriction on emigration, and repatriates are not officially disadvantaged on return to Senegal. A nighttime curfew was imposed throughout the Dakar region during the state of emergency which lasted from April 28 to May 19. A Senegalese citizen by birth may not have his citizenship annulled for any reason. A naturalized citizen may have his citizenship revoked if it is proved in a court of law that he obtained his citizenship fraudulently or--if he has been a citizen less than 15 years--if convicted of a crime.

Although Senegal's tolerant political and economic environment has attracted Africans from other countries, Senegal has hosted few official refugees. According to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), there were less than 200 registered and assisted refugees in the country at the beginning of 1989. However, in 1989 the refugee/displaced person situation changed dramatically with the ethnic violence which erupted in Senegal and Mauritania in April and May. Unable initially to protect Maurs resident in Senegal, the Government--in agreement with the Government of Mauritania--began repatriating many of them by air and by land; and eventually some 100,000 persons were returned to Mauritania. Many of these lost their property in Senegal, and some were stripped of personal belongings and papers by Senegalese authorities--allegedly in retaliation for similar treatment dealt to Senegalese departing Mauritania. Prior to the unrest, some estimates placed the number of Mauritians living in Senegal at 300,000, although no firm figures are available.

These civil disturbances in turn led to a massive return to Senegal of persons from Mauritania. By September approximately 90,000 Senegalese, mostly skilled and semiskilled workers and fishermen, had been repatriated from Mauritania. In addition, some 44,000 black African Mauritanian citizens and 16,000 Senegalese uprooted from their traditional homes on the right (Mauritania) bank of the Senegal River had taken refuge in Senegal. Some had been forcibly expelled from Mauritania, while others fled a climate of intimidation and violence. Almost overnight, Senegal faced a massive and unanticipated refugee/displaced persons problem, but by the end of 1989 most of the 90,000 repatriated Senegalese had been absorbed into their families and communities throughout the country, although their integration into Senegal's fragile economy remained a serious problem. In contrast, the 60,000 Mauritanian and Senegalese uprooted from their communities in Mauritania have been sheltered in refugee camps and in Senegalese villages near the river frontier. For the most part the Senegalese, working with the UNHCR and other international agencies, organizations, and donor countries, have been generous in assisting these refugee/displaced persons, many of whom have strong ethnic and family ties in Senegal.

There were no known instances of refugees or displaced persons being refused entry into Senegal or forcibly returned to Mauritania. However, the Government admitted that some Senegalese citizens might have been inadvertently transferred to Mauritania during the exchange of populations and has said Senegal will take back any citizens who wish to return. According to UNHCR estimates, up to 22,000 Senegalese citizens may have been among those transferred to Mauritania. The Mauritanian Government claims that upwards of 200,000 of its citizens are still being held hostage in Senegal. The Senegalese Government disputes this charge. However, a mechanism for identifying such Mauritanians in Senegal and Senegalese among the displaced population in Mauritania and facilitating their return to Mauritania and Senegal had not been established by year's end.

Senegal is a functioning multiparty democracy, but the legitimacy of its 1988 election results was sharply challenged by the opposition. The Socialist Party has dominated Senegalese political life since independence. Presidential and legislative elections, with universal suffrage for all citizens over 21, are held concurrently every 5 years.

Following the 1988 elections, opposition leaders claimed widespread fraud and continued in 1989 to dispute publicly the legitimacy of the announced results. Sixteen of the 17 elected opposition deputies did take their seats in the National Assembly and participated in parliamentary activities. Opposition leaders demand electoral reforms, including a tightening of the voter identification card system and protection of the secret ballot. Legislation along these lines was enacted by the National Assembly in October. The new electoral law failed to address the opposition demand for a neutral national commission to supervise elections, a task now carried out by civil servants and the Supreme Court.

SENEGAL

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government allows human rights groups such as Amnesty International to investigate allegations concerning human rights abuses in Senegal and responds to requests for information about those allegations. The ICRC, with the approval of the Government, opened an office in Dakar in May 1989 with a mandate to monitor prisoner conditions.

Senegal is a leader among African countries in the promotion of international standards for human rights practices. For example, it sponsored the African Charter on Human and People's Rights of the OAU and was a founder of the OAU's African Human Rights Commission in 1987. Its officials serve in a variety of pertinent bodies; its representative was chairman of the U.N. Human Rights Commission in 1988 and played a key role in organizing and leading a mission to investigate the human rights situation in Cuba. Dakar is the headquarters of several institutions which foster human rights and democratic pluralism in Africa and frequently is the site of conferences related to human rights.

While officially there is no discrimination in Senegal based on race, religion, or language, the country is predominantly Muslim, and Islamic customs, including polygamy and the rules of inheritance, generally prevail, especially in the rural areas. Article 7 of the Constitution states, "men and women shall be equal in law." The status of women has steadily improved under government encouragement and through increased educational opportunities. Modifications of the family code adopted by the National Assembly in 1988 reinforced women's rights to divorce, alimony, and child support.

However, Islamic and Senegalese customs persist, and women are still confined largely to traditional roles, notably in the large subsistence agricultural sector. Women usually marry young (the majority by age 16), average about 7 live births, and die relatively young. Sixty-seven percent of women aged 40 to 45 live in polygamous unions.

Violence against women, usually wife beating, occurs, particularly in rural areas, but there are no accurate statistics, and the extent of the problem is not known. Police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes, and women are reluctant to go outside the family for redress. Infibulation, the most severe and dangerous form of female genital mutilation, frequently is performed on girls aged 10 to 14 in the Fleuve, Casamance, and Senegal Oriental regions; the practice is deeply rooted in ethnic tradition and cuts across religious lines. There are no laws or regulations prohibiting this practice. However, the Minister of Social Development (a female dentist) has taken a personal interest in the issue and has formed a group to study the practice and warn village women of its hazards. The semiofficial daily newspaper Le Soleil carried a lengthy World Health Organization report in December about the harmful physical and psychological effects of excision and infibulation.

SENEGAL

Section 6 Worker Rights

A minimum of seven people, each having worked within their profession for at least 1 year, are free to form a union by submitting a list of members and a charter to the Ministry of Interior. A union can be disbanded by the Ministry if the union's activities deviate from the charter. Even though they represent a small percentage of the overall population, unions wield a significant amount of political influence, primarily because of their ability to disrupt essential services.

At least 75 percent of the working population are engaged in rural activities such as cultivation, herding, and fishing. There are approximately 323,000 workers in the formal wage sector, of which approximately 100,000 belong to various unions. Of these, approximately 70,000 workers in 61 unions belong to the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers (CNTS), which is affiliated with the ruling Socialist Party. Although the CNTS was established in 1969 as the sole trade union central, with affiliation to the sole legal party, political and trade union pluralism was reestablished after 1976. The principal rival organization to the CNTS is known as the Democratic Union of Senegalese Workers (UDTS) and various independent unions exist in health, education, and transportation sectors.

While ostensibly an independent umbrella organization, the CNTS has supported government policies. During 1989 strains developed in this relationship, and the CNTS leadership has publicly opposed government policies on structural adjustment, modification of the labor code, and liberalization of the economy. Although CNTS remains Senegal's largest and most powerful labor confederation, it faces increased competition from independent unions.

Unions have the right to strike, and 1988/1989 saw strikes by the teacher/professor, electrical, banking, and health worker unions which were resolved in bargaining with the Government.

Senegalese unions are active in international labor organizations. The CNTS and the small Union of Free Workers of Senegal (UTLS) belong to the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. The UTLS is also listed as an affiliate of the communist-controlled WFTU.

For several years the Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization has requested an amendment to the Senegalese law covering seditious associations to ensure that the Government cannot dissolve a trade union which it regards as disrupting the constitutional order by unlawful means.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Senegalese unions have the right by law to organize and to bargain collectively, and these rights are protected in practice. There are no known instances of workers being forcibly discouraged from exercising these rights. In recent years, as the economic situation worsened and factories and businesses closed down, collective bargaining has succeeded in several instances in ensuring extended benefits for laid-off workers, e.g., the airline workers' union in negotiations with the Government and the new management of Air Afrique respectively. The CNTS has been a major force in pressuring employers and the Government to establish regulations and guidelines for the well-being of workers. The Government will intervene in labor/management disputes when requested and plays a mediation and arbitration role in private and state-enterprise sectors.

An export free zone exists in Dakar into which goods may be imported for manufacture and reexported without payment of duty. Senegalese labor laws apply uniformly throughout the country, including in this zone.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There were no reports of forced labor in Senegal, which is prohibited by law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment in Senegal is 16 for apprenticeships and 18 for all other types of work. These restrictions are closely monitored and strictly enforced within the formal wage sector, that is, the area of the economy over which the Government can exercise some supervision such as state agencies, large private enterprises, or farmers gathered into cooperatives. On the other hand, children under 16 are employed in the traditional sector, and minimum age and other workplace regulations on family farms in rural areas and in small, privately owned businesses are not seriously enforced.

The CNTS has been very successful, within the formal economic sector, in obtaining acceptable conditions of work, including standard workweeks (40 to 48 hours per week for most professions), holiday/annual leave benefits (usually 1 month per year), and a variety of health and safety regulations. These regulations are incorporated into the Labor Code approved by the National Assembly and are supervised by Ministry of Labor inspectors. Enforcement, however, appears to be uneven, especially outside the formal wage sector. Recent CNTS efforts have concentrated on raising the minimum wage, currently approximately $0.82 an hour, which, according to Senegalese unions, is not considered sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living. Workers must frequently supplement incomes through second jobs and reliance on the extended family.

SEYCHELLES

President France Albert Rene, who took power in June 1977 in a military coup d'etat, heads the Government and the only authorized political party in the Seychelles. In 1979 the new Government adopted a Constitution which abolished all political opposition to the ruling Socialist party, the Seychelles People's Progressive Front (SPPF), and established a strong presidency which appoints ministers, and a People's Assembly of 23 elected party members and several appointed members. In the 1987 Assembly elections more than one candidate vied for some seats, but all candidates were members of the SPPF. President Rene was the only candidate in the June 1989 presidential election, winning more than 96 percent of the vote for a third 5-year term.

Seychelles has a defense force of about 800 army personnel, a 300-man presidential protection unit, a 200-man navy, a 50-man air force, a uniformed police force of 500, and a people's militia of about 2,000. Collectively, these units amount to 5 percent of the total population.

The Government, through the Seychelles marketing board, other state organizations, and banking regulations, controls the importation, licensing, and distribution of virtually all goods and services and exercises significant control over all phases of the economy. Tourism is the most important sector, accounting for 11 percent of gross domestic product. Approximately 80,000 tourists visited Seychelles during 1989. Seychelles has made progress toward diversifying its economy by granting fishing licenses to a number of foreign fishing vessels, and it services this fleet at expanded port facilities in Victoria, which were financed by foreign donor assistance.

Human rights, including political rights, continued to be circumscribed in 1989. The Constitution does not provide for fundamental human rights, but rather includes them in a preamble as the goal of the people of Seychelles. The threat of the President invoking the Public Security Act, which allows for indefinite detention in security cases, serves to intimidate real and potential opposition elements. The Government also uses exile as a means of suppressing dissent, and it has continued a program for acquiring real property belonging to Seychellois residing overseas and known to be opposed to the Government. There were no reported instances of political arrests or detentions in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no confirmed instances of killing for political motives in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance.

SEYCHELLES

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution explicitly forbids torture. However, there were credible reports of abusive practices on the part of the Seychelles police, particularly its Police Mobile Unit (PMU). These activities primarily involved severe beatings, often with wooden batons (hence the PMU's local nickname, the Garde Baton), and occurred with disturbing frequency during 1989. The objects of these beatings are, for the most part, suspected drug users, unemployed youths, and the like. The beatings themselves generally do not occur in connection with detentions. Criminal complaints brought against individual officers for such practices are invariably dismissed, and no policemen have been discharged as a result of these activities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Penal Code provides that persons arrested must be brought before a magistrate within 48 hours. In nonpolitical cases this provision is applied in practice. Bail is available in most cases. The Government, however, has used criminal charges such as drug possession to hit at perceived opponents, e.g., the case of Royce Dias.

There were no confirmed reports in 1989 of persons being arrested and detained under the Public Security Act (PSA), which was passed in December 1981 in the aftermath of an attack by mercenaries. The Act allows for indefinite detention in security cases and has been used in the past under questionable circumstances, e.g., the arrest of Phillippe Boule, the leading human rights activist in the country in June 1986. Under the authority of the Penal Code, police sometimes hold persons for 24 hours for "questioning" regarding alleged antigovernment activities. In particular, persons who seek to mobilize public opinion against the Government run a serious risk of being held for "questioning." In late 1989, the Attorney General determined that the period of initial detention could be extended to 48 or even 72 hours, provided that an active investigation was being conducted "with reasonable dispatch." The defense attorney has excellent access to the detainee and to the police and can readily ascertain whether there is an active investigation. At the end of 1989, there were no known political detainees or prisoners.

In the past, the Government has directly urged opponents to emigrate, an option that many have chosen over the years. It has also taken other actions to encourage potential opponents to leave the country, including dismissals from government service and social and economic harassment against businessmen and professionals.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is patterned on English common law (e.g., public trial by jury) but is also influenced by the Napoleonic civil law (e.g., torts and contracts). The judiciary includes the Supreme Court and an Appeals Court. Judges are provided under arrangements with the British Commonwealth and, except for past security cases, they have exhibited considerable independence from both the executive and legislative branches. Defendants in nonpolitical (both civil and criminal) cases have access to counsel and enjoy speedy and fair trials. The Chief Justice, who is appointed by the President, has stressed on several occasions that it is the judiciary's responsibility to impose sentences as required by law and that it should reflect the will of the legislature.

The President exercises quasi-judicial powers. He not only has appointment authority but also has broad detention authority where public security is involved. Seychelles law requires that a member of the armed forces be tried by court-martial unless the President decrees otherwise.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The authorities have broad powers of search and seizure without a warrant, and the Mobile Police Unit is particularly active in exercising such power. During 1989, for example, an MPU force in excess of 12 members (all male), acting without a warrant, smashed down the door of a local woman's home, strip-searched her in her own home, and ransacked that home in what was alleged to be a search for drugs. No drugs were found.

Legislation exists which allows the Government to open mail, domestic as well as international, and it is widely believed that it does so regularly. Many persons complain that applications for immigration to other countries are confiscated.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although theoretically protected under the 1979 Constitution, freedom of speech is exercised sparingly. There is no criticism of the President or the Government in Parliament, although specific issues are debated and reported in the media.

The Government controls the major newspaper in the country, as well as all radio and television broadcasting. Legislation provides up to 3 years' imprisonment for anyone "who with intent to bring the President into hatred, ridicule, or contempt, publishes any defamatory or insulting matter whether in writing, print, or by word of mouth, or in any other manner." This same legislation authorizes a 2-year sentence for anyone who "prints, supplies, distributes, reproduces, or has in his possession or control" any publication banned by the Government for security reasons. The Government has sought to prevent the importation of pamphlets printed by its opposition abroad. There were no known arrests for distribution or importation of "seditious literature" in 1989. In general, foreign publications are imported and sold without hindrance.

The President has kept his promise not to interfere with the right of religious groups to speak out freely on religious and social matters. The Catholic Church publishes a lively paper, Echo Des Isles, which is not subject to government censorship and which carries some articles obliquely critical of the Government. The two largest religious denominations in the country, the Roman Catholic and the Anglican churches, are each provided 2 hours of free, uncensored broadcasting time a month. Both churches have taken advantage of the monthly broadcasts to comment on social and political issues. In 1988 the Government issued a new, 25-year broadcasting license to the Far East Broadcasting Association (FEBA), a radio missionary organization which has broadcast the Christian gospel to Asia and Africa from Seychelles for the past 18 years.

Foreign broadcasts are widely listened to and are uncensored. However, the Government has increased its range of available controls over broadcasts and telecommunications originating in Seychelles through the Broadcasting and Telecommunications Act of 1988. This Act authorizes the Government to restrict the transmission of messages, to prohibit the broadcast of any material which in the Government's opinion is objectionable, and to permit the entry of government officials onto any premises and to examine any apparatus in connection with provisions of the Act.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

While there were no incidents in 1989, the Government has in the past been quick to move against unauthorized demonstrations and has made arrests under an old British colonial law which prohibits unlawful assembly without a government permit. All associations, clubs, and other organizations require government permission to organize, which is usually granted for nonpolitical groups only.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no religious persecution in Seychelles, and church services are widely attended. The Roman Catholic, Anglican, and other Christian denominations thrive, and Muslims and Hindus are unrestricted in their religious practices.

There is a clear separation between church and state, and religious instruction in public schools has been limited. Responding to religious institutions' complaints, the Government now permits children (ages 14-17) in the National Youth Service (NYS) to attend church by allowing services to be held at the NYS camps.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on internal travel. Passports may be acquired by any citizen, although Seychellois traveling abroad for study at government expense are required to sign a bond which enables the Government to recoup the cost of their education if they fail to return. Persons who are "bonded" must obtain government permission to travel abroad following their return. There are no known cases in which passports are currently being withheld. There are no restrictions on voluntary repatriation for Seychellois willing to accept the present one-party political system, though it is widely assumed that former President James Mancham and certain former members of his government will not be permitted to return to Seychelles.

SEYCHELLES

Since 1979 there has been only one legal political party, the Seychelles People's Progressive Front (SPPF). Citizens cannot legally and peacefully change this one-party system, and therefore cannot change the party in power. President France Albert Rene, both as President of the country as well as the Secretary General of the party, wields considerable power and influence. During the last SPPF Congress held in December 1987, the President was again unopposed and was elected unanimously to a fourth 3-year term as Secretary General of the Party. Opponents of the party can neither organize nor express public opposition. The party has 23 regional offices called "branches," which are responsible for organizing and supervising discussion about current government policies. The party encourages these branches to report public opinion in their regions, but this does not often result in policy changes.

The Government uses various means to stifle political opposition. In June 1983, it embarked on a campaign to nationalize private land, ostensibly to claim unused agricultural acreage. On March 13, 1987, the Government implemented a vigorous program of acquiring many parcels of Seychelles real estate owned by Seychellois abroad known to oppose the Government. The acquisitions are made under the Land Acquisition Act of 1977. Compensation, supposedly at market value, is usually in the form of bonds and paid to the owners over a period of 20 years. Under the law, it is impossible to challenge the acquisition itself--it is only the amount of compensation which can be appealed in court. Acquisitions continued at a high rate during 1989, not only of properties belonging to nonresident Seychellois, but also of properties belonging to foreign nationals, including one American citizen, and of resident Seychellois not known to oppose the Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Requests for information are sent to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who acts as an interlocutor between human rights groups, such as Amnesty International, and the Government. In the past, inquiries have led to the release of some detainees. However, the Government has not been responsive to a report of the U.N. Human Rights Commission concerning three outstanding disappearance cases dating back to 1977 and 1984. There are no private human rights groups in Seychelles.

There is no discrimination in housing, employment, education, or other social services based on sex or on racial, ethnic, national, or religious identification. Women enjoy high status in this essentially matriarchal society. They have the same legal, political, economic, and social rights as men.

Violence against women, particularly wife beating, does occur in Seychelles, but, according to medical personnel, it is not widespread and is not tolerated by the Government or the courts. Under Section 31 of Seychelles Criminal Procedure

Code, a private civil complaint may be brought before a magistrate, free of charge, to impose a bond "to keep the peace" of up to approximately $200 against someone using or threatening violence against another. This provision in the Code is used by women against their harassers, and it is quite effective. Married women can easily obtain exclusion orders against abusive husbands and frequently do. On the criminal side, violence against women is prosecuted as assault cases to the full extent of the law, including spouses if that is the case. Police have no hesitation in intervening in domestic disputes where violence has occurred or is threatened.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers do not have the right to form or join unions of their own choosing in Seychelles, nor are they independent of the Government or the ruling party. All workers (except for some temporary workers) belong to the National Workers Union (NWU) by virtue of the fact that a percentage of their social security contributions is given to the NWU. The SPPF controls the NWU's funds and appoints its leaders. Workers and their leaders have no legal right to strike or initiate any industrial action except with the permission from the SPPF Central Committee. There were no strikes in 1989. In August 1989 party Deputy Secretary General James Michel said that the SPPF viewed the NWU as a "transmission belt which links the party with the working people."

Workers are permitted to elect their shop stewards (also called Works Committee Members), but all candidates are screened by the NWU Executive Secretariat, which has the power to dismiss an elected shop steward.

The Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) expressed again in 1989, as in previous years, its concern over the Government's unwillingness to implement ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, which Seychelles has ratified. The NWU's only international affiliation is with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, but it maintains close relations with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. While not prohibiting the NWU or the Employers' Federation from participating in regional ILO conferences, the Government does not encourage participation in the annual ILO conference in Geneva, which occurs at the same time as national "liberation" (coup anniversary) celebrations in Seychelles.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

In the one-party, one-trade union confederation structure, there are serious limitations on worker rights to organize. The NWU constitution does protect union members "from victimization in the carrying out of legitimate trade union activity" and requires its executive board to investigate shop steward dismissals so as to verify that the dismissal is not based on union-related activities. In the event of a disagreement between the NWU and a company over a shop steward's dismissal, the party would make the final determination.

Free collective bargaining generally is not practiced in Seychelles. The Government has the right to review and approve all collective agreements from the private and public sectors. Authority for establishing and enforcing employment terms, conditions, and benefits is vested in the Ministry of Employment and Social Services by the Employment Act of 1985, Seychelles' basic labor law. While revision of the 1985 Employment Act is expected soon, no modification of the Government's dominant role in setting terms and conditions of employment is expected.

There are no export processing zones in Seychelles, and labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and does not exist in practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 15. Children are required to attend school until the age of 15. The Government encourages children to attend 2 years of National Youth Service (NYS) before entering the work force at the age of 18 or going to the polytechnic for vocational training, and it discourages public or private sector employment of workers under 18 years old. The Government offers voluntary short-term (up to 6 months) work employment programs for school leavers not participating in the NYS. Children in these programs receive a training salary which is below the minimum wage. The Government effectively enforces its child labor laws through regular inspections by the Ministry of Employment and Social Affairs (see below).

Seychelles has a complicated minimum wage scale which depends upon job classifications. The legislated minimum wages range from over $190 per month for an unskilled laborer to over $1,000 per month for a high-level civil servant. Given the free public services that are available, primarily in the areas of health and education, a single salary at the low end of the pay scale does provide a family with a decent, if Spartan, standard of living. Many families deal with Seychelles' high cost of living through two or more incomes. The Ministry of Employment and Social Affairs has responsibility for enforcing minimum wage regulations. Due to a labor shortage, the de facto minimum wage is considerably higher than what is legally required. It is unlikely that anyone would accept less than the minimum wage, and the Ministry counts on the workers themselves to complain should a prospective employer make such an offer.

The maximum workweek is 48 hours (or 9 hours per day). Included in this is a mandatory half-hour's break per day. All full-time workers are legally entitled to a minimum of 21 days of paid annual leave per year. Workers are permitted to work overtime up to 12 hours a day. These ceilings are enforced by the Government, though it is possible that some occasional abuses do occur. Under the 1978 Occupational Safety and Health Decree, the Ministry of Employment and Social Affairs is responsible for enforcing the Government's rigorous occupational safety and health standards. In March 1989, the decree was amended to cover government workplaces. These standards are rigorously enforced by inspectors who make regular workplace visits. In 1989 there were 1 work-related fatality and 40 work-related injuries in Seychelles.

SIERRA LEONE

Sierra Leone has a one-party system of government with the President, Major-General Dr. Joseph Saidu Momoh, exercising predominant executive authority. The 1978 Constitution established the All People's Congress (APC) as the country's sole legal political party. The unicameral Parliament is subservient to the party and is largely an advisory body.

The security structure includes the Defense Force (between 1,500 and 2,000 men), the regular police (3,000 to 5,000), and a paramilitary branch of the police, the Special Security Division (1,000 to 1,500). The Defense Force is responsible for preventing external aggression and wide-scale civil disturbances. The police are responsible for law and order and internal security. The Special Security Division's role is not well defined, but, under the previous regime, was used to enforce the political decisions of the President.

About 70 percent of Sierra Leone's 3.9 million population is engaged in agriculture, mainly subsistence farming. The Constitution recognizes a person's right to own private property, but the Government controls mineral exports. For many years the economy has been in a steady decline, in part due to falling world diamond prices and to reduced rice production. Mineral exports, notably titanium ore, gold, and diamonds, are the principal sources of foreign exchange. In 1989 the Government introduced new measures designed to improve control over the mining sector, e.g., it reintroduced gold and diamond licenses and required exporters to deposit 60 percent of their proceeds in foreign currency to the central bank.

Human rights remained significantly circumscribed in 1989. Principal human rights concerns were mistreatment of detainees and harsh and degrading prison conditions; arbitrary and excessively long detentions; restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, and the right of citizens to change their government; and de facto discrimination and violence against women. Favorable developments included the lifting of a 1987 state of economic emergency that had augmented government power to detain and control people's movements and initial government efforts to improve prison conditions. In addition, observers generally agreed that correct judicial procedures had been followed in the State's handling of the controversial treason case of former vice president, Francis M. Minah and 11 others.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Harsh physical treatment of suspected criminals, especially by police during interrogation, is common. In recent years, attention has been focused on prison administration and harsh conditions. Amnesty International (AI) has in particular called attention to reports of deaths in prisons, such as Pademba Road Prison in Freetown. In September 1987, the President appointed a special Commission of Inquiry to investigate prison conditions, including persistent reports of harsh conditions and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment of prisoners. The Commission completed its inquiry in 1989, but the Government had not made its findings publicly available by year's end. Nevertheless, according to reliable reports, the Commission found a number of specific cruel practices, including the stealing of food from prisoners. The Government reportedly levied severe fines against the responsible officials and initiated steps to improve conditions, including, according to former prisoners, sparse, but adequate food supplies. Prisons remained, however, seriously overcrowded.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Judicial review of arrests is part of Sierra Leone's common law, but even under normal circumstances, detainees may be held for 28 days before being charged with an offense. There are reports, however, that judicial review, including the 28-day limit, is not always observed. Attorneys and others have often alleged that police, to harass or to exact personal gain, sometimes detain persons without charge or judicial review and that those too poor to hire a lawyer are often held for years without trial, particularly when the accuser has paid law enforcement or judicial officials to violate the law.

Under the Constitution, the President may take measures to detain any person who is, or is reasonably suspected of being, dangerous to the security of the Republic. The now expired economic emergency law extended the definition of "dangerous" to include a range of "economic" activities. During a state of emergency, the Public Emergency Act comes into effect, and persons detained under its provisions can be held indefinitely and are not guaranteed a hearing unless charged with a capital offense.

There were no known political detainees or prisoners being held at the end of 1989.

Exile as a political weapon is not practiced in Sierra Leone. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Sierra Leone's judicial system is composed of the Supreme Court, an intermediate Court of Appeals, a High Court of Justice, and magistrates' courts. Judges are appointed by the President. Local courts, presided over by indigenous ethnic leaders, administer customary law and are especially important in the rural areas.

The judiciary has generally maintained its independence, although some critics charge that the legal system can be subject to political manipulation, often before cases reach the courts, and that it has also been penetrated by corruption, particularly at the lower levels. Defendants are allowed counsel of their choice, but many cannot afford them. Public defenders are provided only in capital offense cases. Convictions may be appealed; the appeal courts generally have a reputation of being less susceptible to corruption.

SIERRA LEONE

In September the Supreme Court rejected the appeals of the former first Vice President, Francis M. Minah, and 11 others. Minah and the others were convicted of attempting to assassinate the President in a March 1987 coup attempt in which two policemen were killed. The defendants appealed to a clemency board chaired by the first Vice President and then to the President, who upheld the decision to execute six of the defendants. Six others had their sentences commuted to life imprisonment. On October 7, Minah and the five others condemned to death were executed by hanging. The trial was judged by most observers to be procedurally correct and fair.

The 1987 coup case--from arrest to trial to appeal--moved slowly but steadily, but most court cases are not rapidly completed. Sierra Leone's legal system is heavily overburdened and lacks resources, especially in trained personnel. This results in an average delay of 2 years before a case actually comes to trial. Additionally, often the official records of court proceedings are handwritten notes taken by the judges. This practice limits lawyers' access to written documentation and puts in question the impartiality of the official record.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not generally interfere with the rights of privacy and family, and legal safeguards against arbitrary invasion of the home are usually observed. In security cases, however, the Government has the authority to enter homes without a search warrant.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although freedom of speech is legally guaranteed, the Government can abridge this right under the Constitution if the security of the State is considered at issue. Debate in the APC-controlled Parliament is often lively, and some "backbenchers" have gained prominence through their interventions criticizing government policy. In practice, the Government generally tolerates some public criticism by citizens and academics. Harsh direct criticism of the President and other senior officials and of the one-party system is rare. Opposition groups based in Western Europe or the United States occasionally circulate critical materials in Sierra Leone but must do so clandestinely.

There is a lively, privately owned press. Of 12 active newspapers, only 2 are considered government controlled. However, the press is subject to government restrictions. Mindful of latent government power, journalists customarily exercise self-censorship and avoid publishing articles personally attacking the Head of State. The Newspaper Registration Act of 1983 in particular gives the Government extensive authority over the press. It specifies qualification standards for editors and sets a fee for registration of newspapers. That Act was used for the first time in late April when five newspapers were closed for failing to register. There were allegations that the closings were in fact due to criticisms in the newspapers of the Minister of Information. The Government denied the charges and allowed the newspapers to resume publication by late May. In a subsequent speech, the President strongly defended the right of a free press without qualification, but there was no indication by year's end that the parameters of acceptable press commentary had been widened appreciably.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and permits the formation of trade unions and other economic, social, or professional associations. These rights, however, are limited in practice, most significantly in the political sphere. Permits must be obtained from the police for public meetings and demonstrations, and in general public demonstrations are not allowed. The Government banned in 1987 a once active student union at the principal university and continued the ban in 1989 despite student requests to rescind it. Groups of citizens can and do make orderly representations to the Government on policy issues and are not subject to reprisals.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

A tradition of religious tolerance is practiced in Sierra Leone. Muslims, the largest religious group, Christians, adherents of other faiths, and animists practice their beliefs freely and publish and distribute religious documents without government interference. The hajj is an annual occurrence in which a wide cross section of Sierra Leoneans participate; it is partially subsidized by the Government. Employment within the civil service and appointments at high political levels do not appear to be religiously biased. There appears to be no favored religion under the country's one-party system. President Momoh, who is Christian, has Muslims as his chief adviser, Foreign Minister, and Chief of the Armed Forces.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The only official control on travel within the country has been in the diamond-mining areas where restrictions are intended to control smuggling. There are no official regulations restricting foreign travel, but government-decreed limitations on the amount of foreign exchange a person may take out of the country could have this effect if enforced, which generally is not the case.

Sierra Leone, a party to the U.N. Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, is host to approximately 100 refugees. A number of Namibian refugees were voluntarily repatriated in early 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right to change the government through democratic means. The Constitution proclaims Sierra Leone a one-party state (the All People's Congress or APC), and no other parties are legally permitted. Since independence in 1961, the clear trend in political development has been to increase executive power and decrease constitutional checks on that power.

Parliament has 116 seats: 97 popularly elected, 12 paramount chiefs elected by traditional councils, and 7 members appointed by the President. Candidates for Parliament, which is largely an advisory body, are chosen in each constituency by the party's local executive committee, which may select up to five candidates from a list of multiple party candidates. However, the Central Committee of the APC can override the nomination of any candidate if it chooses to do so. Parliamentary elections are held every 5 years by universal adult suffrage. Party leaders contend that dissent and strong challenges exist within the single party and that local party members have some influence in the designation of parliamentary candidates.

In addition to the national political system, a traditional system of local government operates in the provinces. Paramount chiefs are elected for life by the members of the local Chiefdom Councils, and they wield considerable authority in local affairs and in resolving local civil disputes.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government generally has taken a positive attitude toward international and nongovernmental groups involved in monitoring human rights violations. In response to the 1987 AI report, President Momoh convened a special Commission of Inquiry to investigate possible human rights violations in the prisons. Additionally, an AI representative attended part of the 1987 treason trial.

The Government has not interfered with the activities of the Sierra Leone Bar Association's Society for the Preservation of Human Rights. This active human rights group, founded in 1985, is supported by a wide cross section of educated citizens. The Society won its first major court case in 1986, obtaining the acquittal of persons arrested for demonstrating peacefully. Since then the Society has obtained the release of several persons who were detained without judicial review.

There is no officially sanctioned discrimination on the basis of sex, religion, language, or social status. Although allegations have been made of favoritism in political appointments and the military based on ethnic origin, ethnic participation in public and private service appears to be broadly based and well-integrated. However, citizens of non-African descent do face political restrictions, e.g., citizens of Lebanese origin may hold Sierra Leonean passports but cannot hold membership in the APC.

Women in Sierra Leone are guaranteed equal rights by the Constitution, but their status varies widely in different parts of the country and depends heavily upon the cultural values and traditions of their ethnic group. These values affect women's access to education. In most rural areas, women are farmers.

Violence against women, especially wife beating, is widespread and is accepted among the more traditional elements of society. The police are unlikely to intervene except in cases of severe injury or death. The Government has never addressed this issue specifically. Few cases of violence against women ever come to the courts. Female genital mutilation (circumcision) is widely practiced and is allowed by law.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of association is provided for in the Constitution and workers have the right to join trade unions of their own choosing. Unions are independent of the ruling APC party, but they must join the single trade union confederation, the Sierra Leone Labor Congress (SLLC). Under the Trade Union Act any five persons can form a trade union by applying to the Registrar of Trade Unions which has statutory powers under the Act. If the Registrar rejects an application, the applicants can appeal against the decision in the ordinary courts. Since wage negotiation is industry-wide, the Sierra Leone Labor Congress is endeavoring to organize unions according to industry and not the trade of workers. At present, there can be as many as six trade unions in one industry. In recent years, the unions have organized more workers, especially among lower wage earners. They have been less successful in organizing workers in the agricultural and mining sectors. Approximately 60 percent of the working population in urban areas is now unionized.

Unions have the right to strike in Sierra Leone. During 1989 workers staged several strikes, mainly against the Government to protest salary problems. In the case of striking hospital workers and teachers, the Government eventually paid overdue salaries.

Sierra Leone has ratified the International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize. Unions maintain affiliation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. There are no legal restrictions on regional, national, or international affiliation or on international travel and contacts.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The law prohibits any discrimination against union members. Complaints of discrimination against unions are made to the Industrial Court for Arbitration. Individual trade unions investigate alleged violations of work conditions and ensure that employers take necessary steps to correct abuses. In 1989 one issue between unions and employers concerned the use of temporary workers but the SLLC did not make a formal complaint.

The legal framework for collective bargaining is the Regulation of Wages and Industrial Relations Act. Collective bargaining must take place in trade group negotiating councils each of which is comprised of an equal number of employees and workers representatives. Most enterprises are covered by collective bargaining agreements on wage and working conditions. The SLLC provides assistance to unions in negotiation preparation. It is basically a bilateral negotiation, and the Government only intervenes in case of a deadlock.

Labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country.

SIERRA LEONE

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and is not practiced. Since 1964 the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) has asked the Government to repeal or amend a section of the Chiefdom Councils Act under which compulsory labor may be imposed. The Government has indicated that the pertinent section of the Act is not enforceable, but it has not yet replied to COE requests for an official declaration to that effect.

The minimum age for employment of children is officially 18 years, but in practice, there is no minimum age. In the interior of the country, children at early ages work seasonally on subsistence family farms. Because the adult unemployment rate is as high as 60 percent, there are few children involved in the industrial sector. However, children often engage in street trading, and some children work with small fishing groups.

Currently, there is no legislated minimum wage. In 1987 the Constance Davis Commission recommended the establishment of a minimum wage and social security program, but to date, the Government has not passed implementing legislation. The standard legal workweek is 38 hours (8 hours on Monday through Thursday and 6 hours on Friday). There is no limit on overtime. The rate of overtime pay for public holidays is 2.5 times the basic rate. For other days the overtime rate is double the normal rate of pay.

Within the Ministry of Labor there is a moribund Health and Safety Division. Health and safety regulations are included in collective bargaining agreements negotiated by the trade unions. However, there is no evidence of systemic enforcement of these safety standards. Trade unions provide the only protection for workers who file complaints about hazardous working conditions. Initially, the unions make a formal complaint to the Ministry of Labor. When this fails, the unions can issue a 21 day strike notice. As a last resort the unions can strike to achieve their demands.

SOMALIA

Somalia is a one-party state ruled since 1969 by President Mohamed Siad Barre. He presides over the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party (SRSP), the sole legal political party, and the Government through the presidentially appointed Council of Ministers. The President's clan, the Marehan, holds key positions, e.g., the President's eldest son, Abdurahman Mohamed Siad "Maslah", is Commander of the Armed Forces. A National People's Assembly, last elected on a single slate in 1984, is subordinate to the executive. Civil conflict continued during 1989, with an outbreak of rioting in the capital, Mogadishu, followed by official reprisals. Troops mutinied in the southern, central, and northern regions, and political ferment intensified.

The Somali Armed Forces (SAF) number over 35,000 troops. Internal security responsibilities, including for coping with the civil conflict, are shared by the National Army, the military police (MP), the Defense Intelligence Security Agency ("Hangaash"), the National Police, and the National Security Service (NSS). During 1989 army combat units and military police resorted to attacks on civilian villages, roundups, and summary executions as means of combating the antiregime Somali National Movement (SNM), other dissident groups, and rioters. Reformist groups made efforts during 1989 to curb the security services' arbitrary powers of detention, but were only partially successful.

Clans continued their age-old competition for waterholes and grazing lands, and at the national level the governing elite, based on the Marehan subclan, struggled with other clans for control of the country's few resources. Most of Somalia's estimated 8 million people manage a bare subsistence as herdsmen or farmers. The modern sector of the agricultural economy consists mainly of banana plantations located in the south. The chief exports are livestock and bananas. Mogadishu now has a population exceeding 1.5 million, many of whom are unemployed migrants from the countryside. Increasingly straitened conditions in the capital contributed to an increase in crime and to the potential for civil disorder, while life in the north has been severely disrupted by the civil conflict.

Despite some limited progress in the first half of the year, human rights in Somalia suffered sharp setbacks during 1989. A State Department-sponsored study (the Gersony report) documented massive human rights violations, committed by both government and, to a lesser extent, SNM forces in the 1988-89 fighting; the SAF murdered at least 5,000 unarmed civilians between May 1988 and March 1989. In the first half of 1989, the Government did release most political prisoners, including those whose cases had been publicized in the West, and strengthened the constitutional prohibition against arbitrary detention. However, on July 9, an unknown gunman shot and killed the Roman Catholic Bishop of Mogadishu. The Government detained for investigation several prominent Islamic leaders and other critics. On July 14, rioting broke out in Mogadishu as a result of the detentions, and several police officers were killed. The police and MP's responded to the killings by firing on the crowds. At least 100 people were killed and hundreds more injured in fighting throughout the city. (One human rights group claims 450 were killed.) On subsequent days and nights military units detained about 2,000 people, searched and looted houses, assaulted and sometimes shot people in their homes, and summarily executed at least 46 young men, mainly Isaaks, at a nearby beach. In response to the growing political discontent, the President announced that multiple political parties would be allowed to organize and to contest elections to a new People's Assembly within 16 months. He offered to negotiate with dissident organizations, but his initial attempts had been rebuffed at year's end.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

During 1989 extrajudicial killing was employed as a method of warfare in Somalia's civil conflict. Government forces were the worst though not the only offenders. While some incidents could be attributed to poor leadership and training, the pattern of raids on civilian villages, reprisal killings, and summary executions suggested that extrajudicial killing had official sanction (see Section 1.g., for details). Following the extensive July disorders and killings, the President formed an investigating committee, but at the end of 1989 the committee had not released its findings, and the Government had not brought those responsible to justice. There have been persistent reports that the perpetrators were members of the Marehan subclan (Rer Koshin) to which the President and his family belong.

b. Disappearance

Disappearances continued to occur in Somalia during 1989. They were hard to distinguish from arbitrary arrests and detentions (see Section 1.d.) and extrajudicial killings, because these are not acknowledged by the authorities. For example, an interpreter employed by the U.S. Office of Military Cooperation has been missing since July 17 and is presumed to have been among the victims of the shootings at the beach.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden by Article 27 of the Constitution. Senior government officials repeatedly deny that it is practiced as a government policy and, in fact, instances of torture appeared to decrease in response to a governmental reform effort and international pressure. Some recently released short-term detainees complained, however, that they were subjected to forms of torture such as the "Mig," in which their hands and feet were tied together behind their backs with a rope, which was pulled tight so that the body was arched backwards, to resemble the swept-back wings of a Mig aircraft. The Canadian Centre for Victims of Torture continued to report seeing torture victims from Somalia.

Harsh prison conditions do not provide sanitation, adequate water, or medical care. Prisoners receive the absolute minimum of food necessary for survival because it is customary for food to be supplied from outside by their families. Amnesty International (AI) stated that the conditions at the maximum security prisons of Lanta Bur and Labatan Jirow, where political prisoners are often held incommunicado, were particularly life-threatening.

SOMALIA

Mistreatment of detainees sometimes results from negligence. In October, for example, at least 11 youths died of suffocation and dozens of others were hospitalized after police locked them in a steel shipping container. The authorities arrested the police official allegedly responsible for this incident.

Although Article 26 of the Constitution accords citizens the right to be formally charged and to receive a speedy trial, the Criminal Code was modified in 1970 to exempt crimes involving national security from time limits and rules of procedure. The Government has repeatedly shown an exceptionally broad interpretation of what constitutes national security and has used its powers in an arbitrary manner to detain, often incommunicado, suspected political opponents or critics. In the first half of 1989, in response to growing criticism of such abuses, the Government revised Article 26 of the Constitution to limit arbitrary detention. As a result, the security services in the early months of 1989 detained fewer persons and usually released them if evidence against them was lacking. (Normally, the National Security Court--see Section 1.e.--gives investigators a fixed time limit, with necessary extensions, to complete an investigation.)

Following the disturbances in July, however, mass detentions were resumed under a presidential decree (as provided for in Articles 82 and 83 of the Constitution) imposing emergency rule throughout the country. Many detentions seemed to have only an incidental investigative purpose, the main aim being to frighten possible opponents of the regime and silence criticism. Most of the detainees were released after a few weeks in military camps.

Prominent Somalis arrested in the investigation of the Bishop's assassination in July included the lawyer Dr. Ismail Jimale Ossoble, chief counsel for the defense in the February 1988 national security trial; Abdulkadir Aden Abdulle Osman, son of Somalia's first president; Sheikh Abdirahman Sheikh Ali Sufi, a senior religious leader; and three other imams. Dr. Jimale Ossoble and Mr. Osman were released in October 1989. The sheiks remained in detention at the end of the year. Also under detention were former cabinet ministers Aden Nur and Ba'adleh, who were arrested in July.

The number of detainees is difficult to estimate because the Government does not disclose such information, detainees are often held incommunicado, and at least 9 entities (National Police, NSS, Hangaash, military police, SRSP, the militia, the Custodial Corps, regional governors, and district commissioners) have the power to detain. The number probably fluctuated considerably during 1989, as the Government first released most detainees, then arrested about 2,000 people in July, and then released most of them after a few weeks. In conjunction with the October 21 national day celebrations, the President amnestied over 1,160 detainees and prisoners. Most of these detainees had been held on criminal charges, but some may have been detained for minor political offenses such as making "tribalistic" remarks.

The Somali security forces also practice the taking of hostages in interclan conflicts. In disputes between rival clans, the Government may order the arrest of senior members of both clans in order to compel an end to the violence. The most recent example of this practice occurred in June when a minority Darod clan began attacking members of the Hawiya clan in and around Mogadishu. The Government arrested members of both clans and dictated peace terms between the parties; when peace was assured the hostages were released.

The Government does not practice exile as a means of political control. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Somali judicial system includes civil and criminal courts, and a separate National Security Court. Lawyers are permitted to represent suspects before the National Security Court, but proceedings are usually held in camera. Although nominally independent, the judiciary is in fact not distinguishable from the executive, which reviews and controls judicial decisions. All judges in the Supreme Court and lower courts are appointed by the President with the advice of the higher judicial council, of which the President is chairman. Judges of the National Security Court generally are military officers posted to the Court.

Law No. 54 of 1970 provides the death penalty for political offenses "against national security," defined as behavior "which may be considered prejudicial to the maintenance of peace, order and good government." Among the 20 offenses punishable by death are "organizing a subversive association" (Article 3), "exploiting religion for creating national disunity" (Article 12), and "publishing antistate propaganda" (Article 18).

In the civil and criminal courts, legal assistance is provided, and there are established rules of evidence. There are no religious courts in Somalia. In civil proceedings relating to family matters, such as marriage and inheritance, the judge may cite prevailing Islamic Shari'a law in rendering decisions. The right to appeal exists in criminal and civil cases but not in cases heard by the National Security Court. For persons convicted by the National Security Court, the only avenue for clemency is through the Politburo of the SRSP.

Only one trial before the National Security Court received publicity in 1989. This was the November conviction and sentencing to death of five persons accused of embezzling funds from the Commercial and Savings Bank. These were the first death sentences announced in Somalia in over a year. It appeared that some of those convicted were still at large. At year's end none of the death sentences had been carried out. By midyear most political prisoners had been released. Most of the thousands of persons detained in July were also released. Few if any detainees were tried and convicted of political offenses.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the umbrella of the National Security Act, the security forces routinely search the homes of citizens for weapons and printed material critical of the Government. These searches are carried out without a warrant or the consent of the searched. No probable cause is required (see Section 1.g.). The telephone conversations and mail of suspected persons are monitored, and anyone in the country suspected of political activity is subject to surveillance.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

About 500,000 people fled the outbreak of fighting in northern Somalia in 1988. A U.S. Government-sponsored 1989 study (the Gersony Report), based on 300 interviews with displaced persons and refugees (many of them eyewitnesses to killings), "conservatively estimated that at least 5,000 unarmed civilians were purposefully murdered by the SAF between May 1988 and March 1989," when the civilians no longer represented a threat to the Somali Armed Forces (SAF) forces. The study also found that the SNM combatants killed hundreds of unarmed civilians in similar indiscriminate fashion. Further, the study found that both sides systematically engaged in grave violations of the internationally protected status of Ethiopian refugees in the refugee camps administered by the United Nations in the area. The Government forcibly conscripted Ethiopian refugees from the camps into the SAF after May 1988. The SNM conducted systematic violent attacks against these camps, killing 400 or more refugees in the process (see also Section 2.d.).

Some of these abuses, apparently sanctioned by the opposing leaderships, were consistent with traditional patterns of clan warfare in an arid land. One of the basic tactics of Somali army forces, for example, was to control the waterholes and deny their use to the SNM. The SNM similarly prevented the Government from repairing the pumping station which once supplied water to Hargeisa. When combating rebels, mutineers, and bandits in the central regions of the country, Somali troops took reprisals against certain villages by driving off livestock and burning houses.

Documented incidents included:

SNM members of the Isaak clan, in fighting around the northern town of Erigavo in March, killed a number of unresisting civilians. Progovernment militias then drove the SNM out of Erigavo and killed about 200 Isaak civilian inhabitants of the town.

Marehan soldiers carried out reprisal killings of about 30 Isaak civilians after a landmine explosion on the Burao-Berbera road in May.

Reacting to rioting in Mogadishu on July 14, military police fired into crowds, killing bystanders as well as rioters. Some innocent persons were killed in their homes by stray rounds. During searches of Mogadishu neighborhoods on subsequent nights, security forces looted houses and assaulted--and occasionally shot--their inhabitants.

In retaliation for the killing of some of their comrades in the July 14 riots, members of the Armed Forces abducted 47 Somali men, took them to an isolated section of beach, and shot them. Reports from witnesses and one survivor indicate that the targets of this execution were members of the Isaak clan, randomly selected and identified by their accents.

In late September, when government forces attacked rebels of the Ogadeni clan near the Kenyan border, troops overran the village of Dobli and killed many of the inhabitants.

SOMALIA

In November, when government forces attacked several villages near Galkayo in central Somalia in reprisal for a mutiny there, troops reportedly killed a number of civilians outside of immediate combat zones.

There have been other unverified reports of summary executions of rebels in the northern and southwestern regions of the country and of massacres committed by SNM fighters against non-Isaak villages in the north.

The situation remained volatile at the end of 1989. According to the Gersony report, the Government has armed clan-based civilian militias which are not under the effective command of either the SAF or clan elders. These militias were an additional element of continuing instability and lawlessness. Information is lacking on the fate of prisoners taken in Somalia's civil conflict. In general, it seemed that few prisoners were taken. Rebel forces welcomed deserters from government ranks.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Constitution, that right continued to be severely abridged in practice. NSS informants frequented public places listening for expressions of antigovernment sentiment; persons were sometimes held responsible for opinions expressed in personal conversations as well as in public forums.

The Government continued to own and operate the radio and television as well as the country's six newspapers. No publications other than those authorized by the Government were legally distributed, and possession of unauthorized newspapers and journals has brought prison sentences of from 5 to 15 years. All printed, taped, and filmed material entering Somalia must be approved by the National Censorship Board. The material is checked for "obscene" as well as politically objectionable content. Academic freedom was not permitted; a Somali law professor with an evident interest in the local human rights situation was detained for several months in 1988 and 1989.

Information on the situation in Somalia was difficult to obtain because throughout the first half of 1989 the Government refused to issue visas to foreign journalists. Several European journalists were permitted to enter the country in the latter part of 1989. An American journalist arrived in Mogadishu in December for a 1-week visit.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although politics is a common topic at informal gatherings of Somalis, and although Article 24 of the Constitution guarantees the right to participate in or organize an assembly or demonstration, in practice the Government only permitted meetings which it sponsored to advance government purposes. Political protest meetings were not permitted.

Freedom of association, though not specifically mentioned, is implicitly provided for in the Constitution, which entitles every citizen to participate fully in political, economic, social, and cultural activities. In practice, however, there was no freedom of association in Somalia in 1989. Having a business relationship with a person under suspicion was enough to attract the attention of the security services. In March a restaurant owner was detained by the NSS when his restaurant was host to a party for former political prisoners. The only organizations allowed to exist are those approved by the Government and the SRSP.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

Islam is the state religion and nearly 100 percent of the population is Muslim, predominantly of the Sunni sect. The Constitution states, however, that every person shall be entitled to profess any religion or creed. In practice this means that members of religions other than Islam may practice their faiths but may not proselytize. Mogadishu has a Roman Catholic community numbering about 2,000, which was established during the period of Italian colonial rule. Both Protestant and Catholic houses of worship operate openly. No other religious group has significant representation in Somalia. Christian charitable organizations operate in Somalia but confine their activities to technical assistance.

There is no evidence that the July 9 killing of the Catholic Bishop of Mogadishu was religiously motivated. Nevertheless, the assassination inflamed Muslim-Christian relations. Tension between the communities increased in the first half of 1989, as a revivalist spirit spread within the Muslim community, and some imams accused Christians of proselytizing. During the July disturbances in Mogadishu, there was some violence against Protestant medical missionaries and other persons perceived to be Christians.

Many in the Muslim community attribute Somalia's difficulties to lax observance of Islam. Such views, in addition to raising popular anxiety over Christian proselytizing, also tend to set the Islamic community in opposition to the Government, which has secular roots and a long history of antagonism toward religious leaders. The Government is sensitive to this trend, because it threatens to unite disparate opposition groups under the banner of Islam. Therefore, since 1985 the Government has licensed all mosques and Koranic schools, and since 1986 it has approved all imams and paid them a salary. Tensions between the Government and the Islamic community came to the fore in July, following the Catholic Bishop's assassination. In the investigation of that crime, security forces detained several outspoken imams. These acts provoked more antigovernment criticism within the mosques. The police, alerted to expect trouble on Friday, July 14, ringed the mosques, entered some, attempted to prevent antigovernment sermons, and tried to arrest additional imams. Widespread rioting and many deaths ensued.

Ethiopian Christian refugees sometimes claim that they face persecution in Somalia, but apparently that persecution is based more on nationality than religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Police and military checkpoints control travel between towns, in border areas, and in areas of interclan violence. There is, however, no requirement to report residence to the police or other government authority. Many Somalis are nomads, and the nomadic tradition remains strong. Travel within Somalia is a freely practiced right. In general, there are no restrictions on international travel for those who can afford it. Passports are available to all citizens and to ethnic Somalis who reside abroad; they generally are not denied on political grounds.

However, the Government restricted the travel of some former detainees and political prisoners by denying them passports or stopping them at the airport. Former political prisoners Suleiman Nuh Ali and Abdi Ismail Yunis were prevented from attending the Muslim pilgrimage. Their passports were confiscated when they tried to depart Somalia at Mogadishu airport. At the end of 1989 their passports had not been returned.

Somalis who have emigrated are generally permitted to return; in 1989 President Siad repeatedly promised amnesty to antigovernment Somalis returning from foreign countries. Nevertheless, based on the experience of previous years, some Somalis remained abroad because they feared possible imprisonment for opposition activity if they returned.

There have been massive displacements of persons as a result of the civil conflict. Many persons have fled to Mogadishu where the population has swollen to over 1.5 million. The Isaak population of northern Somalia has been driven into remote rural areas, and many hundreds of thousands are living in exile in Ethiopia and Djibouti, and fewer in Kenya. Within Hargeisa, about 90 percent of the Isaak homes, businesses, and property have been destroyed or severely damaged. The economic life of northern Somalia has been profoundly disrupted. At the end of 1989, the best estimates indicated that there were 324,000 displaced persons and refugees from Somalia (mainly Isaaks) in Ethiopia and 30,000 in Djibouti.

The Government reports that there are 837,000 Ethiopian refugees in Somalia, but outside observers, including from the United Nations, indicated that about half that number remained in refugee camps at the end of 1989. Conscription of refugees into the Somali army continued in 1989, in violation of international covenants. Spontaneous repatriation of refugees to Ethiopia continued throughout the year, and tripartite negotiations involving Somalia, Ethiopia, and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) made progress on arrangements for officially sponsored voluntary repatriation. In addition to the UNHCR, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) agreed to participate.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens have neither the legal right nor the ability peacefully to change their government or the form of their government. The SRSP is the only legal party; opposition groups and criticism of the Government are illegal. However, in August President Siad Barre announced that multiple political parties would be allowed to contest elections to a new People's Assembly by the end of 1990. In November a committee of lawyers began drafting proposed changes in the Constitution that would remove the SRSP from its leading role in state and society, permit the operation of multiple parties, and allow operation of a free press and other institutions of an open society. At the end of 1989 no practical steps had been taken to implement these proposals. In the present governmental structure, the National People's Assembly has very limited powers.

For many Somalis the traditional clan system is the accepted vehicle of political expression. President Siad Barre and other officials consult frequently with clan elders. Since 1982, however, President Siad has been widely perceived as relying on and furthering the interests of his family and his Marehan subclan by playing off other clans against one another. This reliance on the Marehan accelerated in 1989, as the President appointed his son as head of the Armed Forces, another family member as Chief of Police, and Marehan officers as commanders of most military units.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

During the first half of 1989, the Government showed a willingness to cooperate with international and other human rights organizations. A visit by Amnesty International, proposed by President Siad in 1988, took place from June 24 to July 2. Officials arranged the meetings requested by the two-man delegation, including with former political prisoners, Prime Minister Samantar, and President Siad. However, a week after the AI delegation's departure, the Bishop of Mogadishu was killed and civil unrest and summary executions followed; and AI has not been invited to return.

The Government has continued cooperation with the ICRC, which is now operating an emergency hospital in Berbera and making preparations to aid in refugee repatriation.

Although there are no human rights organizations as such in Somalia, the Association of Somali Lawyers concerns itself with human rights issues.

Because Somalia is racially homogeneous, there is little racial discrimination as such. Animosities and rivalries based on bloodline and clan affiliation, however, are a fundamental problem at the root of the country's continuing civil conflict. Many persons have capitalized on their clan and family affiliations to gain economic advantage or privilege. The clan differences also have a north versus south aspect. Members of the Isaak clan, who form the bulk of SNM supporters, are increasingly discriminated against because most of them are perceived as opponents of the Government. Although not all Isaaks are persecuted, a disproportionate number of political detainees and victims of extrajudicial executions (e.g., almost all of the 46 in Mogadishu in July) were of that clan.

By tradition Somali women suffer discrimination in education, work, and family matters. Female enrollments in school remain far below those for males at all levels of education for traditional and cultural reasons. The payment of dowry and bride wealth are common marriage customs. Divorce laws and practices strongly favor the male partner.

SOMALIA

The Siad Barre Government has historically supported women's rights. In the face of conservative opposition, it rewrote laws to increase women's rights to inherit and own property, made women the legal equals of men, and perhaps most importantly it outlawed female circumcision. The Government's campaign against female circumcision, led by the Somali Women's Democratic Organization of the SRSP, continued to make progress in 1989. Although the practice remained common, especially in rural areas, pharaonic circumcisions (the most extreme and dangerous form of female genital mutilation) became less common.

Domestic violence against women is not a significant social problem in Somalia. There are several interlocking cultural and economic reasons why such practices as wife beating are relatively uncommon. One is that Somalis, being Muslims, do not generally drink alcohol. A second reason is that Somali marriages are contractual, with the wife's relatives prepared to enforce the agreement that she will be treated with dignity. Wife beating carries a stigma which makes it difficult for divorced wife beating males to remarry. Finally economic conditions, which have made it increasingly difficult for men to have more than one or at most two wives, also tend to curtail violence against women. (A veteran police officer, asked whether wife beating was a problem, said that in the days before independence it was common for men to have three or four wives and to treat the less favored of them as beasts of burden, beating the ones who faltered or were lazy. He said that young men of the present generation cannot afford more than one wife, and therefore they are constrained to treat her with respect.)

The civil conflict has, however, had a profoundly negative impact, and it appears that rape by government forces and others has occurred fairly often.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers are not free to form independent unions. There is a single labor confederation, the government-controlled General Federation of Somali Trade Unions (GFSTU), is run by government-appointed officials. The GFSTU's main function is to monitor the work force and provide a conduit for worker grievances. The GFSTU is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions. Somalia has been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since 1960, but has ratified neither ILO Convention 87 regarding freedom of association nor Convention 98 on collective bargaining.

Strikes are outlawed, and organizing a strike is legally punishable by death. Nevertheless, there was a short transportation strike in 1987, and strikes by quarry workers in 1989. The Government took no action against the striking workers.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize does not appear to be infringed by employers. Because the GFSTU speaks for the Government, its dealings with employers on wages, hours, and working conditions tend to resemble binding arbitration rather than collective bargaining. Some negotiation between employers and employees goes on outside the union framework. Given the official status of the GFSTU, antiunion discrimination appears to be a moot question. Labor courts adjudicate employer-employee disputes with relative impartiality. There are no export processing zones in Somalia.

c. Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law, but the Government and party occasionally organize campaigns of "voluntary labor" to clean streets or boost production of state-owned factories.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for the employment of children is 15, and persons under 18 are not permitted to work at night or in certain hazardous occupations. The law imposing the requirements, however, is not effectively implemented, and there is considerable child labor on the margins of the wage economy. Children sell cigarettes on the street, carry bags in the market, and wash and clean cars to support themselves and to supplement family incomes.

Somalia has comprehensive labor legislation setting minimum safety and health standards for the workplace. These are applicable to the small, modern wage sector of an economy that is predominantly pastoral and agricultural and are not normally enforced. In theory the workday is 8 hours per day, 6 days per week, with limits on overtime hours. There is no legal minimum wage. Workers are entitled to paid holidays, annual leave, holiday bonuses, and a variety of fringe benefits. In reality, however, the salary scale is extremely low, especially in the public sector. The average salary of a civil servant is equivalent to about $10 per month and is not adequate to maintain a decent standard of living. Productivity in the public sector is correspondingly low, and many civil servants make only minimal appearances in their offices. Workers resort to second jobs, corruption, assistance from other family members, and remittances from abroad to support themselves and their families.

SOUTH AFRICA

Despite encouraging moves by the South African Government since the September elections, the main legislative pillars of apartheid remained in place in 1989. South Africa's laws codify the doctrine of apartheid, which prescribes the basic rights and obligations of people according to their racial or ethnic origin. The country's black majority (74.7 percent of its population) suffers from pervasive, legally sanctioned discrimination based on race in political, economic, and social aspects of life. The "colored" (mixed race) and Asian minorities (8.7 percent and 2.6 percent of the population, respectively) also suffer from extensive racial discrimination, although to a somewhat lesser degree than South Africa's black population. While the Government claims that South Africa is a parliamentary democracy, whites (14 percent of the population) retain a monopoly of political power. Blacks continue to be denied the right to vote in national elections and to be represented in Parliament. A new Constitution in 1984 replaced the previously all-white Parliament with a tricameral one with separate chambers for whites, "coloreds," and Asians. However, whites retain parliamentary control over key affairs, and the executive branch (headed by a State President with extraordinarily strong powers) remains firmly under white control.

Since 1948 the Afrikaner-dominated National Party, presently led by recently elected State President F.W. De Klerk, has developed the complex legislation and institutions comprising the apartheid system. Central to the policy of separate, racially based political institutions was the creation, beginning in the 1950's, of 10 "homelands" to which blacks were assigned on the basis of ethnic background. These homelands comprise only 13 percent of South Africa's area and are generally fragmented parcels of land in impoverished rural areas. Since 1976 the Government has granted "independence" to four homelands, thereby stripping an estimated 8 million South African blacks of their South African citizenship. South Africa is the only country that has recognized the "independence" of these homelands. Outside the homelands, a growing black urban population of more than 10 million persons lives under apartheid regulations in massive, segregated townships on the periphery of large cities.

In the late 1970's, the South African Government began to introduce piecemeal reforms to ameliorate some aspects of apartheid without threatening continued white control of the nation's key political structures. In 1989 the white electorate again returned the National Party to power (albeit with a distinctly reduced majority due to whites defecting to both the liberal Democratic Party and the Conservative Party) on a platform promising limited reform and dialog with the extraparliamentary opposition.

White control of the Government is backed by a powerful defense and police establishment, especially the South African Defense Force (SADF), with more than 100,000 active duty personnel and nearly 400,000 reservists, and the multiracial South African Police (SAP), with 56,000 members. The SADF has been used to assist the SAP in patrolling the black townships. Through most of the year, the security establishment, including the military, police, and the intelligence services, played a key role in domestic and foreign policymaking through the State Security Council (SSC), a supracabinet body, which includes a small number of

"civilian" ministers and security chiefs. Under the SSC, the National Security Management System (NSMS) performed administrative functions in the townships through joint management centers (JMC's) and undertook extensive intelligence operations through a network of informers. However, in 1989 State President De Klerk announced a major reconstruction of the security system. Under the new system, the JMC's were replaced by bodies which are managed at the local level, with ultimate accountability to the Cabinet. South African security forces are active in the "independent" homelands, and human rights observers believe elements of the SAP continue to give at least tacit support to conservative black vigilante groups, in both the homelands and the townships. The Government extended on June 9 the state of emergency (SOE) for the fourth consecutive year, which greatly increases state power in many areas, including detentions.

South African's economy features a highly developed industrial sector and extensive agricultural and mineral resources. In 1989 gross domestic product growth fell below 2 percent. Sanctions and lack of confidence in South Africa's situation on the part of foreign investors also restrict the potential for economic growth. Since the mid-1970's, black unemployment levels have increased significantly, and per capita income among blacks has stagnated. Local economists estimate that an annual real growth rate above 5 percent is necessary for the economy to absorb the roughly 350,000 black entrants to the labor market each year. An even higher rate of growth would be necessary to reduce present black unemployment, which many private observers estimate at 25 to 30 percent, and as high as 50 percent in the homelands. Despite the high level of black unemployment, more than 211,000 migrant workers from the neighboring southern African states were employed in South African mines in 1988. Apartheid laws discriminate against blacks in housing, employment, and education, serving to perpetuate a gross income disparity between whites and blacks.

While the fundamental, highly restrictive human rights situation in South Africa remained unchanged in 1989, government repression of antiapartheid opposition, including nonviolent peaceful protest, eased after the September election of State President De Klerk. He took a series of positive steps which, although not yet accepting full political participation by blacks, included the release of seven African National Congress (ANC) senior leaders and one Pan African Congress (PAC) leader and movement toward dialog with the ANC. In 1989 contact between the exiled ANC and internal political pressure groups became increasingly common. Unofficial meetings also occurred between the ANC and members of the influential Afrikaner Broederbond. Other positive steps included the President's announcements that beaches were now desegregated and that the Separate Amenities Act would be repealed during the 1990 parliamentary session. The President's December meeting with Nelson Mandela, the most senior imprisoned ANC leader, fueled hopes for Mandela's imminent release. Former State President P. W. Botha also met with Mandela shortly before stepping down.

Inkatha, a black organization with 1.7 million members, the majority of which are Zulu, has a wide agenda of political, social, and economic issues. The Chief Minister of the KwaZulu homeland, Mangosuthu Buthelezi, heads the organization. In early 1980, relations soured between the ANC and Buthelezi's movement over strategy and tactics in the antiapartheid effort.

Black groups continued to resist apartheid in 1989. At the beginning of the year, detainees held under the SOE began a series of nationwide hunger strikes against the questionable reasons for, and unclear duration of, their incarceration. The Government abandoned initial efforts to break their strike and released, with serious restrictions in many cases, approximately 800 detainees between February and April, according to statistics released by the Minister of Law and Order.

In early August the Mass Democratic Movement (MDM)--a coalition made up of leaders from banned antiapartheid organizations such as the United Democratic Front (UDF) and the largest black trade union, the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU), which, like the ANC, subscribe to the Freedom Charter--launched a civil disobedience campaign against restrictions, bannings, and petty apartheid. The protests spread throughout South Africa, as individuals and organizations defied their restrictions and demonstrated against a plethora of other apartheid issues--such as press restrictions and the Labor Relations Act. The National Party Government, facing a difficult September election, responded with increased intimidation and a wave of detentions. Key leaders of the peaceful protest movement especially were targeted. Political tensions exploded on the eve of the September 6 national elections. Police used buckshot and tear gas against black and "colored" youths in the Cape Town area. Archbishop Desmond Tutu and other church leaders blamed the police for the 23 (some reports claim as many as 25) resulting deaths, one of the highest, unrest-related death tolls in a single day in South African history. Police vigorously disputed these charges; the new State President called for an investigation. One of the first steps of the De Klerk administration after September 6 was to allow large-scale demonstrations. On September 14, 30,000-35,000 people marched to protest apartheid and police brutality in Cape Town, with similar rallies occurring later in other major cities.

Violence in South Africa is multifaceted--including by black against black--although overall levels seemed below those of 1988. Factional fighting--which cannot be easily explained in tribal or urban versus rural terms--continued in Natal/KwaZulu on an unprecedented scale between Inkatha and UDF/COSATU groups, claiming 593 deaths in the Durban area and 651 in the Pietermaritzburg area in 1989. Violence in Natal seemed to increase as peace initiatives between the two sides faltered in late 1989.

The specter of vigilante (both white and black) and rightwing terrorism grew in 1989, illustrated by the assassination of prominent human rights activist David Webster on May 1. An extremist white group, calling itself the "Wit Wolwe" (White Wolves), claimed responsibility for a spate of attacks on antiapartheid targets. The conflict between the Government and the ANC, on the other hand, quieted considerably as ANC armed attacks inside South Africa diminished markedly.

The Government has used its emergency powers to arrest more than 32,000 people since June 1986. Prior to the parliamentary elections on September 6, SOE detentions increased sharply from 24 on August 20 to 234 by September 4, and human rights organizations' statistics indicate close to 1,600 persons were arrested for defiance campaign activity between August 1 and September 4. By the end of the year, there were 18 persons detained under the SOE, 24 under the

Internal Security Act (ISA), and an estimated 2,000 to 3,000 serving prison terms for unrest-related offenses.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political violence continued to plague South Africa in 1989. Accurate statistics on the number of deaths related to political violence remained difficult to obtain due to restrictions on reporting unrest incidents. The Government claimed that the level of unrest continued to decline under the SOE. According to the SAP, there had been over 15,000 unrest incidents in the year prior to the proclamation of the first SOE, and about 5,000 a year since the SOE was imposed. Incidents of violence in 1989 remained below 1988 levels. Unrest monitoring groups estimated that at least 846 people died between June 1987 and June 1988, compared to some 695 during the same period a year earlier. Statistics compiled from various media sources indicate 444 died in unrest-related incidents between January and October.

Political violence was worst in Natal. Factional clashes between UDF/COSATU supporters and members of KwaZulu Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi's Inkatha movement continued with an estimated 1,244 people killed in 1989. Total deaths since September 1987 are 2,300 with thousands wounded and thousands of homes burned and damaged. The violence abated towards the middle of the year, but flared again in late 1989 when peace negotiations between the two groups faltered. Tensions in and around Durban townships rose to new levels as the internecine violence which engulfed the area in 1988 became entrenched. The causes of this violence are many, including the power struggle between Inkatha and the UDF/COSATU; desires for personal revenge; attempts to save family and possessions from harm; frustration over inferior schools and other facilities for blacks; and resentment of police, black and white. Outside Natal, townships remained mostly quiet relative to the 1984-86 period, with the notable exception of violence in Cape Town on September 6, election eve.

There was a marked decline during 1989 in bomb attacks throughout South Africa. However, mysterious killings, attacks, and threats against antiapartheid groups and trade unions increased as the specter of vigilante rightwing terrorism grew. On May 1, lawyer/researcher and antiapartheid activist David Webster was assassinated in Johannesburg. The body of the National Council of Trade Unions (NACTU) East Rand leader Bafana Sigasa was found floating in a dam after he was last seen alive on July 19. In August hand grenades caused extensive damage to the home of well-known Soweto poet Mzwakhe Mbuli, narrowly missing his wife and child. In late August, persons suspected to be rightwing vigilantes firebombed vehicles and shot at homes of Pretoria antiapartheid activists during a peaceful church-sponsored desegregation campaign.

There were no reports of incidents of "necklacing" in 1989. (The victim is executed by a burning tire placed around the neck.) In January members of Mrs. Winnie Mandela's informal bodyguard were implicated in the abduction of four youths. One of the four, 14-year old Stompie Moeketsi, was killed, and

Mrs. Mandela personally came under criticism over the incident. Police investigations were continuing at year's end.

Two restricted Natal detainees, Chris Ntuli and Eric Gumedé, were assassinated in April and August 1989, shortly after their release from detention. Like a majority of detained antigovernment activists, they were released with harsh restriction orders which forced them to keep predictable routines and physically remain in stipulated areas, making them easy targets for assault and assassination.

Vigilantes, especially in Natal, seem to operate with impunity or tacit official sanction. According to well-placed human rights sources, very few crimes of suspected vigilante origin have been solved by the police. In September Warmbaths activist David Kutu was taken by three men to a nearby dam and beaten. Kutu recognized one of his assailants as a black sergeant in the local police force. The assailants identified themselves as belonging to the White Wolves. In October a former black police officer on death row alleged that he had been part of an SAP hit squad which assassinated a prominent Durban activist in 1984. Another former policeman claimed to be a part of a squad which stabbed to death Griffiths Mxenge, a civil rights lawyer, in Durban in 1981. These allegations, further corroborated by the voluntary statements of at least two other former policemen--including a white former security police captain--seemed to confirm long-held (but never proven) suspicions within antiapartheid circles of death squads operating within the Government. Despite the arrests of at least two suspected death squad members, President De Klerk decided not to call for an independent judicial investigation into the matter, leaving the investigation in the hands of the South African police and prosecutors.

The existence of the White Wolves first came to public view during the trial of Barend Strydom, sentenced to death in May for gunning down eight black persons in a central Pretoria square. Human rights observers express concern that the White Wolves might in fact be composed of rogue elements within the security forces. Also of concern were disclosures of secretive paramilitary components of rightwing extremists organizations such as the Afrikaner Resistance Movement (AWB). Several members of these hate groups were apprehended by South West African police in connection with a fatal attack on a United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) office in Namibia.

There was also political violence in the homelands. On July 1, nine Bophuthatswana policemen and two civilians died in the rural village of Leeuwfontein in violence protesting incorporation into the "independent" homeland. Bophuthatswana police, including seconded South African Government security officials, responded with arrests and repression that left the village a virtual ghost town.

Conflict between the ANC and South African security forces abated in 1989 in comparison to the numerous bombings and casualties that occurred in 1988. There were few reports of clashes between government forces and ANC forces, either due to attempted guerrilla infiltration or to cross-border raids by the SADF. Although the ANC has not renounced the armed struggle, it appeared to shift its emphasis from armed confrontation to development of a new diplomatic offensive. However, the ANC external organization appears to have limited control over its operatives once they enter South Africa.

SOUTH AFRICA

There were no reports of of any ANC-caused fatalities in 1989. While the ANC in 1989 appeared to be downplaying violent confrontation with Pretoria, PAC spokesmen called for the continuation of the armed struggle. The PAC and other organizations have also been involved in attacks in South Africa. In 1989 the Government sentenced PAC member Vusumuzi Mandoyi to 10 years' imprisonment for a hand grenade attack on police in 1988.

There were no known cases of antiapartheid leaders disappearing while in police custody in 1989. However, in recent years many activists have disappeared into police custody for long periods. Some are suspected by friends and associates to have been killed by security forces. South African law and SOE regulations do not require notification of a person's family, lawyer, or any other person in the event of detention, and prohibit the unauthorized publication of the name of any person detained for "the prevention of, or combating of, terroristic activities." The June 1988 disappearance case of Maisha "Stanza" Bopape, a Community Research and Information Center (CRIC) staff member and township activist, remains unsolved. Police claim that Bopape escaped from custody, but his associates fear that he may have been killed. Also unsolved are the cases of Port Elizabeth Black Civic Organization leaders Sipho Hashe, Champion Galela, and Qaqawuli Godolozzi, who disappeared in May 1985.

Following the June 1986 emergency declaration, and in the wake of subsequent crackdowns on various opposition organizations, many black activists left the country surreptitiously or went into hiding to avoid detention. These circumstances further complicated the task of accounting accurately for the many persons who reportedly have disappeared. Government press curbs imposed in December 1986 prohibited news reporting on detention cases and on unresolved litigation concerning detentions without prior government clearance, which rendered the task of accounting for missing persons still more problematic.

Since August 1986, the Minister of Law and Order periodically has tabled lists of SOE detainees in Parliament. These lists included only detainees held for at least 30 days and appeared to be incomplete. Human rights monitoring groups estimated that substantial numbers of detainees have not been named in the Government's lists and maintained that in most cases family members were not informed of emergency detentions.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Security legislation, in particular the ISA, allows police generally unsupervised discretion to arrest and detain suspects and to interrogate detainees. People detained under the ISA may receive visits from their attorneys and families only at the discretion of the Commissioner of Police. This permission is often denied. The ISA allows for lengthy periods of incommunicado detention during which authorities are not obliged to present formal charges, a situation which provides considerable potential for police abuse of detainees. Laws exempting law enforcement officials from both criminal and civil liability for so-called good faith acts undertaken in enforcing the SOE have been cited by many observers as giving police a license to engage in abusive conduct.

SOUTH AFRICA

During 1989, as in 1988, court testimony and sworn affidavits increasingly documented the claims of lawyers and human rights activists that severe beatings and torture are still used against security detainees. Though the number of incidents overall seem to be declining, torture of detainees in the so-called homelands continued. There were numerous allegations of police assaults and torture during widespread discontent in Venda on the anniversary of "independence." In Bophuthatswana, there were mass detentions following clashes between police and residents of Braaklagte and Leeuwfontein who were resisting forced incorporation into Bophuthatswana. The police used excessive force, including beatings, in containing the situation and confined detainees in overcrowded, unsanitary conditions. The presence of South African security officials "seconded" to these homelands and seemingly connected to these incidents of torture belies government claims of noninvolvement in homeland affairs and these homelands' claims of independence.

Commonly used methods of torture include prolonged solitary confinement and suffocation by placing bags over detainees' heads. Sick or wounded detainees and hunger strikers are sometimes handcuffed to their beds, regardless of their condition and even, on occasion, the presence of armed guards at their bedside. Denial of medical attention has been reported. In one case, a detainee alleged police tortured him by pulling on his thigh, previously shattered by gunshots, for 6 hours before providing medical treatment.

Police brutality increasingly came to light, especially in connection with repression of peaceful antiapartheid demonstrations in the latter half of 1989. Police Lt. Gregory Rockman became a cause celebre by severely criticizing riot police behavior against demonstrators in Mitchells Plain, Cape Region, during preelection unrest. The magistrate hearing a case arising from Lt. Rockman's claims found the riot squad actions "utterly despicable" but acquitted two riot police officers under the immunity accorded to police under the SOE. In connection with Rockman's complaint, a magistrate cleared two riot police officers of police brutality when dispersing a crowd at Mitchells Plain, despite finding police conduct "reprehensible." Police also came under critical public scrutiny in September for their use of stun guns in prisons. To counter the negative image police and security force members have among many South Africans, the Government has initiated in-house investigations of alleged abuses and misconduct, but these have failed to stem public criticism.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The ISA authorizes detention without trial for varying--in many instances unlimited--periods of time. Under Section 29 of the ISA, the Minister of Law and Order may issue preventive detention orders allowing for detention of up to 180 days in "unrest situations." Access to ISA detainees is severely restricted. Under Section 29, senior police officials have broad powers to detain people for interrogation when offenses such as terrorism, sabotage, or inciting a revolution are suspected. Many people in detention under Section 29 were held for long periods of time without any questioning taking place.

Under the SOE, SADF members and police officers down to the rank of constable are empowered to detain persons for up to 30 days. Police station cells may be used as the place of detention for the first 14 days after which detainees must be transferred to cells in prisons unless the Commissioner of Police grants an exception. After 30 days the Minister of Law and Order may extend the detention indefinitely, limited only by the duration of the SOE. Emergency detainees may be denied access to lawyers and have no right to a hearing before the Minister extends the detention.

The Government has effectively used SOE laws to hold political activists in long-term detention without trial, e.g., Obed Madonsela, detained for over 10 months in 1988-89. However, the number of detainees held during 1989, especially under the SOE, declined dramatically. Hunger strikes beginning in January appear to have been a factor in the SAG's decision to release large numbers of SOE detainees. As of late December there were 18 being detained under SOE regulations, 24 detained under the ISA (press reports in September indicated another 470 may be detained in Venda under its own ISA), and about 2,000-3,000 were serving criminal sentences from convictions stemming from incidents of political unrest. There were no children under 18 reported as detained at the end of 1989. The Government's refusal to provide specific statistics or complete lists of those being held made it difficult to confirm the actual number of detainees. Statistics on detentions failed to account fully for what appeared to be a common police tactic of detaining political activists, especially youths, and holding them for a few hours or overnight, during which time they were interrogated, threatened, and sometimes beaten. In addition, many people have been arrested on criminal charges during incidents of political unrest.

The Government imposed restrictions on approximately 65 percent of the detainees released. While the Government appears to have abandoned the practice of formally banning persons under the ISA, effective banning has returned under the guise of SOE "restrictions." Regulations published in 1988 allow the Government to restrict people simply by publishing their names, with no need to serve the orders on the restricted person. SOE regulations promulgated in June prohibit quoting any individual "commonly known" as a spokesperson for a restricted organization, even if that person is not restricted. Restrictions vary greatly but generally prevent ex-detainees from engaging in antigovernment activity. In one extreme example, Baba Dlamini was restricted to his home for 20 hours a day and had to report to a police station twice during the other 4 hours. An estimated 900 former detainees have been restricted upon their release. Prominent restricted antiapartheid activists include UDF Co-President Archie Gumede, UDF Treasurer Azar Cachalia, Azanian People's Organization (AZAPO) national organizer Charles Mabitsela, and UDF activist and lawyer Yunus Mahomed. The Government at the end of 1989 lifted the restriction orders for former political prisoner and ANC leader Govan Mbeki. Restricttees describe life under restrictions as having been released from prison into a larger form of jail, and for some there is the increased, potential danger from assault and assassination by vigilantes (see Section 1.a.).

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The South African judiciary is headed by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in Bloemfontein and six regional Supreme Courts. All judges of South Africa's higher courts are white, as are the vast majority of its magistrates. They are appointed to the bench by the State President. Their service is until age 70, and they cannot be removed from office except by impeachment by Parliament. By tradition, judges of the Appellate Division and the Supreme Courts are appointed to the bench from the ranks of the elite corps of South African Supreme Court practitioners ("Advocates").

South Africa has an adversarial system of criminal justice drawn from a mixed heritage of Roman-Dutch and English jurisprudence. Trials of lesser offenses are heard by magistrates, who are career employees of the civil service in the executive branch. More serious offenses, including capital crimes, are tried in the Supreme Courts. Determinations of guilt or innocence are made by the presiding judge or magistrate. Juries were abolished in 1969. Judges in capital and other serious cases are empowered to appoint two assessors who serve as fact finders and who have the power to overrule the presiding judge on questions of fact but not on questions of law.

Defendants in criminal cases, including political cases, may retain legal counsel, but recent studies showed that 50 percent of those convicted in ordinary criminal cases had no representation. The Natal Supreme Court in July held that legal representation was not vital to the fairness of a trial and that accused persons did not have the right to representation if they could not afford it. In 1989 Lawyers for Human Rights continued a major pro bono project begun in 1988 which aims to have 2,000 participating lawyers donating 5 days a year each, the first large-scale effort of its kind to be undertaken in South Africa. As a matter of practice, courts usually appoint counsel in capital cases where the defendant cannot afford a lawyer.

Persons charged with common crimes are presumed innocent until proven guilty, although Parliament has modified the general presumption of innocence for many security offenses. The ISA effectively places the burden of proof of innocence on the accused for a number of offenses enumerated in the Act. Both security-related and common crimes cases are tried in civilian courts, although security trials are sometimes held in remote locations. Because of case backlogs, postponements, and the practice of hearing cases concurrently, criminal trials, and particularly security cases, can sometimes take months, even years, to complete.

A new Chief Justice of the Appeals Court was appointed in 1988, and fears about the Court's politicization have eased somewhat. However, the power of the South African judiciary at all levels is circumscribed by stringent security legislation and by the principle of parliamentary sovereignty, under which judges possess no authority to alter, strike down, or refuse to enforce properly drafted and enacted laws of Parliament. Nevertheless, the courts have been the focal point for much litigation against human rights abuses. In some instances, the Government has admitted abuses and reached out-of-court settlements.

Since its declaration in June 1986, there have been a number of legal challenges to the SOE and detention without trial. In the initial months, courts ordered a small number of detainees freed and declared some SOE regulations unlawful. But in most cases the Government rewrote and reissued the regulations to prevent further court challenges. Moreover, the courts have consistently stated that the SOE itself was lawfully declared. An Appeals Court decision in 1988 held that an emergency regulation could not be invalidated for being "unreasonable" or "vague", a ruling which could severely limit further legal challenges to the SOE.

Long political trials serve to keep prominent activists out of circulation for extended periods of time. Many defendants are eventually acquitted. Partial HRC statistics indicated that there were some 99 trials under the ISA and other statutes in 1988 involving 317 people of whom 165 were acquitted. There were 258 persons facing charges of treason in 8 trials during 1988. Only 2 of those were concluded by the end of 1988, with 4 of 27 defendants convicted for treason--all from the Delmas treason trial. From October 1988 to August 1989, 861 people were charged in 248 political trials, with 350 convicted, 172 acquitted, and 341 with charges withdrawn.

In June, 14 defendants of the "Upington 25" court case were sentenced to death for the murder of a policeman in 1985. Although only one person was found to have actually struck the victim, the others were convicted using the "common purpose" doctrine where a person may be guilty of a crime for sharing a common purpose with those who commit the actual crime. According to the South African Journal of Human Rights (SAJHR), this is one of the largest numbers of simultaneously passed death sentences in South African legal history.

In November 1988, 11 of 22 defendants (including 3 prominent UDF officials) were found guilty in the Delmas Treason Trial--considered the most important political trial in recent times. All the defendants, members of the UDF, AZAPO, and various black civic associations, were convicted for their antiapartheid activity during the 1984-86 upheavals. The court accepted the State's claims that the UDF and other antiapartheid organizations had followed the dictates of the ANC and promoted the violent overthrow of the Government. In an unprecedented move, the presiding judge dismissed one assessor in March 1987 for having signed a UDF petition. In September the Appeals Court decided, in the interest of saving time and expense, to hear an appeal on the procedural issue of the assessor's dismissal, and if necessary, later hear an appeal on substantive grounds. In December the Appeals Court declared a mistrial and ordered the defendants released. As of the end of the year, all the original defendants remained free and unrestricted.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The system of apartheid involves the Government in extensive regulation of social, personal, and family life. A person's identification as a member of an ethnic group or race is based on definitions and decisions of the Government under the Population Registration Act. Under this law, every child born in South Africa must be registered and classified according to race. In cases of dispute, such as when the parents' racial classification is not known, a racial classification board is empowered to weigh pseudoscientific evidence and to issue a verdict on a person's race.

Under apartheid, association in many social settings is not a matter of free choice. The Separate Amenities Act allows public premises to be reserved for the exclusive use of persons of a particular race, and a substantial degree of social segregation, petty apartheid, still legally exists in South Africa. In recent years, however, the Government has expanded the scope of administrative exceptions to apartheid laws and has allowed local option decisions on some social apartheid issues such as segregation of business districts and beaches. In 1989 some local authorities, notably in the urban centers of Johannesburg, Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, and East London agreed to scrap segregated public transportation, libraries, and swimming pools. Other areas refused to desegregate. Pretoria's transportation system remained segregated, for example, while the Durban City Council refused to integrate the city's remaining "whites only" beaches until President De Klerk issued an executive decree in December desegregating beaches throughout the country. Some of the localities controlled by Conservative Party groups, such as Boksburg and Carletonville, continued to enforce apartheid regulations which they had reimposed after the October 1988 municipal elections. Carletonville business groups brought a successful court action against the city council forcing them to reopen municipal facilities. "Whites Only" signs were removed in Boksburg, but blacks attempting to use recreational facilities remained subject to intimidation by rightwing groups. The black consumer boycott in Carletonville came to an end after the court decision, and the Boksburg boycott was called off when De Klerk announced he planned to scrap the Separate Amenities Act.

The Group Areas Act (GAA) of 1950 reserves all land in South Africa for whites, except for those areas designated for blacks, Asians, and "coloreds," and requires residential areas to be segregated by race. Blacks are disqualified from owning and occupying land in urban areas not designated for them and from owning land in rural areas outside the 10 homelands, with the minor exception of "black spots"--land owned by blacks or religious missions prior to the enactment of the Land Acts.

Interracial couples must reside in the area designated for the less advantaged racial group, vitiating the benefits of the repeal of the miscegenation laws in 1985. Notwithstanding the GAA, a number of so-called gray areas exist in some major cities, where blacks, "coloreds," and Asians reside in technically white areas, often without government interference. Some private schools in white-designated areas admit black, "colored," and Asian students.

In late 1988 the Government tabled a new group areas statute, the Free Settlement Areas Act, described as "reform" but seen by many as a major step backward. While providing that certain residential areas might eventually be opened to all races, the legislation further restricts rural and periurban squatting, heavily penalizes illegal squatters and their landlords, and allows for compulsory summary eviction of squatters and effective confiscation of their land. Asian and "colored" houses of Parliament called for the outright abolition of the GAA. In 1989 the Minister of Constitutional Affairs suggested the creation of a complicated "nongroup" classification, whereby persons presumably would be allowed to opt out of their current classifications and become part of the "nongroup." The Government was roundly criticized by apartheid opponents for a policy of encouraging people to report to the authorities any neighbors residing in an area not assigned to their racial group.

For black Africans, the right to reside permanently in a segregated black urban township is not available if one is deemed a citizen of one of the so-called independent homelands. Such persons are regarded as aliens in white South Africa, and, notwithstanding their birth in South Africa, are technically subject to restrictions similar to those for any foreigner. They must obtain work permits in order to reside in urban areas of "white" South Africa, and if they succeed in obtaining a work permit, they may not be accompanied by their spouses and children. Hundreds of thousands of such persons are forced to reside away from their families in urban areas, often in overcrowded single-sex dormitories.

The Government owns virtually all urban black township property and subsidizes a program of rental housing. Local authorities in the black townships administer the program and collect rents. In 1986 Parliament granted blacks the opportunity to acquire permanent land tenure in the townships. By 1989, however, only an estimated 817 freehold houses had been sold to blacks on a permanent tenure basis--up from 42 sold in 1988. Of nearly 500,000 housing units available for sale, only approximately 2,500 currently are able to be sold because of bureaucratic problems.

Many urban townships without electricity and running water are becoming more crowded as rural poverty drives people to seek jobs in urban centers. In South Africa (excluding the "independent" homelands) an estimated 18 to 20 million people, most of them black, do not have electricity. The Government reports that only 9 of the 259 African townships are fully electrified. The restricted amount of land available in the townships has driven up prices for housing lots and led to corruption among township officials controlling their allocation. Some townships are little more than permanent shanty towns with housing constructed of fiberboard and corrugated iron. The shortage of housing for blacks--which some estimates place as high as 1.8 million units--also has led to the development of large squatter communities. Townships are often extraordinarily long commuting distances from cities, where most employment opportunities are found. A 1985 President's Council's report found that 70 percent of black commuters spent more than 3 hours daily traveling between home and work.

The Black Sash, the most prominent women's antiapartheid organization, estimates that 5 million South African blacks are without adequate shelter. An 8-year Carnegie-sponsored study, based on interviews with 400 South Africans, documented "appalling" depths of South Africa's poverty. Half of all households have incomes below the minimum living level. Infant mortality among blacks is eight times that of whites.

The Land Acts of 1913 and 1936 limit land ownership in rural areas to whites. Blacks are allowed to live in nonhomeland rural areas only with the permission of white landowners; nearly all are farm laborers whose numbers and freedom of movement are regulated by a number of other statutes. The GAA and these statutes are the bases for the Government's practice of "forced removals." For 3 decades, the Government has forcibly relocated black South Africans from land reserved for whites, often to areas in the homelands with hopelessly inadequate infrastructure and insufficient land and water for profitable (or even subsistence) agriculture. The South African Council of Churches (SACC) has estimated that since 1961, the Government has forcibly resettled approximately 3.5 million blacks, "coloreds," and Asians. Government figures issued in 1984 asserted that 2 million blacks had been resettled since 1960.

SOUTH AFRICA

In early 1985, the Government announced a suspension of forced removals in favor of a policy of negotiating with affected communities on relocation issues. However, in July 1987, the State President qualified this "no forced removals" pledge, stating that there would be no forced removal "unless it is accompanied with the provision of better living conditions." In some situations, the Government has engaged in effectively coercive removals by refusing to maintain the limited infrastructures of black communities and by engaging in physical threats and aggressive actions aimed at convincing reluctant people to move.

In August a court ruling set aside a 1988 government decree declaring the 60-year-old black community of Oukasie an "emergency camp." The declaration had been seen as the prelude to forced removal of the 6,000-person community to Letlhabile township near Bophuthatswana. The community opposed removal on the suspicion that Letlhabile would eventually be incorporated into Bophuthatswana, stripping its members of their South African citizenship. Vigilantes continue to attack activists opposed to the removal in an effort to coerce them to abandon their village. In December residents of East Peulton were driven from their homes by Ciskeian authorities because of their continued opposition to their community's August 1988 incorporation into Ciskei without their having been consulted. In the first concession of its kind in incorporation cases, the residents were granted the use of land for resettlement (at least temporarily) "inside" South Africa after unsuccessful mediation between South African and Ciskeian authorities.

Studies completed during 1987 indicated that the Government's policy of settling blacks on arid land far from population centers has serious consequences in regard to nutrition. In a malnutrition survey, Operation Hunger reported severe impoverishment among South African rural blacks, particularly in the so-called independent homelands. Malnutrition is also a serious problem in congested and depressed periurban resettlement areas such as Botshabelo, near Bloemfontein.

Various laws give police the authority in specific circumstances to enter homes without a warrant, including situations where an officer has reason to believe a warrant would be issued but that the delay caused by first obtaining the warrant would defeat the purpose of the search. In practice, police often enter and search homes of black activists as a means of intimidation, often in the early morning hours.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While South Africans speak freely on most issues, the SOE and security legislation limit discussion of certain political themes. Segments of South Africa's almost totally white-owned press continued to engage in vigorous criticism of the Government and its policies. However, SOE regulations severely impair freedom of expression and of the press by making reporting of "subversive statements" (e.g., encouraging strikes, boycotts, or the promotion of disinvestment) a criminal offense. The regulations also ban television coverage, still photography, sketching, and radio recording from areas covered by the SOE. Media may not report on police or security force operations in "unrest situations," except as information--always limited--is released by the Government. Penalties for infractions include fines of up to $8,000 and imprisonment for up to 10 years. It is a criminal offense to publish material on political unrest, detention cases, treatment of detainees, and various types of political activity without prior government clearance.

In 1989 the press in South Africa remained under pressure. Regulations published in 1987 streamlined the method by which publications can be censored and gave the Minister of Home Affairs the power to close a publication for up to 3 months without explanation. In February 1989, the Minister exercised this power, closing the periodicals Grass Roots and New Era for 3 months.

Throughout 1989 a variety of regulations were used to charge editors and publications. In May the former editor of the magazine South was charged with contravening the SOE by publishing an article on a school boycott. In June the editor of the newspaper Vrye Weekblad was found guilty of charges brought against him under the ISA and given a 6-month suspended sentence; the same editor late in the year faced six charges under the SOE for publishing an article allegedly undermining the system of military conscription. The editor of Saamstaan was charged in July under the Prisons Act for publishing a photograph of Nelson Mandela (and with seven other charges related to contravening the SOE and the ISA). Also in July, the editor and two former journalists of the Weekly Mail were summoned under the SOE for articles on the conditions and treatment of political detainees. In August the editors of the Sunday Times, New Nation, Sowetan, and Weekly Mail were charged under the ISA for quoting a listed person; Times Media (the publishers of the Sunday Times) received a $800 fine. The Natal Mercury, Star, Daily News, and Sunday Tribune were informed by the police in September that they were being investigated. In October the editor of the South African Press Association (SAPA) was subpoenaed under the Criminal Procedure Act to answer questions and produce documents in connection with an investigation of charges that he had distributed a trade union press release.

The SOE media regulations are sufficiently vague to create an atmosphere of uncertainty among editors, resulting in a situation where self-censorship is common, and opposition newspaper editors often surrender ultimate editing responsibility to their lawyers. Opposition publications pay expensive legal fees for advice prior to publishing stories, testing the limits of the regulations and for the defense of their actions in court. By late August, journalists and editors began consistently testing the media regulations in their coverages of the defiance campaign. The Government, adopting a new tactic, began obstructing journalists at the scene of unrest by immediately ordering them out of the area, detaining them, or arresting them. Over 100 journalists had been detained by the middle of September, including the American Broadcasting Corporation bureau chief, who was charged under the SOE with "attending an illegal gathering." Since De Klerk's administration has been in power, media regulations have gone largely unenforced. There is speculation that many media restrictions will be lifted in 1990.

Under the Publications Act (applicable to most periodicals, with the exception of newspapers), the importation, possession, and publication of politically or morally

"undesirable" works is prohibited. Materials subject to censorship include those found to be "indecent or obscene," "blasphemous," or "prejudicial to the safety of the state." Decisions of the Publications Appeal Board are not subject to judicial review, except in rare instances, and can be quixotic. The antiapartheid movie, "Dry White Season," was shown at a film festival with only minor cuts; in 1988 the antiapartheid movie, "Cry Freedom," was banned after one showing.

The Government exercises a near monopoly on television and radio broadcasting through the state-owned South African Broadcasting Corporation (SABC). With some exceptions, SABC reflects progovernment viewpoints in both its news reporting and editorial policy. While the Government professes that SABC is politically independent, a wide range of the political spectrum, including the liberal Democratic Party and the rightwing Conservative Party, characterizes the SABC as an editorial arm of the ruling National Party. The appointment of Christo Viljoen as the new Director General of SABC may have inaugurated a more evenhanded approach; in the weeks leading up to the September 6 election, SABC offered a wide-ranging political debate on election issues.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The ISA seriously obstructs freedom of assembly, giving magistrates the power to ban or impose conditions on the holding of public meetings and to close off areas to the public to prevent prohibited gatherings. Police can also ban meetings under the SOE regulations. A ban on all outdoor gatherings except sports events or specially authorized meetings, in effect since 1976, was renewed again in 1989. Restrictions on funerals of political activists or victims of political violence also remain on the books. Throughout 1989 police frequently arrested persons in the townships on charges of participating in illegal gatherings and used the powers conferred on them by the SOE to repress peaceful demonstrations and gatherings.

On September 20 over 30,000 people marched against apartheid in Cape Town in one of the largest peaceful demonstrations in South African history. In what many observers viewed as a watershed event, the Government, headed by recently elected F.W. De Klerk, allowed the march even though official approval was never requested or given. The antiapartheid movement, represented by the MDM, proved its commitment to peaceful protest. The Cape Town march led to a series of large antiapartheid demonstrations in urban centers throughout South Africa--40,000 in East London on October 4 and 20,000 in Durban on September 29. On October 16 the media reported that approximately 150,000 persons demonstrated peacefully against apartheid and a regressive labor law in 17 places across South Africa with minimum police interference.

South Africa has a wide variety of religious denominations, and the Government generally respects freedom of worship. Religious organizations are allowed to hold meetings and other activities without interference as long as they do not seriously challenge government policies. As with other aspects of South African life, churches are often organized along racial lines, but many churches (including a growing number of white churches) challenge apartheid on moral grounds. In 1989 the white branch of the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa went as far as calling apartheid a "sin."

The Defense Act provides alternative service options for pacifist religious objectors to national military service. (Only white males are obliged to do military service.) Members of mainstream churches are granted alternative service only in rare instances. Conscientious objectors on nonreligious grounds continue to be subject to a 6-year prison sentence. Charles Bester was sentenced to 6 years in 1988 for refusing alternative service, apparently without being given the normal one-third remission of sentence. Dr. Ivan Toms was released on bail in 1989, pending an appeal for the same offense. Douglas Torr, an Anglican deacon, refused to report for military service in August and was scheduled for an initial hearing in January 1990. An estimated 15 percent of those called up for their 2-year military service fail to report, with the incidence of no-shows reportedly increasing. In 1989 reports indicated that the military intended to halve the required military service time from 2 years to 1. In September, 780 youths publicly stated their intentions not to do their military service.

Because of the restrictions on virtually all black opposition, church leaders have found themselves in the forefront of the antiapartheid movement. This resulted in growing tension between the Government and churchmen such as Anglican Archbishop of Cape Town Desmond Tutu; Rev. Allan Boesak, President of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches; and Rev. Frank Chikane, Secretary General of the SACC. Nevertheless, in 1989 church leaders continued to lead demonstrations and launched an interdenominational "standing for the truth" campaign.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Since the repeal of the pass laws in 1986, black South African citizens have no longer been required to carry government-issued passes in urban areas. While repeal represented a significant reform, some government critics charge that a de facto system of influx control has been maintained through urban housing shortages, antisquatting laws, and sanctions against employers who hire illegal aliens from the four independent homelands. Regulations requiring citizens of so-called independent homelands to obtain work permits for employment in the rest of South Africa could provide a basis for future deportations of large numbers of people to the "independent" homelands.

Assignments of blacks to homelands take place regardless of their wishes or the fact that they may not have been born in, lived in, or even visited, their putative homelands. When a homeland is granted so-called independence by the Government, blacks assigned to that homeland lose their South African citizenship and ostensibly receive the citizenship of the homeland. An estimated 8 million blacks have lost South African citizenship under this policy by legislation granting independence to: Transkei (1976); Bophuthatswana (1977); Venda (1979) and Ciskei (1981). A 1986 law provided for restoration of South African citizenship to a limited class of blacks who were denationalized as a result of homeland independence grants--those with permanent residence rights in South Africa. The Government believes that this reform will apply only to about 1.75 million of the estimated 4 million citizens of "independent" homelands residing outside those homelands.

South Africans must possess valid travel documents to travel abroad or emigrate legally. These documents generally are not difficult for whites to obtain, although some white antiapartheid activists have been denied passports. Blacks assigned to an "independent" homeland usually cannot obtain South African passports because they are not considered by the Government to be citizens of South Africa. The refusal of some blacks to travel on a homeland passport has the effect of deterring them from traveling abroad. In 1982 the Rand Supreme Court ruled that the Minister of Home Affairs has the absolute discretion to revoke or refuse to issue a passport. The Government regularly refuses passports to persons whom it regards as critical of the status quo. The Ministry of Home Affairs stated that in 1988, 169 people were refused passports--112 blacks, 20 "coloreds", 24 Asians, and 23 whites.

Although South Africa is not a party to international conventions on refugees, monitoring groups estimate that more than 250,000 Mozambicans displaced by civil strife have entered South Africa, including about 68,000 children. Approximately 205,000 of these refugees live in the homelands of Kangwane and Gazankulu or work as farm laborers in the Eastern Transvaal. Mozambicans apprehended outside these areas without permission are forcibly repatriated without an interview to determine whether they are refugees who can safely be returned. South African private and voluntary organizations as well as the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) provide relief assistance in the homelands. The Government permits access by international observers to refugee areas.

The Government has taken harsh measures to prevent the entry of more Mozambicans by erecting an electrified fence along the South African border with Mozambique. On several occasions during 1989, the Government turned off the fence to allow refugees to cross safely into South Africa during clashes along the border between guerrillas and Mozambican forces. However, the refugees were promptly repatriated once the immediate danger was considered to have passed.

The number of South Africans who are officially registered as refugees in neighboring countries and benefit from assistance from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has not grown significantly since 1985 and remains approximately 22,000. Most of these "refugees" are affiliated in some way with one of the antiapartheid organizations in exile.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The extent to which South African citizens have the right to change their government democratically depends on race. The majority of them, the blacks, have no such right. The 1983 Constitution created a tricameral Parliament with separate chambers for whites, "coloreds," and Asians. Officially registered political parties may operate freely. The respective groups are represented in the tricameral Parliament on a racial ratio of 4 white /2 "colored"/1 Asian, thus ensuring white dominance. Members of each house are elected from separate, racially based voter rolls. Each house has primary responsibility for its "own affairs," i.e., legislation affecting its own racial constituency. The State President has complete discretion to decide which issues are of general concern and are therefore to be treated by all three chambers. Matters that are usually considered general affairs include foreign policy, defense, national security, and black affairs. Education is normally dealt with as an "own affair" subject to general laws prescribing norms and standards for salaries, curriculum, and examinations.

The terms of the 1983 Constitution and the existence of a white majority in Parliament ensure control by the white House of Assembly over general affairs. While there is opposition in the House of Assembly, the majority National Party has controlled South African political power and legislative affairs since its first parliamentary victory in 1948. Within the National Party, opinions on reform of the apartheid system range from moderate to reactionary. Internal differences are in theory resolved in party caucuses, but in practice the State President, who is also the National Party leader, resolves disputes.

In the September 1989 general election, the National Party won a reduced majority with 93 of 166 seats (down from 124 in the 1987 election), and 48 percent of the popular vote. The Conservative Party grew in strength (though not by as much as had been generally expected), increasing its elected representation from 22 seats to 39 and winning 32 percent of the popular vote. The liberal opposition, the Democratic Party, performed more strongly than expected, winning 33 seats and 20 percent of the vote. State President F.W. De Klerk interpreted the election results as a "mandate for reform."

Political participation for blacks, who have no representation in Parliament, remains limited to the franchise in their respective homelands or, in the case of urban blacks, in their townships. While remaining committed in principle to the grand apartheid scheme of granting independence to more homelands, the Government seems to accept that no more are likely to accept independence. Transkei's desire to remain independent came into question in 1989, when its leader, General Holomisa, publicly spoke of allowing a popular referendum on the issue. Other homeland leaders, such as Enos Mabuza (Kangwane), Mangosuthu Buthelezi (KwaZulu), and Mogoboya Ramodike (Lebowa) continue to reject so-called independence.

More than 10 million blacks live in townships near white urban areas. The only voting rights they are able to exercise are those granted under the Community Councils Act of 1977 and the Black Local Authorities Act of 1982. The latter Act elevated the formal status of black municipal authorities to that enjoyed by white municipal governments. However, black local governments still face critical problems of limited powers, inadequate financial resources, and lack of political credibility. In 1989, in Soweto, well-known black nationalists took over from the elected council, and South African provincial authorities negotiated with them an end to the 3-year rent boycott.

The Government has proposed some formulas to give blacks a limited role in the political process, including in 1985 multiracial Regional Services Councils and in 1986 a National Council to serve in an advisory capacity regarding a new constitutional structure for South Africa. These efforts have been viewed by critics as devices to give the appearance but not the reality of power sharing.

In 1989 the Government appeared to recognize that such limited steps were pointless and that new political structures for South Africa would have to come through negotiations. In the unfolding political process, ANC leader Nelson Mandela, assumed a new importance. Imprisoned in 1964 after his conviction for sabotage in the 1964 "Rivonia" trial, Mandela was moved from Robben Island Prison in 1988 to Pollsmoor Prison and subsequently to a cottage on a prison farm near Cape Town. In July then-State President P.W. Botha had an unprecedented meeting with Mandela, and in December State President De Klerk also met with Mandela. There was no information available on the substance of these meetings, but after each there was increased speculation that Mandela might be released soon.

In the first months of the new administration, President De Klerk met with other black leaders, including Bishop Tutu, Reverend Alan Boesak, and Reverend Chickane, who presented a list of demands believed to be close to ANC positions. These included: ending the SOE; lifting all restrictions on political activists; and releasing all prisoners detained without trial. De Klerk, in signaling an interest in negotiations, rejected an ANC demand for an interim multiracial government while a new constitution was being worked out. At the end of 1989, contact between exiled ANC and various internal political pressure groups had become increasingly common. Unofficial meetings reportedly also occurred between the ANC and members of the Afrikaner Broederbond. De Klerk also made a number of visits to African countries, including Mozambique, to stress publicly his interest in improving relations with these countries.

In October State President De Klerk announced the unconditional release of eight prominent long-term security prisoners. Among them were five of the original Rivonia defendants, including former ANC Secretary-General Walter Sisulu and Commander-in-Chief of the ANC military wing, Umkhonto We Sizwe, Raymond Mhlaba, as well as Ahmed Kathrada, Elias Motsoaledi, and Andrew Mlangweni. Also released were Oscar Mpetha, South Africa's oldest political prisoner, who has been described as the "father of trade unionism" in South Africa; Jafta Masemola, a PAC activist and South Africa's longest-serving political prisoner following his conviction of high treason in 1963; and Wilton Mkwayi, also a former Commander-in-Chief of Umkhonto We Sizwe.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government extends little cooperation to various United Nations bodies or private organizations attempting to investigate its human rights record. Since an October 1986 vote by an ICRC conference in Geneva to expel a South African Government delegation, the Government has permitted the ICRC to maintain only a reduced staff in South Africa. The Government has been willing to allow the ICRC to visit only a small percentage of those jailed for political reasons, because of its restrictive definition of precisely who is a political prisoner--generally those convicted under the ISA. The ICRC continues to negotiate with the Government for access to all prisoners convicted of security-related offenses, including those detained under the SOE. In 1989, to protest the Government's lack of response on this issue, the ICRC did not visit any category of prisoners for the fourth consecutive year.

Despite continued official and extraofficial harassment, many South African organizations continued to observe, report, and contest human rights violations. Lawyers for Human Rights, the Black Sash, the Human Rights Commission, the Legal Resources Center, the South African Council of Churches, the University of the Witwatersrand Center for Applied Legal Studies, the Human Rights Trust in Port Elizabeth, and other groups are actively involved in a wide range of human rights issues and assist persons who are aggrieved by the apartheid and security laws.

Activists involved in these and other human rights monitoring organizations are often subjected to personal harassment, including office break-ins, sabotage of automobiles, threatening phone calls, opened mail, and loss of jobs. A number of human rights monitors and lawyers have been detained. Acts of violence against some of these groups have resulted in their being asked to vacate office premises or venues for their activities. Some of these acts are probably carried out by rightwing groups outside of the Government.

South Africa's black majority and, to a somewhat lesser extent, the "colored" and Asian communities, suffer from pervasive, legally sanctioned discrimination based on race in political, economic, and social aspects of life. For example, per capita expenditure for education is about six times greater for whites than for blacks. Black enrollment at white universities has been growing slowly. In 1989 security forces relaxed their strong presence around some universities, though they continued targeting student activists in secondary schools in many of the major townships for detention and intimidation.

Women of all races in South Africa suffer varying degrees of legal, cultural, and economic discrimination, most of which is based on tradition rather than codified in law. Women traditionally earn lower wages than men. Rita Venter, who occupies the portfolio of Minister of National Health and Population Development, became the first woman named to serve as a minister in the Government. Women generally have achieved more success in electoral politics at the local than at the national level.

Black women suffer not only from discrimination under apartheid, but also from legal disabilities based on sex. Parliament passed legislation in 1988 which brought the marriage laws for blacks into line with those for whites. Black women married subsequent to the legislation have legal rights to community property accumulated during the marriage. Maternity benefits are not guaranteed to women of any race under South African law, and pregnancy is a legal basis for dismissal from a job. A women's rights movement has taken hold in South Africa, and women's organizations, often multiracial, have been at the forefront of the struggle against both race and sex discrimination.

Women activists believe that violence against women in South Africa is on the increase. Though the Government has enacted legislation to help protect women, in practice police are unresponsive to complaints against domestic violence. Cases often are not pursued nor investigated properly. A major problem for women in South Africa has been collecting financial support from former spouses in cases of divorce.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

South Africa's Labor Relations Act entitles all workers in the private sector freely to join labor unions of their own choosing. Although reliable statistics are unavailable, it is likely that more than 2 million workers were members of trade unions in 1989, and probably more than 1 million of those members were black. Black union membership has increased around ten-fold since legislation a decade ago granted blacks full status as employees with the right to form free and independent trade unions. According to South Africa's Ministry of Manpower, total union membership in 1989 represented approximately 24 percent of the nonagricultural work force.

South Africa's unions are independent of direct government control. The system of apartheid, however, impinges on all nonwhite workers and unionists, limiting their rights of political protest, access to legal process, and freedom of expression. As unions have increasingly assumed the role of voicing black worker demands for political rights, the Government has imposed restrictions on their political activities. The Government in February 1988 issued an order, often ignored, which officially prohibits the country's largest trade union confederation, COSATU, from engaging in political activities. The Government also has banned numerous trade union gatherings or restricted their agendas to "nonpolitical" issues.

In that connection, police have raided union offices throughout South Africa. In a raid on COSATU headquarters in August 1989 they seized a number of union documents. A South African court later ruled the seizure illegal and ordered the documents returned. Police then corrected their previous procedural violation and resealed the same documents. On the same day they raided COSATU headquarters, police raided the headquarters of the Food and Beverage Workers Union, an affiliate of NACTU, also seizing union documents.

In addition, although reliable statistics are unavailable, scores of trade unionists have been detained for varying periods by the police during the past year under SOE and ISA regulations. Just prior to national elections in early September, seven out of nine of COSATU's regional secretaries were either detained or went into hiding in fear of being detained. Shortly thereafter, police detained an official of the National Union of Mineworkers, the nation's largest union, whom they held for 5 days.

South Africa extended the right to strike, long enjoyed by white workers, to all private sector workers regardless of race in 1979. Since then work stoppages triggered by collective bargaining disputes, and occasionally political issues, have been commonplace. The number of strikes in 1989 appeared to be on the increase, but was still far less than in 1987, a particularly turbulent year. A survey of 168 strikes in the first 9 months of 1989 revealed that almost 65 percent involved disputes over wages.

SOUTH AFRICA

In September 1988 the Government amended South Africa's Labor Relations Act in a way regarded by workers' organizations as favoring employers over unions. Seen as particularly damaging to union strength is a section of the Act that imposes responsibility on unions to compensate employers financially in the case of an illegal strike. The Act also limits unions' right to conduct strikes, especially sympathy and intermittent strikes, as well as undermining established rights in the area of unfair dismissal and making it easier for racially exclusive (white) minority unions to preserve access to the official bargaining forums. Trade unions have focused major efforts against this and other sections of the Act since it was enacted, and COSATU has filed a complaint with the International Labor Organization (ILO) claiming that the law abridges the right to strike and gives preference to racially based unions.

South African law prohibits public employees from striking. A commission makes annual wage estimates for public employees, and legislation governing each public service sector establishes machinery for collective bargaining with staff associations and dispute resolution. In most public service sectors, disputes are referred to the appropriate minister and then to arbitration or mediation if necessary. Public sector conciliation machinery is currently being reviewed to see if it is adequate.

South Africa does not restrict union affiliation with regional or international labor organizations. The country's two largest confederations, COSATU and NACTU, however, have chosen not to seek such affiliations. Many of their affiliates as well as independent unions, though, have affiliated with trade secretariats and developed contacts with their counterparts in North America and Western Europe. It is not unusual, however, for the Government to deny passports to trade unionists for international travel and to deny visas to Western trade unionists for travel to South Africa. A member of the ILO from its inception in 1919, South Africa withdrew from the organization in 1964 but remains bound by the ILO conventions which it has ratified.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

South African law prohibits discrimination by employers against union members and organizers. The Government does not interfere directly with union organizing in the private sector and has generally not intervened in the collective bargaining process. Excluded from the statutory system of industrial councils for 50 years, black unions developed a collective bargaining tradition of their own. Unassisted by statute, collective bargaining relations were established by agreement (called "recognition agreements") at the level of the enterprise on the basis of majority representation. Private mediation services are available and have been voluntarily resorted to by management and the black trade unions to resolve industrial disputes. The Labor Relations Act establishes an industrial court to rule in labor-management disputes, and its decisions appear to be balanced. The most common complaints filed with the court concern dismissals, followed by unfair labor practices. Many observers believe, however, that the amendments made to the Labor Relations Act last year have skewed the Act, and therefore the industrial court, to favor employers. A new labor appeals court now oversees the industrial court and can overturn its decisions.

SOUTH AFRICA

Nevertheless, collective bargaining is freely practiced throughout the country with the major exceptions being public servants, farm workers, and domestic servants, who are not covered by the Labor Relations Act. In addition, South African labor law does not cover the so-called independent homelands which for the most part do not have labor legislation to match that of the Labor Relations Act. There are also reports that the "independent" homelands discourage trade union organizing. Excluding the homelands, labor laws and practices are applied uniformly throughout the country. There are no export processing zones or special labor regimes for export processing firms in South Africa.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

South Africa does not constitutionally or statutorily prohibit forced labor; however, the country's system of Roman-Dutch common law does not permit it, and it is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Basic Conditions of Employment Act prohibits the employment of minors under age 15 in most industries, shops, and offices. The Mines and Works Act prohibits minors under 16 from working underground. There is no restriction, however, on the age at which a person may work in agriculture.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no legal minimum wage in South Africa. The Labor Relations Act instead provides a mechanism for negotiations between labor and management to set minimum wage standards industry by industry. At present over 100 industries covering most nonagricultural workers come under the provisions of the Act. A recent survey by the Institute for Industrial Relations found the average minimum wage in negotiated settlements with unions in 1989 to be approximately $260 per month. The same survey indicated that union-negotiated wage increases are running ahead of inflation. In comparison, a different survey estimated the minimum monthly household subsistence level for a black family of six in the Johannesburg area to be approximately $230. It should be noted that the current exchange rate understates the domestic purchasing power of the rand.

Attention to health and safety issues has increased in recent years. The Occupational Safety Act sets forth minimum standards for work conditions and employment. The Act mandates minimum standards for workplace environment and machinery which are enforced by inspectors from the Ministry of Manpower. Although its statistics are disputed by some, the State-funded National Occupational and Safety Association claims that the number of workers suffering disabling injuries annually has dropped from 2.4 percent to 1.6 percent over the last 10 years. Most industries have a standard workweek of 46 hours, as well as vacation and sick leave. Overtime is voluntary and limited to 10 hours a week. Work conditions in the homelands appear to be less advanced than in the rest of South Africa.

SUDAN

On June 30, 1989, in a bloodless coup d'etat, a group of brigadiers and colonels in the Sudanese People's Armed Forces (SPAF), led by Omar Hassan Ahmed al-Bashir, overthrew Sudan's 3-year-old democratic government, then headed by Prime Minister Sadiq al Mahdi. The new regime controls all the territory controlled by the Sadiq Government, but much of the south remains in the hands of the Sudanese People's Liberation Army/Movement (SPLA/M), led by John Garang. The coup leaders arrested over 300 leading figures (most of whom were freed by year's end), imposed a strict curfew, suspended Sudan's 1986 transitional constitution, abrogated press licenses, and dissolved all political and trade union institutions. The leaders then instituted a "National Salvation Revolutionary Command Council" (RCC) of 15 members, drawn exclusively from the military. The RCC justified the coup by condemning Sadiq's Government for corruption and ineffectiveness, especially in economic areas and in its failure to end the civil war with the SPLA/M.

The SPAF numbers about 75,000 men and is largely responsible for Sudan's internal and external security. Martial law has been in effect in government-controlled areas of the south for some time, and now extends to the north as well. A state of emergency (SOE) that permits various arbitrary government actions has been periodically renewed outside the south since 1985 and has been jointly enforced by the military, the police, and the Ministry of Interior.

Sudan's economy is primarily agricultural. Although the country is trying to diversify its cash crops, cotton and cottonseed still account for more than 50 percent of export earnings. The economy has been devastated by the expensive civil war (which costs perhaps $1 million per day), high inflation (100 percent in the first 6 months of 1989), high unemployment, up to 700,000 refugees from neighboring countries, and perhaps 3 million displaced persons among the Sudanese.

Many of the serious human rights violations previously noted in Sudan continued in 1989 under both the Sadiq and Omar Governments. The RCC abolished Sudan's largely free press, dissolved Sudanese labor organizations, and suspended legal due process by instituting arbitrary arrest, detention without charge, and trial of civilians by military courts. The continuation of Islamic law (Shari'a) throughout Sudan remained a major cause of southern disaffection, although the implementation of its more severe punishments has remained in abeyance since 1985.

Government forces and government-armed militias committed many human rights abuses, especially in the south, as did the SPLA/M (although reports from SPLA/M-controlled areas are more fragmentary). Military operations by both sides have left large areas of Sudan largely unpopulated and opened opportunities for banditry, especially along the Ugandan border. Few of the 3 million displaced persons (including 1 million near Khartoum) were resettled. Many still lack proper food, clothing, shelter, and medical care.

Both before and after the coup, the SPAF, its affiliated militias, and the SPLA/M interfered with relief efforts and attacked civilians. Various cease-fires were accepted but then broken by one party or the other throughout the year. At times, both sides adopted a more responsible policy toward the passage of relief supplies, but both sides also continued to block such supplies from time to time. In November the Government closed Sudanese air space to all relief flights, and the SPLA/M imposed a 72-hour advance notice requirement for relief flights. At year's end relief donors were apprehensive that the suffering of tens of thousands of civilians would continue and perhaps even worsen.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Government forces under both Sadiq and Omar were directly implicated in some instances of extrajudicial killing. In Meiram (Southern Kordofan) in April, soldiers beat to death a Dinka stopped at an army roadblock. Two of his companions were left bound for many hours and eventually had their arms amputated as a result. No charges were filed. In July a soldier in Omdurman shot a young boy who had apparently annoyed him selling cigarettes.

The Sadiq Government appeared to condone human rights abuses by the military. General Burma Nassir, reportedly the architect in the mid-1980s of the policy of arming the militias (which committed widespread human rights abuses), was appointed to high positions under Sadiq. Major General Abu Gurun similarly received career-enhancing promotions, although his tenure as commander in the Wau area was marked by abuses ranging from starvation to crucifixions.

Some actions by the Omar Government suggested a somewhat different attitude. General Burma Nassir was detained and Abu Gurun was forced to retire from government service. Soldiers recently accused of the revenge killings of 10-15 civilians and other atrocities in Wau were at least relieved, although not disciplined. The abolition of Sudan's formerly vigorous press hampered reporting of human rights abuses. Under the Sadiq Government, reports of extrajudicial killing appeared with some frequency in Sudanese newspapers.

b. Disappearance

Reports of disappearances were fragmentary, but numerous witnesses suggested that the army, security police, and militias in the Nuba Mountains region of Southern Kordofan were responsible for disappearances in 1989. One report alleged that Nuba tribesmen arrested for suspected SPLA/M affiliation were removed from holding areas and "disappeared," allegedly to provide space for new detainees. Tribal militias were also accused of abductions for forced labor and of practicing slavery, especially upon displaced Dinkas.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Both government and SPLA forces were accused of ill-treatment of civilians, (see Section 1.g.).

In 1983 under President Nimeiri, the Sudanese Government adopted a version of Shari'a (Islamic) law that prescribes harsh corporal punishments called "Hudud," also known as the

"September Laws." Similar provisions were proposed to the former constituent assembly in 1988 by Hassan al Turabi, Secretary General of the National Islamic Front (NIF), after the NIF's inclusion in the Government. The assembly set aside the proposal without rejecting it.

Hudud punishments include amputation, hanging, and beheading, and such sentences were handed down in 1989. As in 1988, however, no Hudud sentences were carried out under either the Sadiq or Omar Governments. Some 400 convicted prisoners still await execution of Hudud sentences. The Omar Government had not clarified its position on Hudud, and the SPLA/M strongly rejected suggestions of a national plebiscite on Shari'a. General Omar declared that the September Laws, which the SPLA/M strongly opposed and are a major barrier to peace, are negotiable, but the Government also reportedly recalled two architects of the September Laws to draft a new Islamic constitution.

By contrast, sentences of flogging were routinely passed and carried out before the coup. Reports indicated that the standard sentence for drinking alcohol was 40 lashes. Such punishments are often inflicted summarily. In August Khartoum police allegedly arrested two factory workers and a baker for curfew violations and immediately gave each 20 lashes.

Other reports since the coup suggest brutality by some soldiers, police, and security and prison officials. Boys selling items in the Khartoum markets were rounded up and beaten. Official sources acknowledged the floggings and roundups and promised closer supervision of the police. Although reported police brutality declined after this commitment was made, unnecessary harassment by security forces continued in 1989. There were also persistent reports of beatings and other forms of torture inflicted on detainees and others in government penal institutions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Sudan's Criminal Code continued substantially unchanged in 1989. Arrests must be followed by a statement of charges within a prescribed time, and the accused is to be brought before a court within 48 hours of arrest, informed of the charges, and allowed legal counsel. Bail is permitted except in some capital cases. But the state of emergency and martial law after the coup permit the Government wide powers of arrest and preventive detention for an indefinite period. Although most prisoners were allowed visitors, there were a few reports of prisoners held incommunicado, mostly trade unionists and Communists considered by the authorities to be troublemakers.

Military authorities in southern and western areas may detain people without charge on suspicion of cooperation or sympathy with the rebellion. As the incident at Meiram indicates (Section 1.a.), this power is sometimes abused.

Under the Sadiq Government, there were few political prisoners in northern Sudan. Fifteen persons were arrested, however, in December 1988 following an alleged coup attempt. They included a number of top politicians and former military officers who allegedly supported former President Nimeri. They were subsequently released after the June 30 coup.

The situation with regard to political detainees/prisoners changed dramatically with the coup on June 30. The Omar

SUDAN

Government suspended legal due process and declared a nationwide state of emergency (SOE) that gave the Government wide-ranging arbitrary powers. The Government initially detained without warrants more than 300 people, including many of Sudan's prominent political and academic figures. They were later joined by academics who had petitioned against the regime's actions and by about 60 judges. Many detainees, including Sadiq al Mahdi, remained confined without charge in Kobar and other prisons at the end of 1989. At least 35 trade unionists were transferred to Shala Prison in El Fasher, approximately 400 miles from Khartoum. In September several Communists were detained, allegedly for instigating a protest against the Government by students at Khartoum University.

When eight labor union leaders petitioned in August against the Omar Government's decree abolishing unions, they were also detained. Government officials later claimed that the unions had been a major source of Sudan's problems, and that the RCC would tolerate no challenge to its authority. These actions were condemned by other labor organizations, including the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations. When the doctors' union staged a nationwide strike in late November-early December, the Government detained about 30 physicians, at least one of whom was severely beaten. Several physicians were later tried, and two convicted, for "instigating discord and war against the State."

Conditions of imprisonment for the detainees in Kobar prison are relatively mild, and many were freed over the months following the coup. Sarra al-Fadil al-Mahdi, wife of Sadiq, was detained in September and confined under more rigorous conditions in Omdurman Women's Prison. Sadiq's other wife, Hafia Hussein Sherif, was also briefly detained but released. During this period the Government began to file charges, usually related to wrongful expenditure of public funds, against former officials of the Sadiq Government. Although summary arrest and detention procedures continued to be used, the Omar Government began to reconstruct a functioning if more politicized system of justice, and detentions on political grounds in northern Sudan became infrequent.

There were approximately 150 political detainees held without charge in Sudan at year's end.

There were no known cases of involuntary exile in 1989. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Under the Sadiq Government, the Sudanese legal system was controlled by the transitional constitution of 1985 and Sudanese legal codes, including the penal code adopted in September 1983 (the September Laws). In addition, the SOE law of December 1987 gave authorities extensive emergency powers.

The legal system involved a variety of courts, including the Supreme Court, civil, criminal, and Shari'a (Islamic) courts. Abolition in 1986 of the executive power to form special state security courts ensured that the regular criminal courts would try all prisoners. Such proceedings involved extensive guarantees of due process, including arrest pursuant to a warrant, public trials before a three-judge panel, the right of defendants to speak and present evidence on their own behalf and to obtain counsel, and appeals through a series of courts to the high court of appeals. Christian law graduates were and are required to pass a proficiency examination in Islamic law to practice law in Sudan. Tribal law continues to be important in rural areas, where disputes largely involve land, water, and family concerns. Courts also exist to monitor the activities of merchants and can impose prison sentences for fraud and operating without a business license.

Both the judicial system and the judiciary have changed since the coup. One of the RCC's first decrees on June 30 abolished the 1986 transitional constitution and transferred all power over Sudan's constitution and laws to the RCC. The same decree also provided that existing laws remained valid and that nonpolitical constitutional institutions continued, although they would be required to enforce any changes in the laws approved by the RCC. The RCC removed and detained some 60 judges, about one-tenth of the Sudanese bench. The judiciary was transferred to the Ministry of Justice, and the Chief Justice, formerly elected by sitting judges, was appointed by General Omar.

In place of the former system, a dual court structure based on three sources of law developed in 1989. Civilian courts continued to exist, albeit short of staff and less independent of the executive. Such courts continued to handle the large backlog of cases dating from before June 30. They applied the 1983 Criminal Code (the September Laws) to try ordinary criminal offenses, including theft and even some capital crimes; civil cases continued to be handled largely according to previous laws, generally derived from British colonial models. Other courts were established to monitor conformity with government-established prices for certain goods.

The RCC also established numerous special military tribunals, typically comprised of three field-grade officers. These courts were used extensively to try officials from the Sadiq Government. In each case, the defendants were charged with crimes against the 1983 Criminal Code, usually corruption. The defendants were allowed counsel of their choice. In the first such case, however, involving former Supreme Council member Idris al Banna, the defendant's attorney was not allowed to present a defense. Defendants subsequently were formally granted the right to counsel, and it was announced that Idris al Banna would be allowed to appeal the denial of effective counsel in his case. The trials were televised and open to the public.

The military courts also tried nonpolitical civilian defendants accused of offenses specified in the SOE. Such crimes included possession of hashish and currency-exchange violations. The military courts also try offenses against the decrees of the RCC, which, along with the 1983 Penal Code and the SOE law, comprise the current Sudanese criminal code. Sentences given convicted defendants, both political and nonpolitical, have been severe by Sudanese standards, including long prison terms and confiscation of property.

An RCC decree on June 30 allowed the seizure of land, money, or commodities for the public welfare without reimbursement and for the seizure of the property of businesses under suspicion of resisting the Omar Government (pending legal determination of the case). These decrees were used to enforce price controls.

SUDAN

Late in 1989 the military courts, which tried a limited number of cases, were discontinued in favor of state security courts, each staffed by three civilian judges. Like the military tribunals, these courts constitute a separate group of security courts parallel to the regular criminal and civil system. They are intended to try persons accused of violations of constitutional decrees, emergency regulations, and some sections of the penal code, but defendants in these courts receive greater benefit from due process provisions than did those in the former military courts, including the assistance of counsel empowered to address the court and access to a court of appeals.

In November the Government created another new set of security courts. According to the Special Courts Act of November 29, the military governors of the regions and the commissioner of the national capital can form special courts with jurisdiction parallel to that of the state security courts. The special security courts can be formed of three military officers or any three competent persons, and those created had both military and civilian judges. Attorneys can sit with defendants as "friends of the court" and advise them, but cannot themselves address the court. Sentences given by the special security courts are to be implemented immediately, except that death sentences must be approved by the Chief Justice and the Head of State. Defendants can file appeal briefs with the Chief Justice. The Government referred most security cases to these courts, leaving the civilian state security courts largely without a docket.

The special security courts quickly became noted for their severe sentences. In December two defendants convicted of illegal possession of foreign currency and a third defendant convicted of currency smuggling were sentenced to death, as was a physician convicted of involvement in an illegal strike by doctors. Another physician involved in the strike was sentenced to 15 years in prison; two other physicians were acquitted. Despite international protests, on December 17 one of those convicted of currency violations was hanged, along with a drug trafficker convicted earlier.

In practice, the military courts and the succeeding special revolutionary courts applied a mix of precoup laws and postcoup decrees. The Attorney General's Office allegedly monitors the trials of political prisoners, but its influence is unclear.

The military courts convicted less than 100, perhaps even fewer than 50 defendants during their 3-month existence.

Large areas of the south are controlled by the SPLA/M. Reports indicated that a rudimentary system of justice based on village leaders was being used in some of these areas, and a similar system of justice was authorized by the Government late in 1989 for the war-torn province of South Kordofan. Under this system, a trusted village elder is appointed to adjudicate disputes, as well as to collect taxes and recruit soldiers and labor for the SPLA/M. SPLA offenders can be tried and have reportedly been severely punished. Other portions of these areas are outside effective judicial procedures, and those accused are often not provided recognizable due process. Some reports suggest that army units summarily try and punish those accused of crimes, especially offenses against civil order.

SUDAN

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government surveillance in Sudan, outside the combat zones, was rare before the coup. After June 30, security agencies considerably expanded both the scope and intensity of their activities throughout Sudan. Reports were received of petty harassment of civilians and surveillance of church services by security officers. After their release from detention in December, leading political figures Mohamed Osman al Mirghani and Hassan al Turabi were confined to house arrest, their families were kept under surveillance, and all visitors other than family were required to obtain government permission. Complaints about searches of homes without warrants also increased. In one case, armed police or soldiers without warrants reportedly entered homes in the Khartoum area occupied by displaced persons from southern Sudan. They allegedly confiscated equipment used for home brewing (a traditional if illegal moneymaking sideline for southern Sudanese women), marked the homes with red paint, and forbade the families to reenter them.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Both government forces and government-affiliated militias as well as the SPLA/M used excessive force and acted contrary to humanitarian law. Allegations of chemical weapons use by the SPAF, however, appeared unfounded.

In January witnesses reported that in Allubi (Southern Kordofan) in December 1988 some 150 SPAF soldiers and 5 officers engaged in a spree of looting, rape, and torture of civilians. Other reports suggested similar activities by the SPAF in the area of Tira El Akhdar that resulted in the burning of seven villages and the killing of eight villagers. Other reports of such activities, including in the west, were received following the coup. In several cases, army units reacted to perceived SPLA/M attacks by ferociously attacking the Dinka sections of nearby towns, killing substantial numbers of villagers. In one case, the unit commander reportedly was transferred, but no reports were received of disciplinary action against the soldiers who committed the atrocities. Government forces in Malakal forbade civilians to leave the town with enough rations to return to their villages and plant crops, effectively making the civilians prisoners in the town. East of Wau, the SPAF reportedly established a "free-fire zone" to discourage settlement. Army officers have also admitted rape and theft of relief supplies by soldiers in southern garrisons.

A particularly notable violation of humanitarian law occurred in the eastern Equatoria town of Torit, a center for relief activities. On June 1 an SPAF bomber appeared over the airport at Torit, which had recently been occupied by the SPLA/M. The plane made two runs on the airport, dropping several large bombs that narrowly missed a German Air Force transport, looted a relief agency and appropriately marked. Representatives of several donor nations protested the attack, which also caused a temporary suspension of German airborne relief in the area. A similar bombing was reported at about the same time on a village near Torit, resulting in several wounded civilians. After the fall of Kurmuk to the SPLA/M in October, SPAF planes bombed the SPLA-held towns of Yirol and Waat. The attack on Yirol killed 4 civilians and wounded 10, and bombs narrowly missed a clearly marked ICRC hospital. The Government subsequently denied responsibility for these two incidents.

Information on SPLA/M violations of humanitarian law has been more difficult to obtain. SPLA/M forces, however, reportedly raped displaced persons fleeing besieged towns and were accused of planting land mines indiscriminately in the war zone. There are reports that during the siege of Juba the SPLA fired rockets into the town on several occasions. These attacks reportedly killed more than 20 people, most of them women and children. In the Juba area, the SPLA also stole relief food from the inhabitants. When the SPLA/M took the town of Torit in February, SPLA fighters reportedly pillaged, raped, and killed civilians there. In late December, a relief plane of the French organization Medicins Sans Frontieres was shot down while taking off from the government-held town of Aweil. The Government stated that the SPLA/M was responsible, but there was no independent confirmation of that claim.

Government forces and government-armed militias were accused of attacking groups fleeing the widening area of the conflict, preventing civilians from growing their own food through indiscriminate planting of land mines, and confiscating relief supplies intended for civilians for sale on the black market. The government-armed tribal militias (especially members of the Misseriyyah, Fertit, Taposa, and Ruzeigat tribes) made many attacks on their longstanding tribal opponents, particularly the Dinka, the most important source of support for the SPLA/M. In late December, Arab militia of the Sabha tribe killed over 200 Shilluk tribesmen in El Jebelein in reprisal for the murder of an Arab landowner. The Government announced several arrests and an investigation of the incident. Militia activity was especially vicious in the Nuba Mountains region of Southern Kordofan. The Sadiq Government routinely ignored abuses of human rights by the militias. In July the Omar Government brokered a settlement in El Fasher that reduced strife between the Fur tribe and government-armed groups that had been attacking the Fur.

However, the Omar Government was not able to disarm the militias, which also received weapons through neighboring states, including Chad. In November a government decree establishing "Popular Defense Forces" substantially implemented a controversial proposal, initially made under the Sadiq government by the National Islamic Front and parts of the Umma party, to legitimate the militias. Government control over the militias remained limited in 1989, although the decree suggested means for closer government supervision. A portion of one militia group, the Anyanya II, turned against the Government and now supports the SPLA/M; another faction remained loyal to the Government. In one case, the portion of the Anyanya II militia loyal to the Government reportedly visited villages near Abyei and engaged repeatedly in pillage, torture, killing, and rape of civilians who they alleged were SPLA/M supporters. Instances of enslavement of displaced persons and refugees were also reported (see Section 5). One observer found these areas ruled by "the law of the gun." Despite these limitations of control, the Government's historic policy of providing weapons to the militias and failing to investigate or punish atrocities committed by them associates the Government with the militias' actions. The SPLA/M also reportedly armed tribal militias in the Nuba area, although on a smaller scale.

SUDAN

Both sides in the civil war took prisoners, although the SPAF reportedly held only SPLA/M officers. The ICRC was able to visit 8 SPLA/M prisoners held by the Government and 150 government prisoners held by the SPLA/M. The total number of prisoners visited is only a small number of the prisoners held by both sides.

Both sides interfered with relief operations in 1989. Before the coup, Prime Minister Sadiq al Mahdi acknowledged the unauthorized distribution of relief supplies by a local official from stocks at Aweil. The SPLA/M reportedly attacked some relief convoys moving through SPLA/M-controlled territory. Other convoys were held up by negotiations between the Government and the SPLA/M over the proportion of supplies to be left in SPLA/M hands. Heavy mining on some southern roads greatly obstructed movement of relief convoys by land. Civilians suffered from mistreatment by some local townspeople, attacks by armed militias, occasional military harassment of relief workers, and lack of humanitarian assistance from the army and SPLA/M themselves. Movement of food supplies by land to Juba, the largest town in the south, was blocked by the SPLA/M, forcing the 300,000 residents to rely on the uncertainties of airlift.

While civilian deaths in the civil war and tribal fighting were again high in 1989, interference or failure of both sides in the civil war to cooperate with food relief efforts and the subsequent closure of airspace to relief flights, government corruption and inefficiency, and lack of medical treatment continued to be the major causes of death in the areas affected by the civil war in 1989. Overall in 1989 there were fewer deaths than in 1988, due in part to massive humanitarian efforts and intermittent cooperation. This improvement was threatened in November by the Government's closure of Sudanese air space to relief flights following the fall of Kurmuk, to which the SPLA/M responded by imposing a 72-hour notification rule for flights over SPLA/M-held territory.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Under the Sadiq Government, Sudanese citizens had substantial freedom of speech and press, at least outside the war-torn southern areas. Parliamentary debate was free and criticism of the Government intense. Print media were lively and expressed a wide variety of Sudanese opinion. Political parties published their own newspapers, and independent journals presented a full range of opinions. Human rights abuses were often, if not always reliably, reported on, especially by English-language newspapers. Radio, television, and the Sudanese News Agency (SUNA) were under government control and tended to reflect government policies. Academic freedom was generally respected, and student groups held free elections for their leaders.

Despite this substantial freedom of the press, there were limitations. In early 1989 the Sadiq Government fired the SUNA management, reportedly for not being sufficiently Islamic in their reporting. At the same time, the Cabinet began reconsideration of a new press law that would have imposed substantial limits on reporting, including banning attacks on religions and on Sudan's foreign policy. In March the Sadiq Government used the SOE law to arrest the editor of a biweekly newspaper, producing a protest from the Sudanese Journalists Association.

SUDAN

The coup on June 30 radically changed this situation. Public expression of opposition viewpoints was banned; the broadcast media were tightly controlled; and licenses for all nongovernment publications were cancelled. For some time the only internal news sources were the SPAF organ Armed Forces, SUNA, and radio and television--all government controlled. In August the Omar Government authorized a second daily newspaper, Modern Sudan. In September a third journal, National Salvation, appeared. Modern Sudan and National Salvation became the general daily papers, and Armed Forces returned to its previous situation as an irregularly published organ for the armed forces. All three journals reflect government views and are in Arabic only. Also in September Sudanow, an English-language government magazine, reappeared in a limited press run.

Although a new press law under discussion could permit independent publications in the future, early return to the previous conditions of press freedom is unlikely.

Academic freedom in Sudan has generally been respected, but many university professors felt less secure after the coup. A few professors and other leading intellectuals were detained or taken in for questioning, although most were soon released. An early decree of the RCC forbade universities to shut down in protest.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Despite the banning of demonstrations under the SOE law by the Sadiq Government, protests and marches periodically occurred. The National Islamic Front (NIF) held numerous demonstrations against the Sadiq Government in April, some of which became violent. The SOE and banning of political activity decreed on June 30 effectively eliminated the right to protest, and a large student demonstration at the University of Khartoum December 6 was firmly controlled by police forces, killing two students.

Before the coup, Sudan had many political organizations and parties. Professional and business associations met regularly. They were routinely given the required permits and licenses, and, outside the war zones in the south and west, the Government usually did not become involved in their proceedings.

On June 30, the RCC decreed that the registrations of all nonreligious groups were canceled, and the groups were effectively disbanded. In September the Government put forward a program for reregistration of voluntary organizations. As long as political activity remains banned, it is unlikely that such organizations, even if reregistered, would play the active role in politics that some did before the coup.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Sudan is a multireligious country in both fact and law. Islam and Christianity have both been formally recognized as religions of Sudan, but adherents of other beliefs are not legally restricted. Muslims are a majority in the five northern regions and the capital, although the presence in these areas of over 3 million displaced persons from the south (an area predominantly Christian and animist) is affecting this balance. Foreign clergy may enter Sudan with certain restrictions. They are most likely to be admitted if they have certain technical skills, such as publishing, that are difficult to obtain in Sudan; clergy without special skills are less likely to be admitted. In general, clergy are admitted to serve their own religious communities. Proselytizing by Muslims is allowed, as is proselytizing by Christians of non-Muslims; but proselytizing of Muslims is discouraged and can provoke reactions. Religious believers are free to engage in religious education and to participate in religiously related charitable activities.

Despite these provisions, Islam has traditionally been favored by the Government. Under the Foreign Missionary Society Act of 1962, public Christian religious activity is subject to close government supervision. Among other provisions, the Act forbids the construction of churches without government permits, which have not been issued for more than 10 years. The Sudan Catholic Bishops' Conference and the Sudan Council of Churches both protested in 1989 against the Act, whose broad provisions were often capriciously interpreted by local officials.

Several incidents exacerbated sectarian tensions in 1989. Before the coup, government officials in the south reportedly seized property belonging to Christian churches, refused to return it, and threatened those who protested the seizure. In April the NIF, then in opposition, called for a "holy war" against the Government and its supporters. Local groups inspired by this appeal apparently interpreted it as an incitement to attack Christian establishments. In the last 2 weeks of April, attacks were made against Christian churches, centers, and schools in En Nahud (Northern Kordofan Province), Port Sudan (Red Sea), El Kamlin (El Gezira), and two establishments in Omdurman. In one of the Omdurman incidents, a charity center operated by the Sisters of Mother Teresa of Calcutta was attacked by a mob incited by the imam of a nearby mosque. One of the nuns was severely beaten and the center was stoned. The imam was arrested and sentenced to 2 months in jail for disturbing the peace. In En Nahud, a Catholic Church compound was invaded by a mob of NIF supporters, who looted and ransacked the nuns' quarters and the parish offices. No one was reported arrested for this attack. The Sadiq Government discouraged participation in the NIF-led demonstrations but did not use its emergency powers to ban them.

In another incident, a Catholic catechist was reportedly jailed and robbed by security forces in El Daein in Southern Darfur. Personal papers he was carrying were also allegedly destroyed, and one of the officers reportedly demanded that he say Muslim prayers in order to be freed, which he refused to do. After holding him for 11 days in custody without charge, they released him at Umm Ruwaba in Northern Kordofan. No reports were received of disciplinary actions against the security officials involved.

When the SPLA/M captured Torit in February, its fighters reportedly ransacked the home of Archbishop Paride Taban, taking religious articles, vestments, books, and other property. They also took the Archbishop and three Catholic priests into custody and held them incommunicado for 2 months. After international protests to the SPLA/M, they were released in mid-May.

The coup on June 30 did not substantially affect religious activities in Sudan. Religious organizations continued to function essentially as before, and the decree revoking the registration of other voluntary organizations exempted religious bodies.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement in Sudan is hampered by the civil war, a very limited transportation infrastructure, and government restrictions. Exit visas are required to leave Sudan, a requirement that has been used to restrict travel abroad. A married Sudanese woman must have the permission of her husband or another male relative to travel abroad, and regulations specify that unmarried Sudanese women must travel with a family member or other sponsor. The travel restrictions for women were generally ignored before the coup, but after June 30 they were increasingly strictly enforced. Reports were received of several women refused permission to board at Khartoum airport because security officials did not believe they had the required permission or escort. Foreigners must register with the police on entering the country, obtain permission to move from one location to another, and register again at the new location within 3 days of arrival.

After the coup, the Omar Government imposed additional travel restrictions. A curfew was instituted in much of Sudan, and suspected curfew violators are subject to detention or summary floggings. Initially the Omar Government heavily restricted travel abroad by Sudanese, and immediately after the coup closed the Khartoum airport except for travel to Mecca in Saudi Arabia by Muslim pilgrims. A government spokesman stated in August that travel abroad (other than to Egypt) for medical treatment was forbidden, explaining these measures as necessary for improving production in Sudan. In practice, Sudanese have experienced little difficulty in leaving the country since the coup. Although Sudanese could move about the country freely both before and after the coup, the Omar Government tightened travel restrictions on foreigners (especially diplomats), principally by requiring travel permits that are sometimes difficult to obtain. These restrictions sometimes hampered relief efforts.

The situation of displaced persons and refugees improved in 1989 by comparison with 1988. Natural catastrophes were less severe, and under the umbrella of Operation Lifeline Sudan relief supplies moved more easily than in 1988. Although mass resettlement plans for the summer of 1989 were not carried out, some forced resettlement reportedly occurred in the Khartoum area in November and December, as well as in areas affected by the civil war. The SPAF reportedly forced farmers south of Kadugli to move from their villages, causing a major influx of families into the town of Kadugli. Reports of widespread starvation declined, but refugees and displaced persons continued to lack medicines and other necessities.

Overall, Sudan's inability to resolve the civil war left the number of displaced persons at about the 1988 level of some 3 million. Many of these people were concentrated in shantytowns and squatter huts in and around Khartoum.

SUDAN

Sudan's foreign refugee population (largely composed of Ethiopians, Ugandans, and Chadians) was about 700,000. Sudan has not forced the repatriation of refugees and has generally accorded good treatment to refugees, although years of influx have nearly exhausted the meager available resources for refugees. Administrative problems halted almost all resettlement of refugees to third countries from May 1988 to April 1989, but the Omar Government seemed to have corrected these problems by the end of 1989.

Large numbers of refugees have settled in the cities, especially the capital area. Refugees are restricted in their freedom to travel and own property, as are most non-Sudanese. They also are not permitted to become resident aliens or citizens of Sudan, regardless of the length of their stay.

An exception to the generally good treatment of refugees in Sudan was the situation of Falashas (Ethiopian Jews) in Umrakoba Camp. This group of 54 has been sequestered since 1984, has often been denied access to United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) protection officers, and receives minimal support from the Sudanese Government, which runs the camp. They are denied permission to travel and isolated from the general population of the camp, and they reportedly do not receive adequate health care.

Urban refugees face considerable problems. Reports of harassment and petty thievery by police against refugees, beatings for minor infractions of the law, administrative obstruction and delays, and the need for small bribes to obtain everything from work permits to food-ration cards are common in urban areas. Refugees seldom have recourse to the legal system when attacked by policemen. The UNHCR Protection Officer reported that one group of refugees was imprisoned without charge when found at the scene of a murder. Although the murderer was promptly identified as Sudanese, the refugees remained in prison for 8 weeks.

The Omar Government did not change the policy of the Sadiq Government, instituted in 1987, of accepting genuine political refugees but refusing refugees from famine.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

At the end of 1989, a military regime ruled, and the people of Sudan had neither the right nor the ability peacefully to change their government. A government spokesman declared that this situation will not change soon. In September the RCC issued its "Third Constitutional Decree" establishing a new governmental system for Sudan. It featured a head of state (General Omar) with sovereign powers. The all-military RCC continued as the legislative authority. A cabinet was established consisting of a prime minister and other ministers, all appointed by the RCC. The Cabinet was given essentially administrative authority subject to the Head of State and the RCC. The courts were brought under the Head of State's supervision, and courts were specifically forbidden to review acts of the RCC or the Head of State.

Under the Sadiq Government, Sudan had a multiparty parliamentary system that guaranteed the right of citizens to change their government. The system did not extend to large parts of the south, where the civil war prevented the holding of elections in 1986 in about half the electoral districts in southern Sudan, leaving empty 41 of the 301 seats in the constituent assembly. The democratic Government could not end the civil war as it was repeatedly deadlocked on the political/religious issue of the constitutional basis of government. A strict Islamic-based criminal code including Hudud punishments was proposed in 1988 but never passed, although the Shari'a-based provisions of the September Laws were never repealed and constituted a major issue in the civil war. The Sadiq Government was never able to meet its goal of holding a national constitutional conference.

When they assumed power on June 30, the military leaders justified their action largely by citing the ineffectiveness of the democratic government. Claiming sectarian bickering as harmful to Sudan, they abolished all political parties, seized (and later distributed) the parties' assets, and detained (albeit in relatively mild conditions) the leaders of many precoup parties. RCC decrees banned all political activity and political parties. Under both the Sadiq and Omar Governments, local and provincial officials were appointed by the authorities in the capital. Most local officials appointed after the coup were military officers.

The military Government publicly assigned a high priority to ending the civil war. However, by the end of 1989 there had been very little movement. John Garang, the leader of the SPLA, has called for a "restructured, unified Sudan, a multinationality country."

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has traditionally been acutely sensitive to local or foreign criticism of its human rights performance. Several international human rights groups work actively in Sudan. General Omar also invited a group of Western ambassadors to examine the conditions of detention for political detainees in Kobar prison, and the visit took place on August 12. In September the Dinka intellectual, Francis Deng, who is based in Washington, was also permitted to see many political detainees in Kobar, including Sadiq al Mahdi, Mohamed Osman Mirghani, and Hassan al Turabi.

Local human rights activists in Sudan have complained of being regarded as subversive, and many reportedly were called in for questioning by security officials both before and after the coup. Neither the Sadiq nor the Omar Government instituted any public investigations of alleged human rights abuses in 1989. In late November, however, the Government received a delegation from Amnesty International to discuss detention without trial and other human rights concerns.

Until June 30, Sudan had several active organizations monitoring human rights in the country, including the Sudan Human Rights Association (SHRA), the Sudan Bar Association (SBA), and the Sudan Catholic Bishops' Conference. Neither of the first two produced in 1989 detailed studies of human rights abuses in Sudan, and their status since the coup is uncertain. The Bishops' Conference still exists and actively monitors human rights concerns; its bimonthly newsletter publicizes violations of human rights, especially those involving religious discrimination. In late 1989, both the Bishops' Conference and the Sudan Council of Churches drafted public letters protesting religious discrimination.

SUDANSection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

Sudan's population of 24.5 million (1989) is a multiethnic mix of over 500 Arab and African tribes, with scores of languages and dialects. In general, Sudan is composed primarily of two cultures--Arab in the north and central areas and black African in the south. Sudanese governments have historically been dominated by northern Muslims (about 16 million). Some southern tribal groups, especially non-Arabs and non-Muslims, have demanded greater economic and political power and greater recognition of Sudan's cultural diversity.

Discrimination in the north by the Muslim Arab majority against displaced persons from the south is common, and many reports were received in the past of attacks by Arab tribes in the south against non-Arab southerners, especially members of the Dinka tribe. Residents of Arabic-speaking areas who do not themselves speak Arabic are discriminated against in education, jobs, and other opportunities. University of Khartoum entrance examinations also favor Arabic speakers. Widespread popular attitudes in these areas also stereotype dark-skinned non-Arab southerners as inferior and lazy, leading to much informal discrimination against them.

Sudanese laws continue to favor men, and men and women traditionally have segregated roles. Islamic laws of inheritance award additional property to men, while concurrently assigning them the duty of caring for their extended families. Although education is freely open to both sexes and many women obtain university education, women traditionally receive less education and have fewer opportunities than do men. Some women, however, have been active in the professions, the media, education, and politics, and at least one female presides over a court. Although not numerous, women are found in both the police and the military. Labor laws allegedly do not adequately protect the self-employed, the bulk of the female work force. However, one of the relatively few women's rights activists in Sudan noted at an international conference in 1989 that Sudanese women often did not avail themselves of the rights and opportunities available to them, including access to the court system.

Female genital mutilation (circumcision) is prevalent in Sudan. Reports indicate that this practice, although officially illegal, is very widespread, especially in the north. Some reports suggest that over 90 percent of northern women have been circumcised, with consequences that include severe urinary problems, infections, and even death. The so-called Pharaonic circumcision, the most severe of the three forms of circumcision, is the most common and is usually performed between the ages of 4 and 7 years. Few physicians will perform the operation, which is most often done by paramedical personnel in improvised, often unsanitary conditions. The operation reportedly is expensive--approximately $111 at the legal exchange rate--for a 10-minute procedure. Southern women displaced to the north are increasingly visiting circumcision on their daughters, even if they themselves are not circumcised.

Women refugees are particularly vulnerable to harassment and sexual abuse. Sexual favors are reportedly demanded of them by some Sudanese officials in exchange for performance of official duties. Stories of rape of women refugees by policemen are common, and women refugees without a male provider are sometimes forced into prostitution to earn a living.

Among certain southern tribes, forcible sexual intercourse is common. No blame attaches to the practice, although the man involved must pay a price (often in livestock) to the woman's family if she becomes pregnant. In the same area, wives are often received on a trial basis lasting up to 4 years. The husband may dissolve the marriage during this time by returning the wife to her family, although he must pay a price for each child born during this time. Returned wives are reportedly often able to contract further marriages and are not stigmatized by having been returned.

The extent to which wife beating occurs is unknown; it is not discussed as a public issue, and police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes. There were no known reports of wife beating in 1989, and no court cases involving either circumcision or violence against women. However, for a variety of reasons, many women would be reluctant to file a formal complaint of such abuse.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Sudan had a strong labor union movement during the period of the Sadiq government. Prominent labor organizations included the Sudanese Workers Trade Union Federation (SWTUF), which represented blue-collar workers, the white-collar Sudanese Employees and Clerks Federation (SFETU), the Sudanese Teachers Federation, and a number of professional associations. Sudanese unions lobbied actively and participated in international, African, and Arab labor organizations. Except for some government employees, strikes were legally permissible after exhausting other measures to resolve disputes. Technically illegal strikes were common and usually tolerated.

The RCC's constitutional decree number 1 of June 30 abolished all labor unions and forbade strikes. Labor union offices were closed, and union assets were frozen. Many (probably over 100) union officials, especially those active in political parties, were detained or placed under house arrest between July and September, some for protesting the Government's action. Many were quickly released, but at least 35 union officials remained imprisoned in Shala Prison in late 1989, and others were detained elsewhere. In September General Omar announced the legalization of preliminary committees to manage union affairs, pending the drafting of new laws on union organization. Under this rubric, the SWTUF was restored, with its leadership unchanged, and its assets returned. Two other labor groups were also reinstated, and efforts were under way to legalize the remaining unions at the end of the year. Union officials were promised substantial participation in the process of developing new labor legislation.

Although the Government pledged to respect all labor rights required by the International Labor Organization (ILO), it continued to forbid strikes, as well as all labor activity by unreinstated unions. The doctors' union, which had not been reinstated, staged a nationwide strike in late November and early December to protest the firing of government-employed physicians and to demand removal of the Omar Government and restoration of democracy. In December a special security court convicted two doctors of leading the strike. One was sentenced to death, the other to 15 years in prison. Reports also indicated that several members of the engineers union were detained in December to prevent a suspected strike.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Under the 1985 transitional constitution, suspended on June 30, workers had the right to organize and to bargain collectively, and unions did so actively. There were no official constraints on union membership, and labor laws were applied uniformly throughout the country (although with little effect in the war areas). Job creation and union membership were limited primarily by Sudan's shattered economy.

On June 30 the RCC suspended the right to organize and bargain collectively. These rights were restored to legalized unions in September. Labor laws and practices are uniform throughout the territory controlled by the Government.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Sudanese law strictly prohibits forced or compulsory labor. Allegations of slavery, however, persisted in Sudan in 1989, and the issue remained controversial. Although the Government frequently denies the existence of slavery, Prime Minister Sadiq al Mahdi acknowledged that Dinka children were enslaved by Arab tribes and claimed that Arab children were taken by Dinka tribes. He described the practice as a longstanding one, involving mutual raiding and taking of captives, but condemned it as "illegal" and "immoral." Slavery reportedly exists primarily in remote parts of Sudan, especially those where government control is weak and where displaced persons fleeing the war zones come into contact with armed groups. Informed sources suggest there could be many slaves in Sudan, largely women and children doing agricultural and domestic work and serving as concubines.

The revival of slavery is often blamed on economic pressures and the civil war, especially the practice of arming tribal militias. Most of the slaves allegedly are Dinkas abducted by Arab militias, especially the Rizeigat and Misseriyah. One report by a former army officer indicated that his entire family had been killed or taken into slavery after a Rizeigat attack on their village in 1987. Reports have also been received in the past of Dinka children sold into slavery by their parents to prevent their possible starvation.

Reports suggested that the SPLA/M often forced southern men to work as laborers or porters or forcibly conscripted them into SPLA ranks. In disputed territories this practice was implemented through raids, while in SPLA/M-controlled areas it was done through the SPLA/M-appointed village leader.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum age for workers is 16. This law is enforced in the official or wage economy, but poverty in Sudan produces widespread child labor in the informal economy. In rural areas, children from a very young age assist their families with agricultural work.

SUDAN

Although Sudanese laws prescribe health and safety standards, working conditions are generally poor and enforcement of environmental standards is minimal. Unemployment and underemployment are major problems in Sudan, especially among young people. Even graduates of prestigious schools have difficulty finding employment after graduation.

Sudan limits the legal opportunities for employment for refugees to menial or marginally skilled jobs. Fortunate refugees find employment with an international organization, but most are forced to take jobs far below their training or abilities. Rural refugees often find work as field laborers, earning the equivalent of a few pennies a day. Urban refugees find employment as day laborers or domestic help. The lack of legal opportunities to earn a living wage forces many into illegal activities such as smuggling, black-marketeering, moonshining, and prostitution.

The workweek is currently limited to 6 days and 48 hours, with 1 day of rest on Friday. After the coup, the Omar Government announced it was considering adopting a 5-day workweek. Laborers receive an extra month's pay for each year's labor. Most workers are given allowances for transportation, and some receive housing allowances. Labor standards are enforced in the public and private official economies but not in rural areas or in the informal economy. The minimum wage remains at the 1988 level of $67 per month at the official exchange rate. This salary is far from sufficient for subsistence in urban areas, and workers often must rely on farming, second jobs, or help from the extended family. Salaries in private industry are generally higher than those in the public sector.

SWAZILAND

Swaziland is governed as a modified traditional monarchy with all executive, legislative, and judicial powers ultimately vested in the King. Advised by the Queen Mother, traditional figures, and cabinet ministers, he rules according to Swazi law and custom, never codified but ultimately determined by himself and his advisors. Swaziland's Government features both "modern" and "traditional" branches--a cabinet, parliament, and courts which follow Western law, and a tribal hierarchy with "national" courts which follow traditional Swazi law and custom. The Cabinet is appointed by the King from among Members of Parliament and is responsible to him. While Swaziland obtained a constitution containing a bill of rights at independence, it was repealed by King Sobhuza II in 1973 on the grounds that it introduced political practices which were incompatible with the Swazi tradition of decisionmaking.

National defense is provided by the Umbutfo Swaziland Defense Force, consisting of fewer than 3,000 troops. The Royal Swaziland Police is the primary internal security organization. These forces must cope with the spillover from southern African regional conflicts. The use of Swaziland by the African National Congress (ANC) as a transit corridor into South Africa has led to occasional confrontations involving ANC members, South African security forces, and Swazi authorities. The influx of Mozambican refugees has placed an additional strain on the Swazi security apparatus. Both the police and the defense force answer to civilian authorities.

Swaziland has a free-market economy, with relatively little government intervention in the marketplace. The majority of Swazis are engaged in subsistence agriculture. The success of the economy depends largely on the export sector, which is composed primarily of large, foreign-owned firms. Most imports come from South Africa.

While human rights are generally respected in Swaziland, there are important restrictions on free speech, assembly, and political rights. Other human rights problems include abuse of prisoners, arbitrary detention, and discrimination (including violence) against women.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports or allegations in 1989 of such killings by agents of the Swazi Government. However, in February three South Africans, believed to be ANC-affiliated, were shot to death in what was thought to be a politically motivated killing. There were unsubstantiated charges, that agents of the South African security forces were responsible; the murders remain unsolved. In June an ANC member was convicted of murdering a Swazi citizen. The ANC member claimed he had shot in self-defense, mistaking the victim for a South African Defense Force agent.

There were no reports of disappearance in 1989.

SWAZILAND

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture, as a rule, is not practiced in Swaziland. However, there are occasional allegations made by prisoners of police and military threats and beatings. Complaints generally come from criminal, not political, prisoners. Police have also been accused of transporting persons they have arrested in the trunks of their cars. Defendants occasionally claim that confessions have been extorted by the police and that these confessions are sometimes accepted by the courts. Caning can be administered to youths involved in either petty or violent crimes.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Swazi law requires warrants for arrests in all but certain exceptional circumstances. These exceptions, however, are poorly defined and, in practice, police who have strong suspicions about a suspect do not normally seek a warrant. Detainees are allowed to consult with a lawyer of their own choice, and provision for bail exists. A 1978 law permits the Government to detain any person without charge for a renewable period of 60 days. Detention under this law cannot be appealed to the courts, though it may be appealed directly to the Monarch. The law, invoked several times in 1988, was again used in 1989.

In February nine persons were detained under 60-day orders for their suspected involvement in a prison escape plot with political overtones. Six of the detainees were released after 60 days, while three had their detentions renewed for an additional 60 days before being released. Two of the detainees were subsequently charged for assisting in the escape and brought to trial.

In July a 60-day detention order was invoked against the Secretary General of the Swaziland Union of Financial and Allied Workers. He was released after 4 days in detention following a public outcry against his arrest.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The modern judiciary consists of the Court of Appeals, the High Court, and various subordinate magistrates' courts which are independent of executive and military control and free from intimidation from outside forces. Some members of the judiciary are not Swazi but are appointed from the bars of other countries with compatible legal systems. In magistrates' courts, the defendant is entitled to counsel at his or her own expense. Court-appointed counsel is provided in capital cases or where difficult points of law are at issue. There are well-defined appeal procedures up to the Court of Appeals, the highest judicial body. The right of appeal, however, is not guaranteed to persons held under the 1978 detention law or to those charged with sedition or an offense against the King.

The right to a fair public trial is provided for by law and is honored in practice, although the court president can order a trial to be held in camera in certain (e.g., rape) cases. The Prime Minister can also require that a trial be held in private, but this is rare. In sedition cases, the Prime Minister may order that proceedings be held in camera before a special tribunal appointed by the King. The special tribunal may, if it deems it appropriate, adopt rules and procedures apart from those applied in the High Court. In 1987 King Mswati III issued the tribunal decree, which permitted the formation of a special tribunal to try offenses committed against the King and Queen Mother. This decree permits in camera sessions and forbids the accused from having legal representation. The decisions of the tribunal cannot be appealed. There were no trials by special tribunal in 1989.

Amnesty International's 1989 Report criticizes the 1987-88 treason trial of 10 persons before the special tribunal on the grounds the defendants were not permitted legal representation and were denied any right of appeal. Nine of the 10 persons were given royal pardons in 1988, but one, Prince Mtanasibdi Dlamini, remained in prison at the end of 1989, serving an earlier sentence imposed for obstructing justice.

In traditional courts, where ethnic Swazis may be brought for relatively minor offenses and violations of Swazi traditional laws or customs, legal counsel is not allowed, but defendants may speak on their own behalf. Sentences are subject to a review system and appeal to the High Court and the Court of Appeals. Accused persons who desire counsel can insist that their case be transferred from the traditional courts. There are occasional disagreements over which court system should have jurisdiction in a particular case. By law, the public prosecutor has the authority to determine which court should hear the case. However, there have been instances of the police determining where a case should be tried. Unless the defendant, who may be unaware of his or her legal rights, protests the decision, cases may be tried in the wrong court system, and this fact never comes to light.

Prisoners frequently complain of undue delays in their cases coming to trial. Such delays are generally the result of bureaucratic inertia rather than a deliberate policy. A prisoner charged with motor vehicle theft went on a hunger strike in April to protest a 6-month delay in his case being tried. He was tried and sentenced 2 weeks later.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The law generally requires that a warrant be issued by a magistrate before police may search homes or other premises. However, the law also provides police officers with the rank of subinspector or higher the right to search without a warrant if they have reasonable cause to do so. Generally, this provision is meant to allow the police to obtain evidence that might otherwise be lost through delay in obtaining a warrant. While searches without warrants do occur relatively frequently in Swaziland, the issue of legality of evidence, or of the method by which evidence is obtained, rarely arises in court. While there is no evidence that the Government actively monitors private correspondence or conversation, the Swazi police have been known to apprehend and interrogate persons reported to have made objectionable statements about the King during the course of private conversation or in telegraphic correspondence.

In response to an increase in criminal activity, police occasionally erect roadblocks and conduct generalized, unannounced house searches in attempts to seize weapons and illegal immigrants. One such sweep in April resulted in some 248 arrests on charges ranging from illegal immigration status to possession of weapons and drugs.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is limited. A Swazi's main traditional forum for expressing discontent is through his or her Chief, and public condemnation of certain policies and people is not permitted. Criticism of the royal family and of national security policy is forbidden. The media, both government-controlled and private, practice self-censorship, refraining from criticism of sensitive government activities or commenting on controversial issues involving the royal family. Swazi radio and television stations are government controlled, and there is also a semiofficial newspaper. Private companies and church groups publish several newspapers and magazines.

In March four persons were arrested for possession of allegedly seditious literature published by an illegal political party, the People's Democratic Movement (PUDEMO). They included the outspoken leader of the defunct Ngwane National Liberatory Congress (the sole opposition party before the abolition of political parties in 1973) and a trade unionist. The four denied membership in PUDEMO and maintained that they had received the pamphlets unsolicited. Charges against the four were eventually dismissed.

The Government has occasionally proscribed publications, including foreign publications, deemed to be prejudicial to the interests of defense, public safety, or public health. Two major South African publications, banned in 1985 because of critical articles on Swazi domestic politics, remained excluded in 1989. No new bannings occurred in 1989.

Academic freedom is also limited; direct attacks against the royalty or government ministers are not permitted, and certain aspects of government policy (i.e., security) may not be discussed.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The King's 1973 proclamation prohibits meetings of a political nature and demonstrations in any public place without the consent of the commissioner of police. In practice, no permit is required for most gatherings. Nevertheless, in 1989 police used this power to stop meetings which were embarrassing to the Government. In March, citing failure to obtain a permit, police broke up a meeting which had been called by residents of a government housing project to protest rent increases. Also in March, the police closed a meeting of the Swaziland National Association of Civil Servants because the organization had not obtained a permit to hold the meeting.

Freedom of association is generally permitted, provided that the organization has no political agenda. Trade associations and professional bodies exist in Swaziland and maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields.

SWAZILAND

c. Freedom of Religion

Swaziland is hospitable to all religious beliefs, informally considers itself to be a Christian country, and permits a wide variety of foreign missionary activity. Organized religions are free to establish places of worship and train clergy. No licenses are required for such organizations or in order to publish religious texts, nor are there any bars to religious travel outside the country. At the same time, the authorities promote the observance of Swazi customs. When these customs conflict with religious beliefs, problems occasionally arise. Church condemnation of traditional Swazi ceremonies in the past has led to the arrest and deportation of church figures. In 1989 there were several cases of individual chiefs in the rural areas creating difficulties for Jehovah's Witnesses. In one case, a chief ordered the eviction of two families of Jehovah's Witnesses from his territory, claiming that they had sown dissent among his people.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Swazis may travel and work freely within Swaziland. Those who have left the country may freely return, and citizenship is not revoked for political reasons. Swazis generally can obtain a travel document to travel in the region, but the Government occasionally refuses to issue a passport if the applicant does not appear to have adequate means of support while abroad. Citizenship for nonethnic Swazis and persons of mixed heritage can be difficult to establish, creating problems in obtaining passports and other civil documents.

Swaziland treats displaced persons from neighboring states well. About 7,000 primarily ethnic Swazis from South Africa, who fled Zulu administration in the black South African homeland of Kwazulu, reside in Swaziland. The last few years have seen a large influx in the number of Mozambican refugees living in Swaziland. While approximately 16,000 were officially registered by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), it is believed that an additional 30,000 or more may have been in Swaziland illegally. Swaziland permits the UNHCR to interview those who seek refugee status and grants asylum if the person can establish that he or she will face persecution if repatriated. Illegal aliens who cannot establish their refugee status, however, can be deported. In practice, many of those refugees indentified for deportation end up serving extended time in detention while arrangements for their repatriation are made. This delay is due to the absence of an agreed repatriation procedure with Mozambique, rather than a policy to penalize illegal immigrants.

As in previous years, the Swazi police arrested a number of ANC activists (primarily South Africans) in 1989. They were turned over to the local UNHCR representative for transfer to countries (usually Zambia or Tanzania) willing to receive them.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Swazi citizens do not have the right to change their government through democratic means. Political parties are outlawed, and an organized political opposition does not exist. The King rules in conjunction with the Queen Mother. Traditionally, decisionmaking has been by consensus, with the

King soliciting advice from the royal family, the senior chiefs, the Cabinet, Members of Parliament, and other interested parties. Still, the King's power is absolute, and he can accept or dismiss advice as he sees fit. Public debate of political matters under consideration by the Monarch is rare. Legislation is passed by the Parliament and is then submitted to the Monarch for assent--which may be withheld. The King can also legislate by decree.

Swazis participate in the selection of Members of Parliament. Parliamentarians (50 in the house and 20 in the senate) are chosen in a complex process involving the interaction of a 7-member electoral committee, 40 traditional districts, 80 electors, and the King's appointive powers. The King can dissolve the Parliament and call new elections, normally held every 5 years. The Parliament serves as a forum for examination and criticism of government policies, but matters are seldom pressed to a vote and, when they are, unanimity is usually the result.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Swaziland prefers to keep a low profile in dealing with nongovernmental human rights organizations. There are no organizations which exclusively promote human rights in Swaziland. The Government was not the subject of any resolutions by official international organizations in 1989.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Unique Swazi governmental and social traditions unavoidably create differences between ethnic and nonethnic Swazis. For example, ethnic Swazis from South Africa seeking political refuge in Swaziland are treated much like Swazi citizens and are often given work permits. Those who are not ethnic Swazis are treated as foreigners, and permits are given more reluctantly. A significant expatriate community exists, composed primarily of businessmen and missionaries.

Traditional values are a major influence on the role of women in Swazi society, and the dualistic nature of the legal system complicates the issue of women's rights. A wife's legal rights, for example, differ substantially depending on whether she is married under traditional or civil law. In a traditional marriage, a woman is treated as a minor under the law. She is not responsible for contracts she signs, and she cannot, except in rare instances, hold real estate or inherit property in her own name. She must normally obtain her husband's permission to borrow money, to leave the country, and, in some cases, to take a job. A woman divorced in a traditional court has no right to the legal custody of her children. In traditional marriages, a man can take more than one wife. In some cases, women are compelled by family pressure to marry without their consent, although this practice is decreasing over time. Women who are forced to marry do have legal recourse, but few resort to it, both out of ignorance of their rights and out of fear of ostracism by family members. Wives chosen by the King do not have legal recourse. Because traditional marriage is governed by uncodified Swazi law and custom, women's rights are often unclear and change according to where and by whom they are interpreted.

SWAZILAND

Even under civil law, marriage is governed by Swazi law and custom unless the parties to the marriage sign a prenuptial agreement. With a prenuptial agreement, property can be separately maintained, and the wife can enter into contracts and legal proceedings without her husband's consent. A man who marries a woman under civil law legally cannot have more than one wife, although in practice this restriction is sometimes ignored. Divorce does not automatically lead to loss of custody of children for the wife. Rather, custody is awarded according to the interests of the child, and maintenance for wives granted custody is generally provided. Marriage is further complicated by the fact that a man can legally marry a woman in both civil and traditional ceremonies, creating problems in determining which set of rules applies to a marriage. The Swaziland Council of Churches opened a legal aid center in 1988 which provides free information on issues such as marriage and maintenance laws.

Physical abuse of women, particularly wife beating, is frequent. Customarily, a Swazi man has the right and duty to beat his wife and children. Women have the right under the law to charge their husbands with assault, but few know that they can resort to legal remedies. The traditional courts are generally unsympathetic to "unruly" or "disobedient" women. The modern courts are more likely to convict wife beaters, but sentences, even when beating results in death, are frequently light.

In the workplace, the Employment Act of 1980 forbids employers to discriminate among employees based on race, religion, sex, or political affiliation. It requires equal pay for equal work. Even so, around 75 percent of all private sector jobs are held by men, and their average wage rate by skill category is in some sectors three times that of women (1986). The Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions announced in August that it would be forming a special women's wing to address issues of discrimination in the workplace. This wing will focus on the issues of wage discrimination and maternity benefits, as well as other sex-based discriminatory practices.

In August the Ministry of Labour and Public Service announced a new housing policy disadvantageous to women. It stated that married women occupying government houses would have to vacate the houses and live with their husbands, if the husband was not a government employee. Women challenged the regulation as discriminatory, and no effort has yet been made to enforce it.

Discrimination on the basis of religion, language, or social status does not occur to any significant degree in Swaziland.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Industrial Relations Act (IRA) of 1980 affirms the right of trade unions to exist, organize, and associate freely. Persons in all sectors of the economy, including the public sector, are permitted to join unions. Employers are obliged to recognize a union when it achieves 40 percent membership among employees. Unions are able, within limits, to operate independently of government or political control. This independence is contingent on their acting as economic, rather than political, organizations.

Unions are free to draw up their own constitutions within the framework of the IRA. The Act specifies a number of provisions which must be addressed in a constitution. These include provisions for election of officers by secret ballot, annual meetings open to all members, fees, grounds for suspension of members, and expenditure of union funds. The constitution must be approved by the labor commissioner, who can strike out or amend provisions which violate requirements of the law. Unions cannot be dissolved as long as they adhere to the regulations of the IRA. Unions which fail to maintain proper registration with the labor commissioner can be dissolved.

For several years, including in 1989, the International Labor Organization's Committee of Experts (COE) has noted discrepancies between ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association and the IRA. The several concerns of the COE include the broad powers accorded government officials to control union activity and the strictures on the ability of workers to form unions and associate with other unions at home and abroad. The COE has called on the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention it ratified in 1978.

The IRA details the steps to be followed when disputes arise, including what determines a legal or illegal strike. The Act provides for an industrial court, presided over by a High Court judge, for the settlement of employment disputes. The industrial court is empowered to hear and give judgment on disputes and grievances and to enjoin a union from striking. Historically, strikes have been rare in Swaziland. However, consciousness of workers' rights is growing rapidly. When disputes arise, the Government tries to intervene to reduce the chances of a strike, which may not be legally called until all avenues of negotiation have been exhausted. The labor commissioner can then issue a 14-day postponement of a strike, which can be extended upon presentation of further documentation. In October 300 employees of the Manzini town council were fired after going out on strike in contravention of the Industrial Relations Act. Where the national interest is concerned, the Minister of Labor can outlaw a strike or refer the dispute to the industrial court.

In June the Swaziland Union of Financial and Allied Workers (SUFIAW) announced its intention to strike for a salary increase after negotiations had failed to result in an agreement. The industrial court issued an injunction against the strike which the union accepted. Shortly after the injunction order, however, the Secretary General of SUFIAW was detained under 60-day detention orders. A public outcry against his arrest led to his release 4 days later. The industrial court eventually helped negotiate an agreement on wages between SUFIAW and the bankers' organization. In August 500 workers at an agricultural operation were fired when they refused to abandon an illegal strike. There were several wildcat strikes during the year which were resolved without recourse to the industrial court.

The Swaziland Federation of Trade Union (SFTU), the union umbrella organization, is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. The SFTU also represents Swazi labor in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Southern Africa Trade Union Coordinating Council.

SWAZILAND

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Industrial Relations Act of 1980 provides for the right to organize and bargain collectively. While collective bargaining does occur, it is not widespread. The IRA has provisions outlawing interference and antiunion discrimination. Disputes in this area are referred to the labor commissioner and the industrial court, if necessary. Employers can prohibit employees from attending union meetings if the union has not achieved the 40-percent membership level required for recognition. However, members of legally recognized unions must be allowed to attend union activities. Although many employers habitually resist recognition and force the issue into the industrial court, the court generally rules in favor of the unions. The Government wishes to avoid labor confrontation and encourages voluntary negotiations between employers and unions. While not antiunion, the Government publicly expresses its concern that labor unrest threatens Swaziland's image as a stable and attractive place for foreign investment.

The ILO COE has remarked on discrepancies between national legislation and Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively which Swaziland also ratified. The COE specifically noted the absence of provisions respecting the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers and the compulsory registration of collective agreements by the industrial court, which may refuse registration in the event of nonobservance of government directives on wages.

There are no export processing zones in Swaziland. Labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced labor in Swaziland, and such labor is legally prohibited.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Employment Act of 1980 prohibits the hiring of a child below the age of 15 in an industrial undertaking, except in cases where only family members are employed in the firm, or in technical schools where children are working under the supervision of a teacher or other authorized person. Legislation limits the number of night hours which can be worked on school days and limits such work overall to 6 hours per day or 33 hours per week. Employment of children in the formal sector is not customary in Swaziland.

There is extensive legislation, notably in the Employment Act of 1980, protecting worker health and safety in Swaziland. There is a maximum 48-hour workweek in the modern sector, except for security guards, who work up to six 12-hour shifts per week. There is no overall minimum wage, but rather a sliding scale of minimum wages depending on the type of work. A casual laborer must legally make $9 a week, while a security guard must be paid at least $15 per week. The minimum wage for a clerk is $19, and for a laboratory technician, $62. Employees receive time and a half for overtime worked. Employees who work on Sundays or public holidays receive double pay. Workers receive a minimum of 14 days' annual leave after each period of 12 months of continuous service (21 days for security guards). These standards are generally upheld in the formal sector.

While wage levels in Swaziland are low by Western standards, by African standards most Swazis employed in the formal sector do relatively well, although this is certainly not the case for persons on the lower end of the scale, such as security guards or casual laborers. Most Swazi families also farm and graze cattle on Swazi national land on which their homesteads are erected and from which family income also derives. When this source of income is taken into account, most Swazis can be said to earn a decent living.

The Government sets safety standards for industrial operations and encourages private companies to develop accident prevention programs. Recent growth in industrial production has necessitated more government action on safety issues. In 1986 only 20 safety inspections took place, none in manufacturing industries. By 1988 this figure had risen to 83, with 11 inspections of industrial operations. There were 1,070 industrial accidents reported to the Ministry of Labor in 1988, higher than the figure for 1986 (923), but lower than the 1,275 reported in 1984. Given the rapid growth in industrial employment, the relatively static level of industrial accidents is a sign that safety measures are generally observed.

TANZANIA

The United Republic of Tanzania, formed in 1964 when mainland Tanganyika united with the newly independent island of Zanzibar, is a one-party state. Political direction for the party, the Chama Cha Mapinduzi (CCM), and the Government comes from a party-chosen elite headed by party chairman Julius K. Nyerere, who served as Tanganyika/Tanzania's first President until 1985, and President Ali Hassan Mwinyi, who formerly served both as Zanzibar's President and Tanzania's First Vice President. The CCM under Nyerere lays down fundamental political and economic policies and monitors their implementation. The party attempts to control activity at all levels of society through its system of 10-family cells. The offshore islands of Zanzibar and Pemba are integrated into the Union's governmental and party structure, but the Zanzibar Government exercises a considerable degree of autonomy.

The police have primary responsibility for maintaining internal security. They are supported in this role by the Tanzanian People's Defense Force (TPDF), with some 30,000 personnel, and by paramilitary forces and a large citizens' militia. The Government has tolerated, and has granted quasi-legal status to, vigilante forces in rural areas to counter lawlessness, especially cattle rustling. While the armed forces traditionally have not been a source of human rights abuses, there have been problems with the police. In 1989 they were accused of engaging in severe beatings and torture in the course of interrogations.

Tanzania is one of the world's poorest countries and has one of the highest rates of population growth. Its overwhelmingly agricultural economy has suffered from unfavorable trends in international trade and inefficient economic policies. Reforms undertaken in 1986, including increased prices paid to farmers, rescheduled foreign debt payments, and a sharply devalued currency, stimulated growth rates to an estimated 4 percent in 1989.

A bill of rights promulgated in 1988 provides for, inter alia, freedom of movement, speech, religion, and association, but there has been criticism that it has never been explained fully to the populace. In any event, civil rights are still severely restricted by the Government. All political activity outside the single party is tightly circumscribed. Direct criticism of the party and its chairman is not tolerated. For example, after openly criticizing the party's leadership and policies, former Zanzibar Chief Minister Seif Shariff Hamad was arrested in May 1989 for participating in an illegal demonstration and was held in detention throughout 1989. Six policemen were arraigned for alleged brutality and torture in a suburban police station; by year's end, the Government had not yet brought formal charges against them, and all remained on duty.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

In January 1989, a local newspaper reported that three women were killed near Shinyanga in north-central Tanzania on suspicion of practicing witchcraft. Such mob justice occurs from time to time in both urban and rural areas. The Sungusungu and Wasalam, traditional defense groups in north-central Tanzania, are encouraged by both government and party officials to help eliminate cattle rustling in areas too remote for the police. These vigilante groups often execute rustlers and also turn on villagers accused of witchcraft. The Government and the party regularly send officials to this region to try to instill some discipline, but the problem continues. Ironically, the January 1989 killings took place the same day that the regional CCM secretary decried such summary "justice."

The Government has proposed legislation to Parliament which would give formal status to these traditional security/defense groups. Known as the "People's Militia Laws (Miscellaneous Amendment)", the bill seeks to endow the people's militia with powers of arrest and to provide for compensation of militia members for injuries sustained while on duty.

There were no reported cases of disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits the use of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment, and government officials condemn such practices whenever cases are made public. Police, however, routinely "soften up" arrested suspected criminals just after apprehension in order to obtain quick confessions. Further beatings and torture continue if the suspect does not break down. In September 1989, the Dar es Salaam press reported extensively on the death during torture of a suspect whom policemen of the suburban Oyster Bay police station had arrested for stealing a tractor part. A suspected accomplice, tortured in the same room as the deceased, was so badly maimed (by electric cables wrapped around his body like bullwhips which pulled off chunks of flesh when the cables were jerked off) that he had to be hospitalized. He is a witness to the torture killing. Six policemen were charged with assaulting the accomplice; there had been no judicial action in this alleged torture death, however, at the end of 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Criminal Procedure Code, amended in 1985, requires that a person arrested for a crime, other than a security charge under the Preventive Detention Act, be charged before a magistrate within 24 hours. The new amendments, however, also restricted the right to bail, reduced the number of bailable offenses, limited judges' discretion in granting bail, and imposed strict conditions on freedom of movement and association when bail is granted.

Under the Preventive Detention Act, the President, upon written order, can direct the arrest and indefinite detention without bail of any person considered dangerous to the public order or national security. The Act was amended in 1985 to require the Government to release detainees within 15 days of detention or to inform them of the reason for their detention. The detainee was also allowed to challenge the grounds for detention at 90-day intervals.

Zanzibar was the scene of large demonstrations in May 1988 during which two persons were shot dead by the police. The authorities arrested 23 persons following the demonstrations and charged them with participation in an illegal assembly. The 23 were tried in July 1988; 15 were found guilty and sentenced to 18 months in jail, while the other 8 were released.

The most celebrated current Tanzanian detention case is that of former Zanzibar Chief Minister Seif Shariff Hamad, who fell from grace with the CCM for criticizing the party chairman and CCM policies, was stripped in 1988 of his party membership and his job, and was arrested in May 1989, charged with participating in an illegal demonstration, and held without bail. He was later also charged with illegal possession of secret government documents. A hearing in magistrate's court commenced on September 27. The trial continued through the end of the year, with some sessions held in camera at the Government's request so that the secret documents allegedly found in Hamad's possession could be presented. Most of the trial has been public; the defense had yet to present its case at the end of 1989.

In August two student leaders were abducted from the Dar es Salaam University campus center in broad daylight, reportedly by special security services. The students were hustled off to a distant safe house and detained in humiliating circumstances for almost 3 weeks. Under threat of a student strike on university graduation day, the students were released on August 24 and returned to campus. Never officially charged with any offense, it is generally accepted that they were abducted and detained because they criticized a CCM Central Committee member's handling of funds of the Tanzanian delegation to the 13th World Youth and Students' Festival held in Pyongyang, North Korea.

James Mapalala and Mwinyijuma Othman Upindo had been sent into "internal exile" on remote islands in July 1987, having been detained in October 1986 under the Preventive Detention Act (and later redetained under the 1921 Deportation Ordinance) for advocating a multiparty system. They were released in April 1989. The Deportation Ordinance which permitted the President to order the internal exile of these "undesirable" persons was declared unconstitutional by the High Court of Tanzania in 1989. The Court ruled that this Ordinance restricted freedom of movement and thus violated the Bill of Rights. On September 30, the press reported that the Government intended to propose amendments to the Ordinance which would enable a deportee to challenge the deportation order in court in the event requisite procedures were not followed.

Joseph Kasella Bantu, a prominent dissident, was released from house arrest and was reported to be living quietly in southern Tanzania.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Tanzania's legal system is based on the British model, with modifications to accommodate customary and Islamic law in civil cases. Criminal trials are open to the public and the press; courts must give reasons on the record for holding proceedings in camera. Criminal defendants have the right of appeal. Military courts do not try civilians, and there are no security courts. Defendants in criminal and military courts may appeal decisions to the High Court.

While an independent judiciary is constitutionally mandated and usually operates independently from the executive branch, the Government exerts influence in some cases. Members of the legal community, including judicial officers, have complained that the legal system is being corrupted through bribery. Police and lower court officials are often bribed to delay the process of investigation and trials. There are reports that the court trying Zanzibar's former Chief Minister Hamad was under pressure to render a conviction. Although the 1985 amendments to the Criminal Procedure Code were supposed to lessen court congestion, an average case still takes from 2 to 3 years to come to trial. Effective May 1989, laws were amended to impose more severe penalties for offenders of the law, including not less than 30 years for armed robbery.

The Government provides legal counsel to those charged with treason and murder. In Dar es Salaam, the Legal Aid Committee of the Tanganyika Law Society and the Legal Aid Committee of the faculty of law at the University of Dar es Salaam offer legal services to indigents, but their resources are limited. Under the Detention Act of 1983, political prisoners have the right to be represented by a defense attorney.

Zanzibar's court system generally parallels the mainland's legal system, but retains Islamic courts to handle Muslim family cases such as divorce, child custody, and inheritance. Cases concerning Zanzibar constitutional issues are heard only in Zanzibar's courts. All other cases may be appealed to the Court of Appeals of the United Republic of Tanzania.

According to knowledgeable observers, there were no political prisoners at the end of 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although party membership is voluntary (an estimated 2.5 million Tanzanians are CCM members), the party structure permeates the private lives of all citizens. The CCM has party cadres at all levels of society. Individual cells vary in size from single family homes to large apartment buildings, and may contain from 10 to several hundred persons. Unpaid "10-cell" leaders are the party officials responsible for resolving problems at the grassroots level and reporting any suspicious behavior or event within their neighborhoods to authorities.

Various ordinances allow the removal of undesirable or destitute persons from one area to their prior place of residence or origin if no work is found for them (See Sections 2.d. and 6.c.). It is generally recognized that Tanzanian security services monitor the telephones of several categories of Tanzanian citizens and expatriates and scrutinize correspondence.

The Criminal Procedure Code Act of 1985 authorizes magistrates to issue search warrants to police officers, enabling them to enter premises for the purpose of search and seizure. In practice, however, police and other security services enter private homes and business establishments without the requisite warrant.

TANZANIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although freedom of speech and press is provided for under the Constitution, in practice it has continued to be restricted, given the substantial government and party ownership and control of the media. Tanzanian citizens show few inhibitions about criticizing the Government and its officials in private conversations but are extremely cautious in what they say in public forums.

The mainland Government owns the only English-language daily newspaper, the national press agency, and the mainland radio facility. The Zanzibar Government operates a radio station and a television station. The Swahili-language newspaper Uhuru, which has a daily circulation of 100,000, is owned by the party. The Newspaper Act, which allows government seizure of any publication without a warrant and withdrawal of the license to publish at any time, makes the launching of a private newspaper or magazine risky. Despite these restrictions, a privately owned weekly business newspaper and two special interest magazines started publication in 1988.

The official media present the Government's point of view on policy matters. Journalists are expected to understand and support the party's ideological underpinnings of socialism and self-reliance in order to publicize and defend party and government policies. The news media are periodically exhorted to step up their efforts to educate, mobilize, and entertain the public. Formal censorship is not exercised, but individual journalists employ self-censorship in criticizing government and party policy and officials.

Visiting foreign journalists are required to register with the Government and obtain a government permit. Permits and visas are not easily obtained, however, and application is a time-consuming process which often requires intervention from a high level official.

Academic freedom is officially guaranteed, but, in practice, academicians, most of whom are employed in government-run educational institutions, refrain from broaching sensitive subjects in their classrooms and publications.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Given the nature of Tanzania's one-party system, the freedoms of public assembly and association are limited. Permits must be obtained through the Government for any public meeting, political or otherwise, and are normally granted. Student organizations are controlled by the party. Under the Societies Ordinance, all associations must be registered with and approved by the Ministry of Home Affairs. Candidates for office in major sports clubs and cooperatives are screened by the appropriate government ministry, which also supervises their elections. No organizations which would compete with party organizations are approved.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

TANZANIA

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution and is respected in practice. Missionaries are allowed to enter the country freely to proselytize, and Tanzanians are allowed to go abroad for pilgrimages and other religious purposes. The Jehovah's Witnesses, who have been banned in Tanzania for many years, have been allowed to return and to register as an organization and have been permitted to proselytize since 1988. The population of the mainland is roughly 30 percent Christian, 35 percent Muslim, and 35 percent adherents of traditional religions. Zanzibar is overwhelmingly Muslim. While there appear to be no social or political advantages or disadvantages attached to membership in any given faith on the mainland, this is not the case on Zanzibar, where there has been some controversy regarding state support of certain mosques.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Apart from the Zanzibari requirement for documentation for travel between Zanzibar and the mainland, short-term travel generally is not restricted within Tanzania, but citizens must follow national employment directives stipulating the nature of employment and location of residence. For years city dwellers unable to show proof of employment during police checks have been forced to return to rural areas in an effort by the Government to control increasing pressure on urban resources. The Human Resources Deployment Act of 1983 requires local authorities to ensure that every resident within their areas of jurisdiction engages in productive or other lawful employment. Those not so employed are subject to transfer to another area where employment is available. The Government remains concerned with the continuing migration of young people to the cities from rural areas. However, in contrast to earlier years, there were no massive roundups of unemployed youths under the Act in 1989.

Passports are required for foreign travel and can be difficult to obtain. Tax clearances and approval from the Central Bank are required in order to buy airline tickets, and, in practice, those planning to travel or emigrate are subject to intense scrutiny by police and tax authorities. Tanzanians who leave the country without authorization are subject to prosecution on their return. The Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act empowers the courts to try Tanzanians who commit offenses outside the country. Although it is legally possible for citizenship to be revoked, there have been no reports that this has been done in recent years.

Parliament passed a bill in 1986 requiring the registration and identification of everyone over the age of 10 resident in Tanzania, apparently in an effort to control foreign businessmen.

Tanzania generally has a liberal policy towards refugees and displaced persons. As of the end of 1989 there were believed to be about 266,000 refugees in Tanzania. A more accurate count will be available when the results of a recent census are published. The largest group of refugees is from Burundi. In 1989 the Government jailed 15 Burundian refugees whose repatriation was requested by the Burundian Government for allegedly plotting against it. They were served with a letter of expulsion and by year's end remained in detention while the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) sought an alternative country willing to resettle them. It is estimated that Tanzania harbors some 5,000 to 7,000 refugees from the African National Congress (ANC) of South Africa.

Tanzania accepts refugees from almost all countries, except for South Africans who have left their liberation movements and Kenyans associated with the opposition in Kenya. However, according to the UNHCR, refugees from Mozambique are subject to intense scrutiny at the border. A number of opposition groups and alleged political refugees have found Tanzania a relatively open haven and maintain contact with the UNHCR, even though chances of finding permanent third-country refuge are remote.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Tanzanian citizens cannot legally remove the party in power or change the one-party system. Political activity is forbidden except within the one legal party, the CCM. Ex-President Julius Nyerere continues to direct the affairs of the CCM through its Central Committee. There are no overt opposition groups. The persons arrested in 1986, sent into internal exile in 1987, and then released in 1989 (see Section 1.d.) were advocates of a multiparty system. Their offense was distributing leaflets calling for a change in the political system.

All candidates for Parliament must be party members; any Member of Parliament stripped of party membership loses his or her seat in Parliament. A 1985 amendment to the Constitution allows voters to choose between two CCM-selected candidates for 75 percent of the 244 seats in the Union Parliament. The remaining 25 percent are appointed by the Government and the various mass organizations associated with the party. The one-party system does not permit political participation through the open nomination of multiple candidates. All CCM candidates are vetted and approved by the all-powerful Central Committee. Voters can and do register dissatisfaction with individual Members of Parliament by voting incumbents out of office and choosing the alternate candidate offered by the CCM. Elections for both the Presidency and Parliament are held every 5 years; the next elections are scheduled for 1990. Voting is by secret ballot.

While membership in the party is voluntary, overzealous CCM functionaries have been known to require proof of membership for individual citizens to receive basic government services or employment, a practice which has been publicly deplored by CCM Chairman Nyerere.

Zanzibar's Constitution provides for a Zanzibari House of Representatives consisting of 50 elected members, 10 members nominated by the President of Zanzibar, 5 regional commissioners, 5 seats reserved for women, and 5 representatives from the party's mass organizations. Those members directly elected (for the first time in 1985) were chosen from a slate of candidates selected by the CCM.

TANZANIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government traditionally has spoken out in international forums against human rights abuses. Tanzania is a party to the United Nations covenants on human rights and in 1984 ratified the Organization of African Unity Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights. Nevertheless, the Government resents inquiries into alleged human rights abuses. There were no outside investigations of human rights violations in Tanzania in 1989, but the Amnesty International Secretary General discussed with the present Zanzibar Chief Minister, Omar Ali Juma, in London in September the question of Zanzibaris in detention without trial. Juma responded that no one was in detention without trial, adding that the Government, however, would not tolerate detractors bent on disrupting the peace. A local legal aid committee provides legal services to indigent clients and conducts educational workshops around the country on Tanzanians' legal rights, but it has conducted no investigations and issued no reports critical of the Government's human rights practices.

Official government policy is one of promoting equal rights for all citizens, but tribalism is a factor in Tanzanian politics and, to a lesser extent, social interaction. The African population consists of more than 130 ethnic groups, of which only the Sukuma has more than 1 million members. All ethnic groups have their own language, but the national language is Kiswahili. That tribalism is not a destructive, destabilizing force is in no small measure because of party and government encouragement of ethnic toleration and national unity.

The Asian community has declined by 50 percent in the past decade to about 40,000 (plus 4,000 in Zanzibar). A business-oriented minority in a society historically committed to Socialist policies and remaining both culturally and economically exclusive, the Asians are regarded with considerable antipathy by many African Tanzanians. This antipathy is due in part to the Asians' disproportionate influence in key sectors of the economy. Despite this, there are no laws or official policies discriminating against them. As the Government's economic policies evolve and greater stress is given to the private sector, Asians are encouraged to invest in areas previously reserved for the public sector and are a force in the reawakening economy. Accordingly, there has been a gradual movement of Asians to Dar es Salaam from interior regions, and their presence is more noticeable in the country's political and economic capital.

Although the Government has endeavored to ensure equality for women, and both party and government constitutions endorse equal opportunity in the workplace, society still clings to traditional norms that divide labor along sexual lines with strong biases against women, who work primarily in the informal agriculture sector. Statistics for 1979 showed that over 97 percent of economically active women were engaged in agriculture. Only 5 percent of wage-earning agricultural employees were women, indicating that most women were working on family-level, small-holder farms.

TANZANIA

Progress has been more noticeable in urban areas, where traditional values have a weaker hold on the population, but even there and in the public sector (which employs nearly 80 percent of the entire Tanzanian labor force), certain statutes exist which either prohibit the hiring of women in certain jobs or restrict them to certain times of the day when they are allowed to work. According to a 1986 estimate, women constituted less than 14 percent of the wage employment sector and in 1989 most were still concentrated in lower salaried civil service positions such as clerks, secretaries, and telephone operators. A manpower survey showed that 20.1 percent of high and midlevel positions were occupied by women; they have little access to powerful decisionmaking positions. The overall situation of women is considered even less favorable in heavily Muslim Zanzibar.

Women in many parts of the country continue to suffer from discriminatory restrictions on inheritance and ownership of property because of concessions by the Government and the courts to customary and Islamic law. The Marriage Act provides that women's domestic services are a marital asset to be considered in divorce settlements. Women have no rights to ownership of land or house and are, therefore, hindered in obtaining bank loans for their own business projects, for want of collateral. The Government has established in each ministry a section to promote women's development, and the Union of Tanzanian Women (UTW), a wing of the ruling CCM, has as its declared policy the eradication of inequality for women in all spheres of society. Nonetheless, women continue to be discriminated against in educational opportunities.

The problem of violence against women is widespread. Legal remedies exist but in practice are only available with difficulty. This applies to both rural and urban areas, where traditional customs subordinating women remain strong and are upheld by local magistrates. The husband has a free hand in treating his wife as he wishes, and wife beating occurs at all levels of society. There were no egregious cases reported in 1989, and the Government has no program to inhibit this practice or to induce restraint on the part of husbands.

The practice of female circumcision continued to decline in 1989, according to health authorities. However, nongovernmental sources maintain the practice is on the rise, especially in central Tanzania. It was still performed within approximately 20 of the country's 130 mainland ethnic groups. The health department in the northern region of Tanzania requested the party to intervene to suspend female circumcision rites until those performing them had received medical training on hygiene. This concern apparently stemmed from an overall government program to prevent the spread of AIDS.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers do not have the right to form or join organizations of their own choice. The right of association is limited to one labor union organization, Juwata, which is an organ of the ruling party and to which all unions must belong. Juwata represents about 60 percent of the workers in industry and government, but in reality it has limited influence on labor policy.

TANZANIA

The right of workers to strike exists in law but only after complicated and protracted mediation and conciliation procedures have been followed. There is a process of appeals in labor disputes which leads ultimately to the Permanent Labor Tribunal, which receives its direction from the Ministry for Labor and Manpower Development. If the union is not satisfied with the Tribunal's decision, it can then conduct a legal strike. However, these procedures can prolong a dispute for months without resolving it. Pending a resolution, frustrated workers go on strikes, but the strikes are technically illegal. Small-scale walkouts occur fairly frequently, and large ones less often. Several strikes took place in 1989. These were settled by worker-management discussions, with government and government-controlled union officials intervening in stubborn cases. Although most strikes are in effect illegal, there have been no reports of prosecutions or jailing of strikers.

Although Juwata is a party organ, a degree of independence and choice in leadership has recently evolved. In 1989 the Juwata Secretary-General, Joseph Rwegasira, for the first time was elected by the party. Juwata limits its international affiliations only to regional organizations, such as the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the East African National Trade Unions Consultative Council.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is limited to the private sector. Wages for employees of the Government and state-owned organizations, who comprise the vast bulk of wage-earners, are set by the Government; Juwata does not bargain collectively on behalf of government employees.

At the local union level, Juwata promotes employee welfare by filing grievances against employers, usually over pay disputes. Union rights are incorporated into law, specifically the Security of Employment Act. The law is enforced, but the line between the Government and the government union can be difficult to discern. Grievances which cannot be settled in the workplace are taken to the Permanent Labor Tribunal. The Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) has observed that the current provisions requiring the Permanent Labor Tribunal to approve collective agreements are not in conformity with ILO Convention 98. The Government has indicated that a draft Labor Code is under study with the technical assistance of an ILO expert.

There are no export processing zones in Tanzania.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Employment Ordinance prohibits forced labor. For a number of years the ILO Committee of Experts has observed that provisions of various Tanzanian laws are incompatible with ILO Conventions 29 or 105 on forced labor. The Human Resources Deployment Act (1983), for example, requires every local government authority to ensure that able-bodied persons over 15 years of age not in school engage in productive or other lawful employment. Previously, there were massive police sweeps in Dar es Salaam's streets to round up persons who had no evidence of employment. The legislation has been interpreted more leniently recently, however, and no such roundups of urban unemployed occurred in 1989. The dialog between the ILO and the Government on the alleged use of forced labor continued in 1989, with the ILO seeking modification of particular legislation (such as the 1983 Human Resources Deployment Act).

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children under the age of 15 are prohibited from working under Section 77 of the Employment Ordinance. This provision applies only to the formal wage sector in both urban and rural areas, however, and not to children working on family farms or herding domestic livestock. A young person between the ages of 15 and 18 may be employed provided the work is safe and not injurious to health, and young people are not allowed to work between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. Enforcement is sporadic at best.

Tanzanian workers work a 40-hour, 6-day week. In general, women may not be employed between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. Several laws regulate safety in the workplace, including the Factories Ordinance, the Accidental and Occupational Diseases Notification Ordinance, and the Workmen's Compensation Ordinance. With the assistance of the ILO, an occupational health and safety factory inspection system is in place managed by the Ministry of Labor and Manpower Development. According to Juwata, this Ministry makes inspections and enforces safety regulations.

The minimum wage for government workers on the mainland is the equivalent of $14.31 a month. Juwata recently negotiated with the Association of Tanzania Employers an increase in the salaries of employees of the private sector of between 12 and 28 percent. The agreement signed by the two organizations benefits workers whose companies are members of the Association. Current salaries, even though increased from time to time, are not sufficient for a worker to sustain an adequate standard of living. Housing and transport allowances, food subsidies, and other benefits help, but government and public corporation salaries at all levels are very low. Current economic conditions, particularly with the devaluations of the shilling in June and December 1989 (which drove up the price of imports), a large and unproductive civil service, and a Government with limited, even diminishing resources, all militate against a meaningful and adequate rise in the minimum wage.

There is no legal discrimination in wages on the basis of sex, but in practice discrimination occurs. Enforcement of labor laws and regulations is erratic, impeded by corruption and the inefficient functioning of government machinery. The vast majority of Tanzanians are subsistence farmers and are not affected by current government labor regulations and safeguards.

TOGO

Since seizing power in a military coup in 1967, President Gnassingbe Eyadema has molded Togo into a single-party, authoritarian state. The President dominates all branches and functions of government. In addition to serving as Head of State, President Eyadema is Chief of Staff of the armed forces and head of the only political party, the Rassemblement du Peuple Togolais (RPT). All Togolese are considered members of the RPT and are obligated to vote, but only active party members can gain high government posts. The Eyadema Government rules by decree and considers its legal authority to be based on the Constitution of 1979 which was formally adopted by referendum. This Constitution established a National Assembly whose role, while continuing to evolve, is still primarily to adopt all governmental decrees sent to it. One-candidate presidential elections held every 7 years have reconfirmed President Eyadema's rule.

The Government's authority is reinforced through control of the state security apparatus: the armed forces, the National Police (Surete), and the Special Police (gendarmerie). All these forces have domestic security responsibilities.

Approximately 80 percent of Togo's 3.3 million people are involved in agriculture. In 1989 excellent rains produced an abundant food crop, and prices for two of Togo's major exports--phosphates and cotton--were higher. Cocoa and coffee, however, continued to suffer from depressed prices, and overall government receipts were lower than projected, leading to a budget deficit. Nevertheless, by continuing to control expenditures and comply with performance criteria under a World Bank-sponsored third structural adjustment program, Togo remained attractive to foreign donors for essential grants and loans.

Human rights in Togo remained tightly controlled in 1989. Major concerns included abuse of prisoners and detainees, arbitrary detentions, lack of fair trial procedures in security cases, and restrictions on freedom of speech, press, and assembly and the right of citizens to change their government. Amnesty International (AI) raised the issue of torture in several cases, and the Government again forcibly repatriated several persons. On the other hand, the 2-year-old Togolese Human Rights Commission, with the President's support, continued its high-profile campaign to familiarize all Togolese with their rights under the law and the limitations on official authority. In addition, the Commission continued to receive and investigate individual complaints (115 cases in 1989, though many did not pertain to human rights issues), with most being resolved after the Commission's intervention, including cases involving police brutality. President Eyadema also continued his personal campaign against high-level corruption and abuse by dismissing the Justice Minister and his security chief for malfeasance.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings in 1989.

TOGO

b. Disappearance

In 1989 there were no reports of disappearances. Prior to 1989 there were several abductions of persons opposed to the regime in neighboring countries who were forcibly returned to Togo, presumably by Togolese security agents. The 1988 case of John Pass has never been clarified. The Government claims he was killed by Ghanaian border guards. AI has received some reports that he was returned to Togo and tortured.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture of suspected opponents of the Government has been a serious problem. AI's 1989 Report details several 1988 cases, including the case of Celestin Zekpa who had been sentenced to death in absentia in 1986 for security offenses and who had been forcibly returned to Togo in October 1988 from Benin.

Under the continuing campaign by the Togolese Human Rights Commission against official abuses, reports of beatings of detainees (once considered normal practice) have dropped to a few isolated cases. With President Eyadema's backing, the Commission now reports well-founded allegations to security commanders who reportedly actively investigate the cases and punish officers found guilty through methods such as loss of pay or reprimand in front of colleagues. No formal procedures for the punishment of abusive officers have yet been established. Conditions probably have not improved significantly for detainees in rural areas or for detainees in military facilities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Togolese law, persons arrested may be held for 48 hours incommunicado without charge, with an additional 48-hour extension if the case is deemed serious or complex. Most detentions follow this requirement. However, persons accused of "political crimes," such as defaming the President, can be arrested and detained incommunicado without limit. Such persons have been routinely charged as "administrative detainees," a status not permitting recourse to normal legal remedies.

After being charged, prisoners are often held for long periods of time--in some cases 6 months or more--before being brought to trial, owing more to a shortage of judicial personnel than an intent to evade required judicial procedures. Although not guaranteed a right to counsel under law, detainees are routinely permitted to retain counsel, if they can afford it.

Prefects (governors) continue to have the de facto authority to order detention at will. Security officers also continue to have unrestricted arrest and detention powers in cases involving national security.

Arrested and detained members of the military and Special Police are processed through the military judicial system. While in the past this system had no outside appeal mechanism (aside from the President), military detainees now have the right to bring their cases before the Togolese Human Rights Commission.

TOGO

The number of political detainees was unknown but believed to be small at the end of 1989. There are a number of political exiles in neighboring countries and in Europe.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Procedural safeguards needed to ensure fair trial are lacking in security/political cases. The regular judicial system for criminal and civil cases uses both African traditional law and the Napoleonic Code. In rural areas, the village chief or council of elders can try minor criminal and civil cases. Those who do not accept the traditional ruling can take their cases to the regular court system, which is also the starting point for urban cases. The Supreme Court stands at the apex of the court system, but decisions can be appealed to the President, who is the final arbiter.

The judicial process includes pretrial investigation undertaken by a special judge who must examine the adequacy of the evidence and decide on bail. While the number of judges is inadequate, the system functions well and in as timely a manner as possible for routine cases. Trials are public, and judicial procedures are followed. Defendants have the right to counsel, but only in potential capital punishment cases will the Government appoint a counsel for those unable to afford it. Lower court decisions can be appealed to two higher courts, then to the President.

Special courts exist to handle cases related to public security (State Security Court), embezzlement of public funds (Tribunal for Recovery of Public Funds), and violent crimes (Court of Assizes). While the State Security Court has not met in 3 years, a 1989 case involving malfeasance by Togo's ex-police chief may be tried there. Persons who embezzle money in large sums are generally not released from jail, even after serving their sentence, until the money is repaid.

Togo's judicial system is not independent of the executive, as the President can and does intervene in cases of special interest and determine outcomes. For example, before the judicial process could be completed, President Eyadema gave a full pardon to the ex-Minister of Justice who had been sentenced by a lower court to 2 years' imprisonment for taking part in a scheme to rig the national lottery.

Togolese exiles in Ghana claim that there are a number of political prisoners in prison. The 19 prisoners, who had been kept incommunicado at a military base since their alleged role in trying to overthrow the Government in September 1986, were transferred to the civilian prison in Kara in October 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In routine criminal or civil cases, searches of private residences are authorized in advance by a judge or senior police official. In national security cases, searches are undertaken without prior authorization. The authorities continue to open mail and monitor telephones. A Government network of informants keeps a check on actual or perceived opponents. Religious publications of the Jehovah's Witnesses often disappear in the mail. All Togolese are automatically members of Togo's sole political party and required to vote, but no one is forced to take an active party role.

 Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Direct criticism of the Government, and especially of the President, continues to be perceived as serious antigovernment activity and is not tolerated. However, there is an increasing tendency for academicians, jurists, and human rights advocates to discuss in open meetings (usually sponsored by Western embassies) such once-forbidden topics as limitations on executive power, single-party politics, and freedom of expression. In addition, the President's high-profile anticorruption campaign, which felled several high-ranking officials, has permitted a very vocal and widespread public discussion about official abuses and government corruption.

The Government continues to dominate the print media and control radio and television. A new, privately published periodical appeared in Lome in November. This was made possible by the acquiescence of the Government and the high-profile campaign by the Togolese Human Rights Commission for broadening freedom of expression. The Government continues to use its media to project a positive image of the President and Togo, while at the same time participating fully in condemning public corruption and abuse of public trust.

There is government censorship of all films, video cassettes, books, plays, and other writings published in Togo. Some bookstores, however, sell a wide range of books, including those containing veiled criticism of the system of government. Foreign publications are offered for sale openly in bookstores and street corners, and even editions which criticize Togo or portray negative images of the Government or Head of State are sold.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is strictly controlled in Togo. Government approval must be obtained for the formation of any official groups and for large group meetings. This process is an effective means for preventing any antigovernment groups from meeting. Government permission for nonpolitical events and the formation of professional or charitable societies is given routinely and expeditiously.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government's policy is to permit Togolese to participate, if desired, in religious activities. To operate officially, religious groups must receive permission from the Ministry of Interior by qualifying under one of seven broad categories. Qualifying groups are not restricted in their religious practices. They are free to publish religious material, conduct services, and teach their faith. Non-Togolese clergy are welcome to reside in Togo, proselytize, and engage in other religious activities.

Currently, the Jehovah's Witnesses and several small Apostolic/Celestial groups have been denied official permission to practice their beliefs. While this has prevented these groups from publicized, open worship, they continued in 1989 to exercise their faith in private without government interference. Based on a complaint from the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Togolese Human Rights Commission was involved at the end of 1989 in discussions with the Government regarding the certification process.

One publisher was prevented from selling calendars which used Christian names instead of African names.

Local religious groups are free to maintain contacts with coreligionists in other countries, and no restrictions exist on travel for religious purposes. All official religious services are ecumenical in nature. The Government does not favor any specific religion, and membership in any authorized religious group is neither a benefit nor a hindrance in civil service promotions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Free movement, including domestic and foreign travel, emigration, and the right to change residence or workplace, is generally allowed. However, the Government controls the issuance of passports and exit visas to discourage the emigration of professional Togolese and to keep known political dissidents under close scrutiny. The Government maintains customs and security checkpoints throughout the country on all major routes. Except for the few political exiles, Togolese who have chosen to reside in other countries may return at will.

Togo has traditionally welcomed refugees, and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) currently recognizes some 420 refugees in Togo. However, some refugees from countries with which Togo enjoys good relations are reluctant to register with the UNHCR for fear that their government will receive information about them. In 1988 the Government forcibly returned a Chadian recognized by the UNHCR as a refugee. According to AI's 1989 Report, he was extrajudicially executed shortly after return to Chad.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Togolese cannot change their government through democratic means. While all Togolese are members of the single political party, and active party members may debate minor issues at party meetings and raise complaints against local officials, no challenges are permitted to the Government's programs. Presidential elections were held in 1986, the second since 1979. President Eyadema, the only candidate, was elected for another 7-year term with 99.7 percent of the votes cast.

The National Assembly, created pursuant to the 1979 Constitution, has 77 members and has the right, in theory, to accept or reject laws originated by the executive branch. In fact, the Assembly has never rejected any proposed legislation, and most laws are by acclamation. Nevertheless, members of the Assembly see their institution in evolution, with a gradually increasing national role. In the 1985 National Assembly elections and in elections held in January 1987 for municipal and prefectural councils, multiple candidates were permitted to run, but each candidate had to obtain party authorization and submit campaign literature for approval.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has shown increased awareness of human rights issues in recent years, largely by facilitating the establishment of the Togolese Human Rights Commission. The Commission continued in 1989 to increase the scope of its activities and the range of its investigations with the support of President Eyadema. The Commission is composed of 13 members, one each elected by 13 private and public bodies, e.g., judges, doctors, teachers, trade union officials. It is authorized by law to receive complaints from any Togolese citizen or foreign resident, to investigate such complaints, and to have access to government and police files. If a violation is found to exist, the Commission is also authorized to negotiate with the responsible governmental authority either to bring about rectification or to submit the case to the courts or to the President. Commission members enjoy immunity from arrest or prosecution during their term of office and for 1 year afterwards. The Commission is careful not to criticize the Government as such, but it has been helpful in specific cases (see Section 1.c.).

International human rights organizations have been able to communicate directly with the Commission concerning individual cases. In 1989 the Commission received three inquiries from AI--one concerning an alleged disappearance in 1986 and two allegations of torture during 1989.

Before President Eyadema's seizure of power in 1967, all influential groups within Togo were dominated by southern ethnic groups. The President, himself a northerner, has advocated a strong affirmative action policy within the Government--ministers, governors, and other high-level officials are appointed proportionally to the ethnic mix of the population. The exceptions are the security forces, which are dominated by northern ethnic groups, and commerce and the professions, which continue to be the preserve of southerners. There is no known discrimination on grounds of religion.

Togolese women have formal equality with men under the law, and women's economic and social rights are spelled out in the "Family Code" which was adopted in early 1980. In the economic sphere, women dominate local market activities and commerce with Togo's neighbors and often amass considerable wealth. Unlike civil law, however, customary or traditional law gives all property to the male in the event of separation or divorce. Similarly, although women are legally allowed to acquire contraceptives and undertake family planning, custom and tradition prohibit women from access to contraception without the permission of their husbands or fathers.

Far fewer women than men receive university education, and the number of women graduates from secondary schools is low. In addition, the pensions of working women who die do not go to their families, unlike those of working men. Although working women pay into the pension fund in the same proportion as men, their children receive no funds in case of death, creating a special hardship for families with no father. Economic conditions in rural areas often leave women little time for anything other than carrying water, finding firewood, cooking, childbearing, caring for the family, and helping to raise food crops.

Violence against women, including wife beating, is outside the bounds of accepted behavior, and mechanisms exist within both the traditional extended family and formal judicial structures for redress. Female circumcision is practiced by a few northern ethnic groups but is gradually diminishing. While the Government has undertaken a campaign to make women throughout Togo aware of their expanded opportunities under the new family code, it has not specifically addressed the issue of violence against women or female circumcision. The UNFT, the government-sponsored women's organization, is the principal means of publicizing women's health, educational, and welfare issues.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Togolese are not free to form or join unions of their own choosing since such organizing is permitted only under the auspices of Togo's sole official labor union, the National Confederation of Workers of Togo (CNTT). The CNTT is one of the three components of Togo's only political party and unites various independent trade unions into one national labor organization. All wage earners are automatically members of the CNTT, and all pay dues through an automatic check-off system. At the end of the year, this automatic dues payment was still suspended; and the account remained frozen while the Minister of Finance investigated financial mismanagement by the CNTT.

The International Labor Organization's (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) for a number of years has criticized the fact that Togolese law names the CNTT as the exclusive beneficiary of the compulsory deduction of trade union dues. While recognizing that the Labor Code places no obstacle in the way of trade union pluralism, the COE concluded that the effect of the compulsory dues provision for the CNTT is to establish a trade union monopoly. The COE has requested that the Government remove this exclusivity so as to bring its legislation into conformity with ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, which Togo has ratified.

Strikes are authorized only as a means of last resort but rarely, if ever, take place. The Government acts as arbitrator in cases where labor and management cannot settle a dispute. The few strikes which have occurred in the past have been short and ended as a result of government arbitration. The Government has not had to use coercion, force, or arrests to end strikes.

The CNTT is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the Organization of Trade Unions of West Africa. It is not otherwise affiliated internationally although it maintains ties with international and national trade union organizations in both East and West. Individual Togolese unions are affiliated with Western-oriented international trade secretariats.

TOGO

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers do not have the right to organize outside the CNTT. The CNTT is not an independent union and basically conveys the Government's views and requirements to workers. It does have a role in the wage bargaining process and does, on certain issues, present the workers' economic interests to the Government. It also takes the workers' side in disputes with private employers. Labor legislation and practice is uniform throughout the country. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Although the law is silent on the question, forced or compulsory labor does not exist. There are, however, occasional early morning mobilizations of the populations in larger towns and cities to clean streets and pick up trash.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Under the Togolese Labor Code, the employment of children under the age of 14 in any enterprise is prohibited. Some types of industrial and technical employment require a minimum age of 18. These age requirements are generally enforced in urban employment by inspectors from the Ministry of Labor. However, in rural areas even very young children traditionally help their families with agricultural work or animal husbandry.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor practices in Togo are regulated by the 1974 Labor Code. The Code stipulates that there should be equal pay for equal work regardless of sex. Working hours of all employees in any enterprise, except for agricultural enterprises, should not normally exceed 40 hours per week; at least one period of 24 hours of rest per week is compulsory; and workers should receive 30 days of paid leave each year. Minimum wages are set by the Government after discussions with CNTT and officials of the Ministry of Rural Development. These discussions cannot be characterized as true bargaining agreements. The minimum wage in the agricultural sector is about 20 cents per hour, and in the nonagricultural sector about 25 cents per hour. The amounts are not sufficient for workers to maintain a decent standard of living, and minimum wage workers supplement their incomes through second jobs or through some subsistence farming. Larger enterprises must run a regular medical service for their employees.

Health and safety standards in the workplace are determined by a technical consulting committee at the Ministry of Labor, and there are penalties for employers who do not meet the conditions. Ministry enforcement of the various provisions of the Labor Code is limited. These provisions are respected by large enterprises, but smaller firms and the large agricultural sector do not maintain them. Due to Togo's significant unemployment, few workers complain about conditions.

UGANDA

The National Resistance Movement (NRM), led by Yoweri Museveni, took power in 1986 following a 5-year guerrilla war against the Obote and Okello regimes. The NRM declared that it would rule as an interim government for 4 years and then turn power over to an elected government. In October 1989, the National Resistance Council (NRC) extended the interim period for an additional 5 years, citing delays caused by a 3-year old insurgency. President Museveni, backed by the military, serves as chief executive, Minister of Defense, and Chairman of the NRM and NRC. Thirty-eight unelected members of the NRC exercise a strong influence on the body and dominate the Government's policy organ, the National Executive Committee (NEC).

The security apparatus is composed of the National Resistance Army (NRA) and the police. The 65,000 strong NRA, a disciplined force during its earlier days, absorbed thousands of soldiers from previous regimes as part of the Government's policy of reconciliation with former opponents. Consequently, discipline declined, particularly in the contested areas in the north and east where several serious incidents of NRA abuse of authority were reported in 1989. NRA soldiers and deserters committed hundreds of burglaries, automobile hijackings, and other crimes throughout the country. The police force now numbers over 13,000 and is expected to rise to over 20,000 by the mid-1990's. Meanwhile, the military continues to perform many police tasks. The Internal Security Organization (ISO) and military intelligence, both entirely staffed by the NRA and both involved with combatting internal subversion, have been accused of human rights violations.

Uganda is dependent on coffee for over 95 percent of its export earnings and was seriously affected in 1989 by the further collapse of coffee prices and the demise of the international coffee quotas. In fiscal year (FY) 1988/89, Uganda received over $550 million in foreign grants and concessional loans--twice what it earned from exports. Producer prices for farmers and wages for salaried workers are extremely low. Uganda has participated in International Monetary Fund structural adjustment programs since 1987. In 1989 the NRM leadership reaffirmed its goal of privatizing a number of state enterprises and promoting the private sector. Although gross national product grew by an estimated 7.2 percent in FY 1988/89, per capita income and production remained well below levels reached in the late 1960's.

Disrespect for the rights of civilians by all parties to the military conflict in the north and east remained pervasive in 1989. Credible reports of civilian casualties, illegal detentions, and torture by the NRA continued. The rebel Ugandan Peoples Army continued to assassinate local Resistance Council officials while remnants of the Holy Spirit Movement (Section 1.g.) continued their practices of forced recruitment, kidnapping, and summary executions. Other abridgements of human rights in Uganda included laborious trial procedures, restrictions on freedom of speech, assembly and association, and the inability of citizens to change their government. The Government formed a Constitutional Commission to prepare a draft constitution by 1992, but later extended the NRM's interim period through 1995. President Museveni announced a personal commitment to end the problem of illegal detention of suspected rebel opponents or sympathizers ("lodgers") (see Section 1.d.). Although an estimated 1,500 lodgers remain in custody, over 1,000 were released in August. Nationwide elections to the National Resistance Council and local resistance councils were held in February and March using the queuing method in lieu of the secret ballot. The Government also established two commissions of inquiry to investigate egregious incidents of NRA atrocities against civilians. At year's end no results had been announced.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Most political and other extrajudicial killings occurred as a consequence of military conflict between the NRA and opposition elements, and there was clear evidence that all parties engaged in such killings (see Section 1.g. for details). As fighting in the north and east declined in the latter part of 1989, the number of killings fell.

b. Disappearance

Reports of disappearance, common under previous regimes, markedly declined under the NRM Government. Many persons thought to be missing turned up as lodgers (see Section 1.d.). The lack of an institutionalized process of identifying prisoners held as lodgers seriously hampered efforts to account for missing persons.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and inhuman treatment are not sanctioned by Ugandan law, but for many years extreme forms of torture took place at detention centers, particularly military barracks where political prisoners were often held illegally. There are credible reports that the NRA engaged in inhuman treatment and torture in its own detention centers which remained outside the effective jurisdiction of Ugandan law. In quarterly reports for 1989, the Ugandan Human Rights Activists (UHRA) stated that military interrogators routinely administer torture in Room 68 of the central police station. The UHRA quarterly report for April through June 1989 offered the names of persons who allegedly were tortured to death by military interrogators at Makindye barracks, Mbuya barracks, and Basima House in Kampala. An Amnesty International (AI) report on Uganda also documented instances of torture in military barracks, at the Kampala headquarters of military intelligence, and at the offices of the Internal Security Organization.

The "three-piece tie," a form of torture which entails tying a person's arms behind the back until the elbows meet, is still used by military interrogators, even though President Museveni has declared it to be against official government policy. This painful procedure can lead to gangrenous infections of the hands and arms as well as rupture of the breastbone and asphyxiation. A variant on the three-piece tie, called the "suitcase" or "briefcase," in which, following a three-piece tie, the feet are tied back, is also used. The victim is then dragged on the ground or suspended in the air by a rope. Human rights activists report that the three-piece and suitcase ties are employed on prisoners held by the NRA in military barracks, by the NRA-staffed ISO and by military intelligence. In October 1988, six members of the ISO were arrested in connection with the death by torture of a civilian in their custody. The six were released in early 1989 for lack of evidence. No NRA soldier or security official was known to have been charged for torturing prisoners in 1989.

Unlike the situation in military barracks, physical abuse in civilian prisons is relatively rare, but chronic shortages of resources and overcrowding have resulted in substandard conditions. The Government permitted the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to visit prisons throughout the country and took a number of steps to improve conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The problem of "lodgers"--persons from the insurgent areas who are suspected of being rebels or rebel sympathizers and held indefinitely without charge or benefit of due process of law--continued in 1989. The number of lodgers declined from nearly 3,000 in January 1989 to fewer than 1,500 by the end of the year, however. In June President Museveni called upon the NRA and the local resistance committees in the insurgent areas to speed up the screening of lodgers. In August over 1,000 lodgers were released. The Government has detained among the lodgers a number of children between the ages of 13 and 15. Many were released in 1988 and 1989 but an estimated 100 were still being held at the end of 1989.

Persons may be detained in political and security cases under the Public Order and Security Act of 1967, which permits unlimited detention without charge. In 1989 no one was charged under this law.

Exile is not used as a means of political control. The Government announced a general amnesty in June 1988 which remains valid for rebels not guilty of crimes against civilians. In 1989 several thousand rebels who surrendered to local authorities in accordance with amnesty provisions were treated humanely, confined to reeducation camps, and screened. Many were subsequently released, although several hundred remain in rehabilitative detention.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The court system consists of magistrates courts, the High Court, and the Supreme Court. The Ugandan judicial system contains procedural safeguards modeled after British law, including the granting of bail and the right to appeal a verdict to a higher court. Members of the legal profession are highly educated, and are generally committed to giving the accused a fair public trial. A systemic shortage of resources and manpower ensures that the process is slow and inefficient, however. Criminal investigators lack everything from transport to forensic aids to pens and paper. Judges are too few in number to handle the huge backlog of cases and are hampered by a lack of such basic tools as equipment for recording court proceedings. In most cases, evidence at trials is recorded in long hand by the presiding judge or magistrate. The result of the investigative and judicial delays is that individuals charged with capital offenses typically wait 2 to 3 years or more for a verdict.

UGANDA

In June the NRC passed a controversial bill which would bypass the normal judicial processes in regions declared to be under a state of insurgency. The bill is designed to end the detention of lodgers by creating special magistrates courts in areas of insurgency which would expedite verdicts on suspected rebels or rebel sympathizers. The new courts would consist of five persons: a magistrate, two persons appointed by the district RC chairman, and two NRA officers. They would be empowered to hear capital cases and impose the death penalty.

If implemented, the new law would considerably erode many legal guarantees to a fair trial. Search and seizure of evidence by the NRA or police would be permitted in insurgent areas without a warrant. Suspects would be held indefinitely, without formal charges, while their cases are being investigated. Bail would not apply. Hearsay and uncorroborated evidence would be admissible. The burden of proof could be shifted to the accused at the discretion of the court. As fighting in the north and east dropped off during the latter half of 1989, the new law was not put into effect. But it remains on the books should the President officially declare a region to be an insurgent area.

Other than the lodgers, Uganda is currently holding no prisoners for purely political offenses. The trial of Charles Kagenda-Atwooki, former Secretary for Information of the Uganda People's Congress (former president Obote's party) is still pending. Atwooki was granted bail in September 1988. When arrested in 1987 Atwooki was charged with engaging in acts of terrorism and possessing seditious materials. The terrorism charge has since been dropped. Joel Walehwa, arrested and held incommunicado by security officials in 1988 prior to being formally charged with treason, was released in September after all charges against him were dropped.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the NRM, interference by authorities with personal privacy and family life has greatly diminished. Roadblocks, which had been places of terror under previous regimes when unruly soldiers could rob and extort at will, are far fewer in number and no longer sites of abuse. Criminal elements are present in the NRA, but they must act in secret because theft is strictly punished under the NRA code of conduct. Nonetheless, NRA soldiers are commonly implicated in such crimes as the hijacking of private vehicles and armed robbery. In the contested areas of the north and east, NRA soldiers turned to stealing, looting, and other abuse of their authority. Although required by law, search warrants are rarely obtained.

There was no indication that the Government interfered with private correspondence in 1989.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

The civil conflict between the Government/NRA and disparate rebel groups in the north and east continued throughout 1989 (although at a reduced level late in the year) and resulted in massive violations of humanitarian law by all parties. In the north, remnants of General Basilio Okello's army have waged guerrilla war in the countryside, and, in the east, the rebel Ugandan People's Army (UPA) has conducted terrorist operations.

UGANDA

AI cited a report from a Resistance Council (RC) chairman in Gulu which described the deaths of 88 civilians at the hands of the NRA between December 7 and 25, 1988. According to the report, in one incident 45 civilian prisoners were forced into a grass hut and then burned to death. Both AI and the UHRA concluded that the incidents were not isolated but part of a larger pattern of similar abuses which took place in Gulu during the period under review. The then Army Commander, Major General Elly Tumwine, condemned the incident and announced that a commission of inquiry had been formed to investigate it. No results had been announced by the end of 1989. In July NRA Major Kategara ordered cordon and search operations in Kumi District. Kategara's Special Brigades committed widespread abuses, including the burning of farms and the indiscriminate killing of civilians. The rampage through Kumi culminated in the death by suffocation of 69 suspected rebels who had been detained in railway cars in Mukura. The then NRA Commander Salim Saleh accepted blame for the railway deaths and admitted that the civilians killed in the railway cars had been innocent. Fourteen soldiers involved were placed under arrest pending the findings of a commission of inquiry. Again, no results had been announced by year's end. President Museveni subsequently toured the region and offered his condolences to the families of the victims.

Another 50 civilians were killed in Soroti during similar cordon and search operations in July. In the village of Tubur, 30 kilometers south of Soroti, 18 people were reported killed at the home of a man named Emesu. Most were cut to death with long blades known as pangas. While residents blamed the NRA, the army has been willing to admit only that some civilians may have died in a crossfire.

The UPA rebels continued their program of terror and assassination against members of local government Resistance Councils in eastern Uganda which has claimed the lives of dozens of RC officials in recent years. Similarly, remnants of the Holy Spirit Movement (HSM) rebels continued their practices of kidnaping, forced recruitment, and summary executions of opponents. A common HSM tactic was to raid secondary schools to force boys to serve as rebels or porters and girls to serve as sexual captives. Those who refused to cooperate were often hacked to death. Victims of insurgent/bandit forces were most often rural civilian inhabitants rather than military forces. At least several hundred persons died in such raids and ambushes. On Ugandan Independence Day, October 9, the Rwenzururu rebel group, which advocates independence for the Bakonjo people of the Rwenzori mountains, attacked a subcounty headquarters in Kasese killing several civilians including a subcounty chief and the chairman of the subcounty Resistance Council.

During 1988 and early 1989, NRA policy in Gulu and Soroti was to burn granaries and intentionally displace civilians to deny support to the rebels. As a result, there were over 100,000 displaced persons in northern and eastern Uganda in January 1989. As security improved later in the year, the NRA reversed itself and encouraged farmers to return to their villages.

The ICRC provided considerable emergency food aid to the displaced, but assistance to 25,000 displaced persons in Soroti was cut off early in 1989 after an ICRC relief convoy was ambushed by rebels. A Ugandan worker employed by ICRC was killed, and three others were injured in the attack. Rebels also attacked the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees' (UNHCR) Sudanese refugee camp at Ajumani in an effort to loot food stores. Transportation of relief supplies in the north and east was seriously impeded by sporadic rebel/bandit ambushes.

In September President Museveni hosted a 4-day meeting of the National Resistance Army Council at State House. As in the past, the President stressed that soldiers are expected to obey all laws and that violators of the NRA code of conduct would be severely punished. Hundreds of NRA soldiers are detained in Luzira prison in Kampala and at various military barracks for a wide variety of crimes, with armed robbery being the most common. NRA soldiers guilty of gross indiscipline face the death penalty. Three soldiers convicted of rape in Atiak were executed by firing squad in February. Two soldiers were executed by firing squad in June for armed robbery and murder of civilians committed in Gulu. In November three soldiers were executed in Kumi district after being found guilty of committing murder and rape in Ngora town 3 days before. The total number of such executions in 1989 is not known but is estimated at 15 to 20.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech in Uganda is restricted by the ban on partisan political activity and government sensitivity about press reports covering the activities of armed opposition groups and allegations of NRA abuses. Political parties may not hold press conferences or organize rallies and other functions at which party officials would speak. Party-originated criticism is more freely expressed in the press. The Democratic Party (DP) maintains a party newspaper, The Citizen, which is often critical of government policy as is a DP-affiliated magazine, The Exposure. Throughout the interim Government's rule, DP leaders have tried to sidestep the ban on party activity by issuing circulars describing the party's positions. Three such circulars were released in 1989 without incident.

Over 15 newspapers publish a wide range of viewpoints covering the political spectrum. This coverage includes reporting of human rights violations, the ongoing civil war, and alleged corruption by government and army officials. The Government supports an official paper, The New Vision, which, despite its affiliation, has reported accurately and at times aggressively on allegations of human rights abuses by the NRA. While criticism of government policies is common, journalists know that direct, personal criticism of the President is forbidden. Journalistic standards tend to the sensational, and some papers show little regard for accuracy.

In 1989 the authorities did not detain or charge any journalist for criticizing the Government. The Government has attempted, however, to intimidate critical journalists in previous years, e.g., Francis Odida, editor of the Sunday Review in 1988 on charges of treason, apparently for writing an article sympathetic to the Holy Spirit rebels. In 1989 it continued with new attacks against journalists accused of false reporting intended to cause harm to the Government. In August Tony Awano, reporter for the newspaper Focus, was arrested and charged with publishing libelous information against NRA Col. Kyaligonza. Awano was released on bail pending trial. The editor of the newspaper Citizen, Joseph Kigundu, faces four such libel cases, one of which was incurred in 1989, and is also free on bail. In March the NRM Political Commissar urged journalists to develop a code of conduct to improve journalistic standards. In August the Minister of Information called newspaper editors to his office to warn them to desist from reporting "alarmist and seditious stories."

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Permits for public gatherings must be obtained from police authorities, who have the right to deny the permit in the interest of public safety. The ban on the activities of political parties has greatly restricted their ability to congregate. In October the Government denied permission to the Democratic Party to celebrate its 35th anniversary in a public meeting.

Private, trade, labor, religious, professional, and ethnic associations are not impeded.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Uganda. Christianity, Islam, and African traditional religions are freely practiced. Conversion between religions is not obstructed. There is no government control of religious publications, even those with an antigovernment bias. Foreign clergy are welcomed in Uganda and are not discriminated against by the Government. President Museveni met with religious leaders of various denominations several times during 1989 and assured them that the NRM respects the separation of church and state.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

In theory, Ugandans may work or live anywhere in the country and move about freely within it. In practice, travel in areas of northern and eastern Uganda in 1989 remained difficult due to sporadic attacks by rebels and armed bandits. Freedom of movement improved in the latter half of the year as security was restored to more regions. More than 100,000 formerly displaced persons in Gulu and Soroti district have returned to their villages (see Section 1.g.). There are no restrictions which prevent Ugandans from emigrating or from engaging in foreign travel. Mismanagement in the immigration department resulted in a complete shutdown of passport issuance in September and October, however.

In the early 1980's Uganda was the second largest generator of refugees in Africa. Virtually all of the more than 300,000 Ugandan refugees who fled to Zaire, Rwanda, and Sudan have returned. Indeed the trend has reversed. Because of rebel activity by the Sudanese People's Liberation Army, over 50,000 Sudanese refugees fled across the border to refugee camps in northern Uganda, the majority in early 1989. There were no instances of forced repatriation or resettlement of refugees with asylum in Uganda in 1989. When a group of 238 Ugandan refugees were forcibly repatriated from Kenya in April 1989, the Government detained some 60 of them. About half of the 60 persons were screened by the Government and released within a month. The others participated in a political reeducation/rehabilitation course and were released before the end of the year. In December several dozen ethnic Somalis, many of whom claimed to be Kenyan citizens, sought political asylum in Uganda. As of the end of the year neither the UNHCR nor the Government had decided their cases.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Ugandans do not have the right to change their government by democratic means. The current form of government, known as the Resistance Council system, was instituted by the NRM after it took power in 1986. Having originally pledged to restore elected government by 1990, the NRM has now said it will give up power to an elected government under a new constitution in 1995. In the interim, President Yoweri Museveni, who has sought no electoral mandate to legitimize his rule, exercises control by virtue of his chairmanship of the NRM/NRA and his control over the military. He has appointed a large and broad-based Cabinet which includes leaders from all major ethnic, religious, and political groups.

In 1986 the NRM established the National Resistance Council as its Parliament. Until 1989, it was exclusively made up of appointees: 38 historical members (the vanguard of the NRM, who are popularly known as the "bushmen") and government ministers. In February and March 1989, the NRM held nationwide elections to the local resistance councils (except in Gulu where no elections were held for security reasons) and to the National Resistance Council. While elections at all levels were competitive and all citizens were eligible to vote or stand for office, voting was by queuing, i.e., citizens indicated their preference by lining up behind their candidate. The new NRC thus consists of 258 persons: the 190 elected members; the 38 "bushmen;" 10 appointees from the NRA; and 20 additional presidential appointees. Effective power, however, continues to be exercised by the President. Representatives from many tribal, religious, and political factions, including prominent individuals from previous governments, were elected to local and regional resistance councils as well as to the expanded National Resistance Council.

A 21-member Constitutional Commission became operational in 1989 and embarked on a series of constitutional seminars which will take it to all of Uganda's 702 subcounties by 1991. The stated goal is to involve all Ugandans in the constitution-writing process. Constitutional issues were prominently discussed in the press throughout 1989, with a wide variety of views on the future system of government being expressed.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Respect for human rights is one of the cardinal principles on which the NRM came to power and continues to serve as a basis of the regime's legitimacy. As a result, the Government is sensitive to international public opinion and has shown a willingness to discuss human rights problems with international human rights organizations. AI representatives visited Uganda in January and subsequently issued a report, Uganda: The Human Rights Record 1986-1989, which received considerable attention in the local press. Government leaders felt that the report was overly critical in some areas. In May President Museveni met with AI representatives to discuss it. In July the Minister of Justice met with diplomats to answer publicly charges made by AI and explain the Government's human rights policy. The attention given to the problem of lodgers by domestic and foreign human rights groups and by diplomatic observers may have influenced the Government's pledge to end the lodger problem.

The ICRC continued to operate in Uganda in 1989. ICRC delegates visited prisons, traced missing persons, and assisted in family reunification as well as providing relief in conflict areas. In late 1988 and early 1989, ICRC was permitted to visit military barracks where many political detainees are held. ICRC also conducted human rights seminars for the NRA.

The Office of Inspector General of Government (IGG) was established by the NRM in 1986 to investigate government corruption and human rights abuses in the current administration. The IGG focused its efforts more on the former than the latter in 1989. Investigations into abuses alleged to have been committed by the NRA in the insurgent areas are conducted by the NRA itself. The IGG has no role or investigative machinery to conduct investigations in this crucial area. An independent human rights organization, the UHRA, also monitors human rights developments in Uganda. While the Government had been hostile to the group in previous years and imprisoned its Secretary General in 1987-1988, relations improved significantly in 1989. Government officials, including several ministers, participated in the two human rights seminars that the UHRA sponsored in 1989. UHRA publishes a magazine, The Activist, and produces quarterly reports on human rights without government interference. The Uganda Human Rights Commission, appointed in 1986 by Museveni to investigate human rights abuses under previous regimes, continued its information-gathering activities in 1989.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Africans of three ethnic groups--Bantu (south), Nilotic (north), and Nilo-Hamitic (east)--constitute most of the population. Ethnic cleavages, tribalism, and religious intolerance underlie much of the cycle of war and political strife that has plagued Uganda for decades. The NRM Government has publicly repudiated tribalism and has introduced policies to prevent discrimination in housing, employment, education, and social services based on race, sex, religion, language, or social status. It has advocated national reconciliation, stating that all citizens are Ugandans first and foremost. This goal is symbolized by efforts to include at least 1 representative from almost every major tribal, regional, and religious group in the NRM's 76-member Cabinet.

Women played an important role in the NRA's bush war, serving as soldiers, intelligence operatives, and support personnel. The NRM created a Women's Development Secretariat charged with educating and politicizing Ugandan women, as well as a National Council of Women which is part of the Ministry of Local Government with responsibility for coordinating the activities of women's groups throughout Uganda. Women's overall status shows significant variations between ethnic groups. Women are not legally discriminated against or officially restricted from seeking education or employment.

UGANDA

Even in urban areas, however, their access to education declined disproportionately with the deterioration of the educational system and economic stagnation. There are significant wage differences in favor of men in similar positions held by men and women.

The NRM has committed itself to the protection of women's rights. Domestic violence against women is a relatively common practice in Uganda, however, and the Government has not comprehensively studied the issue. Women seldom report such abuse to the authorities. Traditionally, problems such as wife beating are adjudicated by tribal or village elders. Women in cities can turn to the courts but very few do. The Ugandan Association of Women Lawyers is an affiliate of the International Federation of Women Lawyers (FIDA). It founded a legal clinic in Kampala in 1988 to provide counseling and advice to poor women. The Association is working to promote respect for the rights of women and has formed a committee to study the issue of domestic violence. Female circumcision is not practiced by most Ugandan ethnic groups and has been actively discouraged by the Government where it does occur.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Under Ugandan law, all workers, with the exception of skilled employees in the civil service, have the right to form unions. The National Organization of Trade Unions (NOTU), Uganda's independent national labor federation to which all unions are by law affiliated, held its first free elections in 5 years in early 1986 and began rehabilitating regional union structures. Membership in NOTU-affiliated unions numbers approximately 100,000 out of 240,000 workers employed in private and state-owned industries. Relations between the Government and NOTU are cordial. President Museveni met with the NOTU leadership in May and expressed his support for the labor movement. NOTU's influence on the overall economy remains marginal since over 90 percent of the Ugandan work force consists of peasant farmers. Even among industrial workers, high inflation and lack of transport have made it difficult for individual unions to organize, especially outside the major commercial centers of Jinja and Kampala.

The Government recognizes the right of workers to strike but prefers that they first exhaust more conciliatory methods of resolving labor disputes. Several strikes took place in 1989 including actions by bank employees, workers at Lugazi sugar works, and the employees of Ugil textiles. All were settled peacefully.

The most notable strike of 1989 was by the faculty and staff of Makerere University. As skilled civil service employees they may not unionize or strike. When their employee association nonetheless called a strike in May to highlight their demand for a "living wage," the Cabinet threatened to dismiss them and evict them from university provided housing. At the last minute, President Museveni intervened and arranged a settlement.

NOTU is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

UGANDA

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively is recognized by law and established in practice. Union officials are not harassed, and unions have access to the industrial court. Under the Trade Disputes, Arbitration and Settlement Act, the industrial court hears and arbitrates trade disputes referred to it by either the Minister of Labor or the parties to the dispute. Through this mechanism disputes involving unions representing textile, postal, and railway workers were resolved in 1989. For some years the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) has noted that employees of the Bank of Uganda, "who cannot be considered to be public servants engaged in the administration of the State," do not enjoy the rights guaranteed by ILO Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining which Uganda has ratified. The COE has requested that the Government take steps to rectify the situation. There are no export processing zones in Uganda.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law. Under the NRA code of conduct, soldiers tried by military tribunals can be sentenced to forced labor as part of their punishment. There have been reports of forced labor at NRA camps where captured rebel soldiers are "rehabilitated."

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Most of Uganda's 16 million people live in rural areas on subsistence farms. In the modern wage sector the legal minimum age for employment is 12 years except for light work which the Minister of Labor may exempt. There are legal restrictions on employing persons under 16 years of age in mining and night work, except in the case of apprenticeship. Enforcement of minimum age restrictions is limited, but few children are employed in the wage sector due to the scarcity of jobs and the large pool of unemployed adults. Many children, however, work as market boys, car washers, and street vendors in the towns.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The normal workweek is 48 hours. Time and a half must be paid for each additional hour worked. Wages are unrealistically low compared to the cost of living. An entry level clerk in a government ministry could expect to earn about $9 per month at the parallel market exchange rate, which is the rate at which goods are priced. The nominal minimum wage is $4 per month at this rate. A large bunch of matoke bananas (a staple crop) costs $2 and a pair of leather shoes costs $60. Anything that has to be imported is prohibitively expensive for the average wage earner. Thus, workers must either find a second job or grow their own food to be able to feed their families and pay primary and secondary school fees. Medical care is supposed to be provided by employers but is generally lacking. Occupational safety and health standards have been legislated, but in practice labor laws are seldom enforced.

ZAIRE

In 1989 President Mobutu Sese Seko completed 24 years as President of Zaire, a huge, poor country with widely disparate ethnic, cultural, and linguistic groups, whose transition to independence in 1960 was marked by extensive civil strife. He is founder-president of Zaire's sole legal party, the Popular Movement of the Revolution (MPR). Legislative power is in principle vested in the elected unicameral Legislative Council, but the President has the constitutional power to promulgate laws by decree, which he did on several occasions in 1989. The party doctrine is defined by the Constitution as "Mobutuism." All citizens are members of the MPR from birth. The Executive Council (Prime Minister and Council of Ministers), the Legislative Council, the judiciary, and the only legal labor union are all considered organs of the party. Legal political activity is limited to the party and its affiliates. The focal point of the party and the Government is the party's Central Committee (148 members) which meets semiannually.

An overlapping array of security organizations, notably the civilian National Documentation Agency (AND), the National Immigration Agency (ANI), the gendarmerie, the civil guard, and the armed forces (especially military intelligence--SARM) share responsibility for identifying and controlling potential internal and external threats. Their broad powers and uneven discipline have resulted in arbitrary harassment, physical mistreatment, and unauthorized detention of ordinary citizens as well as political opponents of the Government. In May the Government placed four of the security services (AND, ANI, SARM, and the civil guard) under the authority of the State Commissioner for Territorial Security and gave that position to a highly respected general. Late in 1989, this official took preliminary steps toward implementing effective coordinating mechanisms which could enhance the discipline of these forces.

Zaire has a mixed economy involving an active private sector and an extensive but declining number of state enterprises. Major mining, transportation, and communication activities are still largely state owned. About 70 percent of the population is rural, engaged in subsistence agriculture using traditional methods of farming. Per capita income is approximately $180 per year, among the world's lowest, and is declining further as population increases faster (3 percent per year) than economic growth (2 percent per year). Zaire's communications and transportation infrastructures are greatly eroded, making communication between the institutions of government in the capital and distant outlying regions increasingly difficult. Inflation reached high levels in 1988 and early 1989 due to government deficit spending. The implementation of new economic policies, aided by high copper prices, had brought inflation down from over 20 percent per month to about 3 percent per month. In June 1989, Zaire launched a new International Monetary Fund stabilization program. The first half year review by the World Bank and the Fund showed positive performance within their guidelines. Still, the economy remains vulnerable to changes in world market prices of its commodity exports; mining industry income is crucial, and the sharp 1989 drop in coffee earnings hurt the structural adjustment effort.

Human rights in Zaire continued to be circumscribed in 1989 in such basic areas as freedom of speech, press, assembly, and integrity of the person. The Government continued to take actions, including arrest and internal exile, to quash activities of members of the principal internal opposition group, the Union for Democracy and Social Progress (UDPS), who advocate the establishment of a second legal political party. In 1989 police and military personnel frequently abused their authority and arbitrarily arrested, detained, and extorted money from civilians. To demonstrate its concern over the problems of indiscipline and criminal activity within the police and military, the Government held separate, highly publicized trials in September, in which soldiers as well as civilians were convicted of violent crimes and condemned to death, a most unusual sentence in Zaire.

Through the Judicial Council and the Department (Ministry) of Citizens' Rights and Liberties (DCRL), the Government continued in 1989 its efforts to prevent human rights abuses. The Judicial Council (a super-ministry of justice also charged with administration of the court and penal systems) continued successful efforts initiated in previous years to moderate prison conditions, regularize arrest authority and procedures, and hear public grievances. The stated mission of the DCRL, which is directed personally by the senior Vice Prime Minister, is to defend citizens' rights when all other legal recourse has been exhausted. It was able in 1989 to resolve a number of cases of a civil nature (titles to land and contract disputes) but has exhibited little capability for systemic redress of human rights abuses, and its role in the judicial process is increasingly unclear.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killings

There were no reported cases of politically-motivated killings in 1989. However, while quelling student-led disturbances in February, security officials killed a number of students (see Section 2.b.). Three officials subsequently were tried and convicted for using excessive force.

b. Disappearance

There were no confirmed reports of disappearance of persons for political causes, but at year's end the whereabouts of Mangala Ngolu-Ndaki, a UDPS activist, were unknown. Mangala traveled with President Mobutu to the United States in October. He has not been seen by his family since the trip, but human rights observers believe he was being held incommunicado by the Government. There were unconfirmed reports that some students arrested after January-February demonstrations were flown to unknown destinations in the interior, and either imprisoned or released. The security services often hold detainees incommunicado for varying lengths of time. Observers sometimes hear of a person's disappearance, but less often of eventual reappearance. The number of those who may have disappeared, for political or other reasons, is unknown.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture and physical mistreatment of detainees are against the law and contrary to officially stated policy, in practice beatings and other physical mistreatment of prisoners and detainees continued during the year, some involving UDPS members held at high security prisons. Nonpolitical prisoners are also subject to abuse, and private citizens are often beaten and robbed by security officials. A 1989 ordinance issued by the President suggested that the Government intends to take legal action against members of the security services in instances of inhumane treatment or torture, which it has rarely done in the past. By year's end it was too early to tell how effectively the new measures would be implemented, particularly in cases involving abuse of political dissidents.

Hunger and disease have been common in Zaire's prisons in past years. The Judicial Council continued to introduce measures to improve conditions in Zaire's prison and judicial systems, including the establishment of a special commission to supervise prison administration. In those prisons under the Council's jurisdiction, funding was increased to provide prisoners two meals a day, beds, blankets, and medical supplies. These measures, in addition to those taken earlier, have brought improvement in Kinshasa and in other major cities. Their effectiveness in outlying areas is less certain, and they have no effect on the military prison system where political detainees are likely to be held.

The International Commission of the Red Cross (ICRC) also has helped to improve conditions in civilian prisons by providing basic medical supplies and clothing. They funded the establishment of a dispensary at one prison. Throughout 1989, the ICRC was allowed access to most prisons. An exception was the prisons controlled by the Special Presidential Division (DPS).

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, Exile or Forced Labor

By law, those arrested by a judicial police officer must be brought before a magistrate within 48 hours for an initial hearing and determination of sufficient grounds for arrest. If this determination is positive, the magistrate can order bail or preventive detention for up to 15 days. The case must be brought up for review by a three-magistrate body within 5 days of the defendant's preventive detention. If the decision is upheld, the case is ordered to trial when the investigation is completed. The law stipulates that these periods of detention may be extended only in exceptional cases. In practice, arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention without charges are common occurrences, affecting many people who come into contact with the criminal justice system. Suspects are often arrested and held for months without a hearing, often incommunicado. In an effort to reduce the frequency of these occurrences, Judicial Council personnel are in principle supposed to visit prisons and detention centers each night to take detainees before a magistrate within the required 48 hours. Because of the lack of personnel and communications and transportation problems, it is not always able to achieve this objective.

Police and military personnel continued to abuse their authority in 1989 and frequently harassed, arrested, and extorted money from civilians. The civil guard arrested a number of local and foreign businessmen on false charges or for questionable, albeit common, Zairian business practices. They were held in detention until bribes were paid.

Persons with financial resources are known to buy their way out of detention without charges ever being filed. Moreover, a person with money or strong political ties is often freed before serving his sentence, regardless of the gravity of the crime committed. On the other hand, detainees and prisoners without financial means or political influence often remain in custody indefinitely without ever going to trial.

The President of the Judicial Council pursued efforts to enforce a series of presidential ordinances enacted in 1988 to rein in corruption and abuses by police and security officers. These ordinances regulate arrest authority and procedures and cover all officials with arrest powers from police or security agencies. The Council has attempted to require all arresting officials to take an oath to uphold the law and to act solely within legal authority. After taking the oath, each is assigned a number and given a photographic identification card that must be presented when carrying out an arrest, search, or seizure. Citizens have the theoretical right to see the identification card. The ordinances specify the powers and duties of these officers, including limits on arrest authority, and requirements to arraign detainees within 48 hours. Thus far, the impact of these ordinances has been limited. Judicial police officers under direct Judicial Council control and the gendarmerie have taken the oath. The civil guard and ANI have not. The AND administrator general has notified the Judicial Council that AND officers, while not signing the oath, recognize the legal obligations contained in it.

Most persons detained for political reasons are held by means of nonjudicial sanctions ranging from administrative detention and house arrest to internal exile and restriction of movement and travel. They are not formally charged or tried, remaining in detention or internal exile until the President or one of the security service officials chooses to release them. Although such arrests and detentions are not usually a matter of public record, the whereabouts of the more important detainees are usually known, although sometimes not acknowledged by the Government.

In recent years, the Government has engaged in actions (using both internal exile and prison detention) to both curb and co-opt the members of the primary banned internal opposition party, the UDPS, back into the MPR. Fifteen UDPS members were understood to have been arrested in January. The Government appeared especially sensitive to UDPS activity during and after the February student demonstrations. In August the U.S. Embassy gave the DCRL and Judicial Council a list of 10 UDPS members or associates believed arrested in July and still held. No response was received by the end of 1989 despite several follow-ups. The number of UDPS or other political detainees remaining in that status was unknown at the end of 1989. In November, Amnesty International (AI) estimated that there were about 100 UDPS dissidents being held in all of Zaire.

As in past years, UDPS leader Tshisekedi wa Mulumba was kept under various degrees of arrest, house arrest, or surveillance during most of 1989. On July 7, for example, he was arrested while attempting to travel to his brother's consecration as a bishop in central Zaire. He was released on July 11, but has been under de facto house arrest since then, his access to visitors frequently has been denied.

A delegation of the New York-based Lawyers' Committee on Human Rights visited Zaire at government invitation in August. The delegation visited a number of Zairian government officials and, though denied permission to see Tshisekedi, did talk to numerous other critics of the Government. During and after their visit, security forces arrested a half dozen of the dissidents with whom the delegation met. Four of those arrested have been released. One of them, Omene Samba Gauthier, has addressed a complaint about his treatment to the United Nations.

A small number of opponents of the Government live in self-exile in Europe, including the former chief of staff, General Mukoba, who, according to AI's 1989 report was expelled from Kinshasa without a formal banishment order. There were no known cases of external exile or expulsion of Zairians from the country in 1989. Political opponents in exile probably could return safely to Zaire if they were prepared to keep their political views to themselves.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Zaire's highly centralized Government exercises control over the judiciary, principally through the Judicial Council. The legal system is rooted in Belgian and customary law. The modern court system includes the Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal in each region, and the Court of State Security.

Defendants are entitled under the Constitution to a public trial and defense counsel. Counsel must be engaged (at public expense if necessary) in all trials before the Supreme Court and before lesser courts (including courts martial) in capital cases. Free legal aid may also be provided in other cases at the request of the court concerned.

The availability of counsel is limited in many lesser civil and criminal cases by the poverty of the defendants and by the fact that there are less than 500 lawyers in all of Zaire. A number of attorneys in Kinshasa, in conjunction with the bar of Kinshasa, provide pro bono defense, and two government-subsidized offices in Kinshasa were established in 1989 to provide legal advice to the poor. When available, defense counsels generally function freely and without coercion. Most defendants who are aware of their rights avail themselves of the right to appeal. Decisions of the State Security Court involving national security, armed robbery, and smuggling are not subject to appeal; but all other procedural protections of the criminal code apply. While courts-martial generally try only cases involving military personnel, in time of emergency or during military operations the President can suspend civilian courts and transfer jurisdiction over all cases to them. In practice many security-related cases never come to trial.

At the political level, all judges are members of the MPR and are subject to party discipline. Thus, while judges in fact perform their functions without political interference in the great majority of cases, in sensitive or highly politicized cases they operate under implicit or explicit constraints from the executive or security forces. At the daily operational level, some magistrates and lawyers accept bribes, applying the full rigor of the law only to those who are unable to pay. The salary received by magistrates, as in the case of members of the security services, is so low as to foster this corruption. At the end of 1989, the Government raised magistrates' pay significantly in an effort to stem corruption.

There is an ongoing effort by the President, the Judicial Council, and leaders of the legal profession to improve the judicial system, and extend its effectiveness beyond Kinshasa. In October President Mobutu signed a decree dismissing four judges of courts of first instance, a counselor of the court of appeals, and a public attorney, for refusing to work in the interior of the country as ordered.

The Department of Citizens' Rights and Liberties (DCRL), created in 1986 to redress citizens' rights when all other legal avenues had failed, began operation in 1987. It has a central office and district offices in all of Kinshasa's 24 urban zones and has 32 offices throughout the rest of the country. During 1989 the DCRL Minister completed a series of highly publicized visits to these regional offices and personally participated in hearings of the grievances of individual citizens. DCRL representatives noted that lack of adequate transportation and other resources had hampered their effectiveness in outlying areas, and the Minister has sought financial support from Western donors with some success.

The great majority of cases handled dealt with such subjects as labor conflicts, title to land, execution of judgments, and inheritance. Perhaps one-quarter to one-third concerned human rights abuses, such as arbitrary arrests, prolonged detentions, illegal seizures, and abuses by security forces, but few results have been achieved to date in such cases. In September President Mobutu issued two ordinances, one authorizing the DCRL to bring civil suits against security services or their representatives on behalf of alleged torture victims, and a second forbidding the Supreme Court from considering appeals of DCRL decisions. The second ordinance, while apparently designed to strengthen the DCRL's power to redress individual grievances, also circumscribed the Supreme Court's power of judicial review, with uncertain consequences for the operation of the Zairian judiciary.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

All Zairians automatically become members of the MPR at birth. Party and state security organizations extend down to the neighborhood level, and they maintain liaison offices in all government agencies (including military units, universities, the legislative council, and ministries). Party officials, civil servants, armed forces personnel, parliamentarians, and employees of state enterprises are taxed to support the activities of the party's major organs (cadre training, mobilization, propaganda, women's affairs, and youth). These party cadres are required to attend the party's training institute. Absence can result in reprimands and suspensions. Government employees, market vendors, and blue-collar workers are often required to participate in public events--parades, official arrival and departure ceremonies, etc.--or risk losing their jobs. In line with the party-state's ideology of Zairian authenticity, Zairian men are forbidden to wear ties. Zairians also are forbidden in principle to use non-African names, although this provision is not normally enforced.

Except in cases of threats to national security, the law requires the police to have a judicial warrant before they can search a home. In practice, police and security authorities often enter and search homes without such warrants. Zairians widely believe that the security services sporadically open mail and tap telephone conversations.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While the Constitution provides for the right of all citizens to express their opinions and feelings freely, it subordinates that and all other rights to the need to ensure "public order and good conduct." Since Zairians are automatically members of the sole political party (MPR), the ideology of the MPR is the only legally acceptable political thought. The MPR ideology comprises the views and policies of the party's chairman and founder, President Mobutu Sese Seko, but is not necessarily defined in great detail.

The Government continued to make arrests in 1989 for possessing or distributing political literature or documents that it found objectionable, including those outlawed under a Zairian law forbidding the distribution of "pamphlets of a foreign origin or inspiration and of such a nature as to damage the national interest" (see Section 1.d.).

Radio and television are owned and operated by the State. The major newspapers are privately owned but depend upon significant government subsidies for survival. In addition, they receive most of their news from the Zairian National Press Agency (AZAP), a state organization. The media are expected to promote the ideals and principles of the party and praise its leadership. Generally, publishers and editors are active party members. Commentary on domestic or foreign issues which the Government considers sensitive generally is discouraged, and direct criticism of the President is forbidden. While journalists are circumspect in their criticism of other high officials as well, criticism of incompetent officials or inadequate government services and corruption frequently appears in print.

Media censorship tends to be self-imposed. Zairian journalists must be members of the press union in order to practice their profession. The threat of ouster from the union and consequent loss of livelihood are strong inducements toward self-censorship. In some instances involving national interests, reporting is directed by the Government. For instance, the Department of Information at one point circulated a memorandum directing the media not to editorialize on Zaire's political and economic differences with Belgium. In March Makoko Musheni was dismissed from the government-owned Radio and Television Agency for quoting a Jeune Afrique article on Zaire's difficulties with Belgium. Kafuka Rujamizi was dismissed from the Agency for reporting on the evolution of fuel and transport costs. Both men and another journalist fired for critical reporting, Mikiti Kombi, have been rehired, but none is currently in a broadcasting position.

The Government also uses other techniques to control the media, including detention. In early 1989, Lumpungu Kanyinda, the editor of a regional paper, was arrested, though criminal charges against him later were dropped in favor of a civil suit. No closings of newspapers were reported in 1989. There are several clandestine presses that operate sporadically, printing flyers and handbills critical of the Government and various Zairian leaders.

Foreign journalists wishing to visit Zaire must receive prior permission from the Department of Information. Artistic and academic freedom of expression are subject to the same restrictions and self-censorship as the press. Mandatory membership in professional organizations and well-developed informer networks serve to discourage dissent. Some books are prohibited, and films, newspapers, and magazines are subject to banning. Imported publications, including books and periodicals, are subject to censorship if they criticize Zaire or its Government, although articles criticizing aspects of the Government's economic policy have circulated uncensored.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Groups other than the party and its affiliates may hold public meetings only with government authorization. The Government permits the existence of nonpolitical associations, but in principle they must notify authorities when they plan meetings or activities involving more than 5 people. In practice this is rarely enforced. Meetings of nonofficial organizations have been disrupted by government agents because of suspected political activities. UDPS leader Tshisekedi, in a letter to the Commissioner of State for National Defense and Territorial Security, complained that at 10 p.m. on January 17 military intelligence had arrested nine persons at a reception which he had just departed.

In February student demonstrations in Kinshasa, which had begun with complaints over transportation, and Lubumbashi took on a more political tone. After the students resorted to violence, including stoning and burning cars and buses, the Government responded with a massive deployment of security forces. Some units reportedly fired on demonstrating students. Reports of the number killed ranged from 2 to over 20, with scores of students injured, but these figures could not be confirmed. The Government itself criticized the excessive security force reaction against the student demonstrations in Lubumbashi. On April 24, the press reported that two army officers and a noncommissioned officer had been convicted (a major for "allowing troops under his command to open fire on students," and a corporal for "murder") for their roles in putting down the Lubumbashi demonstrations. It was unknown if the sentences had been carried out by the end of 1989.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is recognized in the Constitution, the Government officially sanctions most major world religions, and religious practice is generally free. Zaire's population is overwhelmingly Christian, though indigenous beliefs and religious traditions exert a major influence. Catholics make up 50 percent of the population, and Protestants, including the local Kimbanguist Church, 36 percent. Five percent of Zairians are Muslims. Officially recognized religions are free to establish places of worship and to train clergy. Most churches maintain active links with coreligionists outside the country, and expatriate missionaries are allowed to proselytize and to serve both Zairian and expatriate congregations. Affiliation with a recognized religion confers neither advantage nor disadvantage with respect to secular status.

Despite the general freedom of religion, the party-state ideology on occasion has been interpreted as requiring the individual to place loyalty to the State ahead of religion. In 1989 President Mobutu canceled church services one Sunday to assure attendance at a political event. New churches are required to obtain government recognition to operate freely, and that recognition has been difficult for less well-known churches to obtain. Adherents to sects not officially recognized by the Government can find themselves at the mercy of local officials.

Traditional African religious groups are allowed to practice their beliefs, but are not officially recognized. The Jehovah's Witnesses and a number of other religious groups and sects, banned in 1986 on charges of fraud or subversive activities, remained banned in 1989. These groups are considered antigovernment because of their refusal to recognize national symbols, such as the flag and the national anthem, or to participate in political ceremonies.

A government report issued in April 1988 indicated that 357 sects and churches were operating illegally in Zaire. The Government ordered them closed until such time as the authorities give them permission to function. The report noted that the Constitution recognized the rights of religious associations as long as their activities were not contrary to the law or public order. A year later, in July 1989, the Kinshasa municipal government ordered closure of "over 400 religious groups," according to press reports.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government at times imposes special documentation requirements for travel to areas of unrest or security concern. As noted earlier, the Government also restricts a few dissidents to villages of origin or other locations in the interior. Foreign residents must have special permits to travel into certain regions such as diamond-producing areas. All citizens, refugees, and permanent residents must carry government-issued identity cards, and police and military personnel often set up checkpoints along major roads to inspect papers. Those whose documents are not in order must pay a fine or go to jail. In principle, any Zairian citizen may obtain a passport and exit visa, although on occasion government and security officials have impeded issuance in order to prevent or disrupt the travel of persons suspected of political opposition. A married woman must have her husband's permission before obtaining a passport.

In 1989 there were estimates of 50,000 officially registered Zairians living as displaced persons or refugees in neighboring countries. In 1989 Zaire signed an agreement with Angola providing for the return of up to 5,000 refugees, and a majority had returned by year's end. A small number of political refugees also reside in the Congo and Tanzania. There are continuing reports in the east of refugees fleeing for Uganda, in one case after the killing of a Zairian soldier and subsequent reprisals against local villagers. It is likely that many Zairian displaced persons could return to Zaire if they wished.

By mid-1988, Zaire was providing safe haven to approximately 345,000 refugees, of whom 314,000 are Angolans. Refugees generally are allowed to pass freely into Zaire, but upon entry they are first processed by military and state security officials. Refugees are sometimes detained or closely monitored on suspicion of illegal political activity. The Government provides land for resettlement and camps. Outside agencies, especially the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), provide food, housing, transportation, and medical care.

Forced repatriation is contrary to official government policy and rarely occurs, but there was at least one such case in 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right to change their government through democratic means. Political power in Zaire is highly centralized and controlled by the President, who, while normally consulting widely, makes all important decisions. Policies are executed by the Prime Minister and Cabinet, both appointed by the President. Advocacy of a multiparty system or opposition to the party-state are contrary to the Constitution and laws, as are actions that question the authority of the President and the political system.

Suffrage is universal beginning at age 18, and voting is mandatory, enforced in theory by penalties including fines or arrest. The national Parliament, municipal councils, and rural and urban zone councils are chosen by direct popular elections that also take place every 5 years. All candidates are carefully screened by party committees at the appropriate level, but voters generally have a choice among several candidates. In the 1987 parliamentary elections, over half of the incumbents were defeated. President Mobutu was reelected unopposed in 1984 to a third 7-year term in office.

Countrywide local elections--annulled in 1987 because of government charges of fraud and postponed twice since February 1988--were held in late May. Just before the scheduled vote, President Mobutu ordered postponement of elections in north and south Kivu because of growing ethnic tensions over voter eligibility. The Zairian press reported only a few incidents of voting irregularities or fraud. Many voting places lacked voting booths, forcing voters to drop their ballots in urns with the candidate's name on it in front of local officials. Some estimates put voter turnout at considerably lower than 50 percent.

Since 1980 members of the UDPS (see Section 1.d.) have been involved in efforts to establish a second political party. Their efforts have been rebuffed both by the official party and by the President, and UDPS leaders have suffered arrest and detention at various times over the past 7 years. The UDPS leaders released from internal exile in June 1987 have taken two different routes: some UDPS activists have accepted government positions; others remain outside the MPR and were arrested and detained on several occasions in 1989.

ZAIRE

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government's attitude toward external investigations has been inconsistent, as with the 1989 visits from the Lawyers' Committee on Human Rights (see Section 1.d.). The ICRC has been allowed to maintain a permanent office in Zaire since 1978, although at times its access to prisons has been restricted. AI asked the DCRL about numerous detainees in 1989 and received responses to some of its queries. A delegation from AI visited Zaire in November. There are no independent human rights monitoring organization in Zaire.

The Government maintains that Zaire's human rights practices meet international standards and denies charges of systematic and serious violations. It participated in the 43rd, 44th, and 45th sessions of the U.N. Human Rights Commission (UNHRC), and Zaire's representative, the Minister of Citizens' Rights and Liberties, again defended his Government's concern for human rights.

Home to several hundred disparate ethnic groups, most with their own tribal languages, Zaire has a population of over 33 million. The Government has sought to defuse disputes based on linguistic or ethnic differences by adopting French as the official language of government and education.

Though many residents of the President's home region of Equateur, and especially of the President's own Ngbandi tribe, occupy high positions, the Government strives to counter ethnic divisions by recruiting ministers and other high government officials from all regions and major ethnic groups. There are no significant ethnic or racial groups that have suffered official discrimination in the past 10 years.

Custom, tradition, and existing law constrain women from attaining social equality. Women generally hold lower positions and earn less than men in the same jobs. However, women's rights to own property and participate in the political and economic sectors are protected by law, including the 1987 family code. This code expressly provides for women to inherit their husband's estates and strengthens their right to manage personal property and their right to a property settlement upon divorce. Nonetheless, it retains provisions requiring a married woman to obey her husband and obtain his permission for all legal transactions (to open a bank account, accept a job, obtain a passport, rent or sell real estate, etc.) The party's office of women's affairs promotes greater participation by women in the nation's economic, social, and political life and has worked with other organizations to publicize the provisions of the family code. A growing number of women work in the professions, the universities, and government service, but few are in senior, policymaking positions.

Reliable information is not available on violence against women, including wife beating. The police do not normally intervene in domestic disputes, and few cases come before the courts. Violence against women is not a topic of public discussion, and therefore not seen as a major social problem. Neither the Government nor women's groups have addressed this issue.

ZAIRE

Women, like men, often suffer from the indiscipline of the security forces, and there are unconfirmable charges from the villages of rape by locally based soldiers. Female circumcision is not generally practiced in Zaire, though unconfirmed reports suggest it may exist in scattered remote areas of northern Zaire.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The labor movement in Zaire is limited by law to one national union, the National Union of Zairian Workers (UNTZa), which is an integral unit of the sole political party. The Secretary General of UNTZa is a member of the party's Central Committee, and union officials at the regional level serve on regional party committees.

Membership in UNTZa is compulsory for civil servants, employees of state enterprises, and employees of private firms with at least 20 employees. The union claims about 1 million workers as dues-paying members, for whom there is a check off system. The overwhelming majority of the work force is self-employed, either in the unofficial sector or in subsistence agriculture.

UNTZa participates actively in the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and maintains ties with a number of foreign labor confederations.

The right to strike is included in the labor law, but because the law establishes lengthy and mandatory arbitration and appeal procedures which result in the resolution of most labor disputes, in practice lawful strikes do not occur. Workers, nevertheless, conduct frequent unauthorized strikes against employers. In these circumstances, UNTZa is called in to attempt to resolve the dispute, though in some instances employers and workers have reached a settlement without UNTZa's participation.

b. Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

While UNTZa has the right to bargain collectively with employers, as part of Zaire's party-state structure, it is unable to protect worker interests or defend worker rights that run counter to government policies. It provides social and educational services to members and their families and is charged with implementing government programs to improve worker benefits.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) has noted the Government's assurances that, as part of the revision of the labor code, measures are to be taken to strengthen the provisions protecting workers against acts of antiunion discrimination by imposing fines on employers committing such acts.

Workers are uniformly covered by labor legislation throughout the country, including in the proposed new export processing zone.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution and labor code forbid forced labor. The sole political party in the past organized a labor supply for public works projects by strongly encouraging neighborhood or community participation once a week. This practice of "salongo" has now been generally abandoned, but is still at least sporadically implemented in some limited areas of the countryside.

Zairian legislation providing for compulsory civilian service for graduates from pedagogical and technical institutes was repealed in March 1987.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legislated minimum age for employment is 18, although those between ages 14 and 18 can legally engage in "light work" if a parent or guardian consents. Due to high levels of unemployment, many children under 14 years of age work in the informal economic sector, especially in subsistence agriculture, to supplement family income. Minimum wage, safety, and health standards are not observed for them.

Workers are entitled to a minimum daily wage (currently less than 50 cents), paid holidays, and vacations; they receive at least 1 rest day per week; fringe benefits usually include a housing allowance, medical care, uniforms, transportation, and a midday meal. Working hours are limited to 48 hours a week. Workplaces are legally required to meet minimum safety and health standards. Most workers in the organized wage sector know their rights, and the UNT2a is charged with monitoring employer compliance with labor laws. This covers only the roughly 1 million organized workers out of a potential work force of 17 million. The majority of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture and small-scale commerce outside the formal sector.

In recent years income in the modern economy has not kept up with inflation, and the minimum wage does not provide a decent living for workers and their families. As a result, in the private sector, fringe benefits, which are not subject to income tax, often constitute more than half the total wage package. With these benefits, workers are able to maintain a modest standard of living. In the spring, the Government committed itself to a 20 percent salary increase for government employees, and as of October workers had begun to receive their raises. Public sector remuneration remains low, however, and workers are often driven to corruption or to take second jobs in the private sector.

ZAMBIA

In Zambia's one-party system of government, President Kenneth Kaunda exercises predominant executive authority. He is advised by a central committee of party leaders and governs through a cabinet and a parliament. There is strong competition for parliamentary seats within the single-party structure. All candidates for political office at any level must be members of the United National Independence Party (UNIP) and must be screened by its Central Committee in advance. Under a state of emergency in effect for the past 25 years, the President has broad discretion to detain or restrict the movements of people, and law enforcement personnel have extraordinary powers to detain suspects and search homes.

The Zambian police, operating under the Ministry of Home Affairs, have primary responsibility for maintaining law and order. Divided into regular and paramilitary units, it supervises a volunteer vigilante force composed primarily of party activists. The Zambian Intelligence and Security Service is charged with intelligence and counterespionage responsibilities while the armed services are used for internal security, especially at checkpoints and roadblocks.

Although Zambia's economy grew in real terms for the second straight year (after years of steady deterioration) due to high copper prices and bumper corn crops, per capita income continues to decline because of rapid population growth. Over the near and medium term, the country will continue to be burdened with an overvalued currency and beset by high inflation, high unemployment, and chronic underutilization of industrial production. The Government undertook economic reforms late in 1988 with stiffer measures in 1989 designed to stimulate market forces by ending subsidies and price controls and by significantly devaluing the currency. With more reforms required, Zambia will be hard pressed to cushion the blows on its poorest citizens.

Positive human rights developments in Zambia in 1989 included judicial action against officials accused of mistreating prisoners; release of detained opposition political party members; the return of shops seized in an earlier crackdown on "black marketeering;" and spirited, widely reported, parliamentary debate over Zambia's one-party state and State of Emergency, issues that were previously not discussed publicly.

Areas in which human rights problems occurred in 1989 included mistreatment of prisoners and detainees, including evidence of torture; arbitrary and excessively long detentions; lack of fair trials in security cases; restrictions on freedoms of speech, press, assembly, and association; the right of citizens to change their government; and traditional, often illegal, discrimination against women. In 1989 the deteriorating economic situation and increased authority granted by the 1988 Emergency Powers Act led police to use excessive force in their efforts to curb smuggling and illegal trading and to stem the influx of illegal aliens. In assisting the police, overzealous party militants and vigilantes also used illegal means or excessive force.

ZAMBIA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and other Extrajudicial Killing

In 1989 no killings occurred which could be attributed to the Zambian Government. Ten people were killed when a household of Malawian dissidents was bombed in October. Zambian press reports hinted that Malawian government agents were to blame.

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of government-inspired disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture, but there are credible reports that police and military personnel have resorted to excessive force when interrogating detainees or prisoners. In January 1989, a Lusaka High Court judge expressed concern over the torture of people under the custody of law enforcement officers. Those who are maltreated by authorities can and do appeal to the judicial system for redress.

In 1989 Zambian courts tried some cases charging police or prison officers with mistreatment of prisoners. In one case, a man was awarded damages for pain, suffering, permanent damage to his eyesight, false imprisonment, and general damages when he was assaulted by police. In another case, a commanding officer of a regional prison and two senior subordinates were acquitted on charges of failing to feed a prisoner. Militant vigilantes were accused of publicly beating and humiliating citizens suspected of black marketeering. During 1989 two vigilantes were jailed for beating a suspected cattle rustler to death.

The vigilantes (volunteer party activists) are tasked with assisting the police in combating crime, black marketeering and smuggling. These units are frequently overzealous, and, in 1989 there were many citizen complaints of harsh treatment. The Human Rights Committee of the Law Association of Zambia (Copperbelt branch) appealed to the party to check harassment of the people by vigilantes.

Conditions in Zambian prisons are harsh with limited medical facilities. Several foreigners imprisoned for brief periods in Zambia have reported substandard food, overcrowding, and the absence of beds. According to Amnesty International's 1989 Report, covering 1988, these conditions have resulted in a number of deaths. The Report noted in particular the extent of overcrowding in the Central Remand Prison.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Preservation of Public Security Act (PSA) gives the President broad discretion during a state of emergency, which has been in effect since 1964, to detain or restrict the movements of persons and to order that persons be arrested and detained for indeterminate periods. Presidential detainees are entitled to formal notification of the reasons for their detention within 14 days of arrest; publication of their detention in the Government Gazette; access to counsel; frequent visitation by family and colleagues; immediate right to petition the detaining authority for release; and the right to seek judicial review of the detention order by an independent and impartial tribunal after 1 year. However, the President is not legally bound to accept a tribunal's recommendation of release if he still believes that the detainee poses a threat to national security. In practice, detainees have been released if the judicial tribunal so recommended. Some detainees have been held for years without coming to trial; for example, Faustino Lombe, who was arrested in 1981 for plotting the escape of detainees held on treason charges. He was not released until 1988.

ZAMBIA

In March one detainee successfully sued the State for unlawful detention and false imprisonment.

Approximately six people detained under presidential order were released in 1989. These included three alleged members of an opposition political party, the People's Redemption Organization (PRO), which is illegal under Zambia's Constitution. Four army officers, who were detained under presidential order and charged with coup plotting in 1988, were formally charged with treason and committed to the High Court for trial. According to the Government Gazette, approximately 18 persons were detained under the PSA. Four are suspected of involvement in the petrol-bombing murder of 10 Malawian exiles. Most of the remaining 14 are being held on suspicion of drug-related activities.

The 25-year state of emergency gives law officers and defense personnel extraordinary powers. Police officers of assistant inspector rank and above may arrest without a warrant and detain a person for up to 28 days if the officer has reason to believe that grounds exist to justify a presidential detention order. In theory, police must provide the detainee with reasons for his detention within 14 days of arrest. In July a magistrate summoned two police officers who in separate incidents had kept two accused persons for 7 days without detention orders. By the end of 1989, there was no information available on whether or not they were punished.

Police can use a 1989 law supplementing the Dangerous Drugs Act to secure forfeitures of property or proceeds earned or suspected to have been earned through drugs. A Drug Enforcement Commission was created in 1989 under the same Act.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Zambian judicial system consists of the Supreme Court with appellate powers and a series of lower courts of which the High Court is the most important. Although presidential detainees are not guaranteed public trial, such trials are usually public when they occur. In most cases, presidential detainees are eventually released without having been tried. The trial of Lt. Gen. Christian Tembo and three other military officers charged with plotting a coup was scheduled to be held in public in early 1990.

In ordinary cases, the law protects suspects' rights during the conduct of interrogations and provides for the right to legal representation at one's own expense or through legal aid; the right to give evidence under oath in criminal procedures; the right to give an unsworn statement; and the right to remain silent. The Zambian judiciary traditionally has maintained its independence from executive branch influence. Although the President has the power to appoint and transfer judges, there appears to be no evidence that such power has swayed court decisions.

The number of political prisoners held at the end of 1989 was unknown. There are five prisoners serving life sentences for coup plotting in 1980.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The inviolability of the home is generally respected, except in cases relating to the state of emergency or to roundups of illegal aliens and black marketeers. In such cases, security forces have broad powers and often enter the homes of suspects without search warrants.

In May 1989, 120 persons were picked up in Mongu and, in June the Flying Squad (an antirobbery unit) raided homes in a Kitwe residential area, allegedly to flush out illegal aliens. Such raids were extended in July to Chililabombwe where some persons were rounded up, allegedly for attempting to smuggle goods to Zaire.

Early in the year many businessmen, whose trading licenses were revoked in a 1988 clampdown on black marketeering, were given back their licenses and shops. They were also promised compensation for their losses.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are restricted. Parliament debates a wide range of political, economic, and social issues but within a controlled one-party context. Direct negative comments concerning the Head of State, or the national philosophy ("Humanism") generally may not be expressed in public, the Parliament or the media. A Kitwe resident was sentenced to 2 years hard labor in June after he was found guilty of defaming the President.

Toward the end of 1989, Members of Parliament questioned the usefulness of the one-party state and the state of emergency. These parliamentary debates were widely covered in the newspapers.

Since the beginning of 1989, the two national dailies have been owned by a new public corporation, the National Media Corporation, headed by an advisor to the President. Television and radio are also state owned under the Zambia National Broadcasting Corporation. In spite of its quasi-government ownership, the press generally carries a substantial amount of commentary critical of party and government performance but within the parameters of dissent tolerated by the Government.

Academic freedom is respected in Zambian society, and educators are outspoken in their opposition to government influence over the educational system. However, university teachers and researchers are subject to the same broad restrictions on criticism of the President and his philosophy that apply to other Zambians.

ZAMBIA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All political activity outside the one-party structure is banned. Police permits are issued routinely for meetings, rallies, or marches unless the Government believes the proceedings are likely to be contrary to its interests. There are a number of unofficial pressure groups for various economic, political, and social subjects. The most influential in affecting government policy are the Zambia Industrial and Commercial Association and the Commercial Farmers Bureau.

For discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution and respected in practice. Zambia has no state religion, and adherence to a particular faith does not confer either advantage or disadvantage. The Government has prohibited the Jehovah's Witnesses from proselytizing. Nevertheless, the sect functions openly, and its freedom to refrain from participating in various secular activities such as voting, singing the national anthem, and saluting the flag has been upheld in the courts and supported by senior party leaders. Christian missionaries from a wide variety of faiths operate in the country. Lay associations and religious youth groups operate independently of party control or influence.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Police roadblocks are common, and vehicles and passengers are commonly searched. Under the longstanding state of emergency legislation, the President may restrict the movement of persons within Zambia although this authority is seldom used and was not used in 1989. The Government withholds or withdraws passports to prevent foreign travel by persons whose activities are considered inimical to Zambian interests. In August junior doctors, who went on a "go-slow" demanding better conditions of service, were dismissed and their passports taken by police. The doctors were subsequently reinstated and their passports returned.

While the majority of Zambians are subsistence farmers, about 47 percent of the people live in urban areas, and migration to cities is increasing. In November 1989, President Kaunda announced that unemployed urban Zambians have until June 30, 1990, to return voluntarily to work the land in rural areas. The President warned that failure to respond to his call for voluntary resettlement would result in the imposition of an involuntary resettlement program next year. The Government has promised to provide the resettlers with land and food for 1 year to assist in the resettlement process.

Zambia hosts a large refugee/displaced persons population, particularly from Angola and Mozambique in several refugee settlement centers. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) estimates that there are approximately 143,000 refugees and displaced persons in Zambia. The largest group of refugees is from Angola, totaling more than 97,000 persons. Nearly 30,000 Mozambican refugees have also entered in recent years. In 1989 the Government cooperated with the UNHCR in the repatriation of over 4,000 Namibian refugees.

ZAMBIA

There have been repeated press reports of Mozambique National Resistance (RENAMO) guerrilla bands from Mozambique entering eastern Zambia and killing civilians while raiding villages. Zambian security forces reportedly pushed most of the rebels back across the border, killing 272 and capturing 117 as of June 1989.

Some dissidents who have left exile groups such as the African National Congress have been subject to harassment and abduction by their former associates, causing some embarrassment to the Government. The Government has cooperated with the UNHCR which has been active in intervening to provide protection and/or resettlement on a case-by-case basis. It also supported the U.N. Secretary General's Special Representative in Namibia in his efforts to investigate the question of Namibians allegedly detained by the South West Africa People's Organization.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government:

Zambian citizens do not have the right to change their form of government. Under the Constitution, UNIP is the sole legal political party. It has an estimated membership of less than 10 percent of the adult population. Power is concentrated in the hands of the President as leader of the party and Head of State. He plays a dominant role in determining the membership of Zambia's top executive institutions, including the party Central Committee and the Cabinet, which traditionally contain a general regional and tribal balance.

Candidates for political office at any level must be members of the party and are subject to close examination by the Central Committee. In practice, the political system is open to persons of somewhat divergent opinions, provided they are willing to work within the one-party structure and do not challenge the President's preeminent position.

Theoretically, the National Assembly is equal to the President in power and importance. However, following the October 1988 general election, the President moved to curb the independence of the newly elected National Assembly. In a break with tradition, members were sworn in by the President at the State House instead of by the Speaker at the National Assembly buildings, as had been the practice. At the ceremony, the President stated that unwarranted criticism in Parliament would not be tolerated and stressed that the National Assembly's principal purpose is to implement party policy through the drafting of legislation. Despite the President's warning, there was extensive criticism of party and government policies during the second 1989 session of Parliament. These debates were well covered in the press.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government neither encourages nor hinders inquiries or visits by human rights organizations.

In August 1989, the press carried an Amnesty International report which expressed concern over detained persons and urged the Government to release them without further delay. The Government, through the Minister of State for Home Affairs, has indicated that it is studying the report.

ZAMBIASection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status:

The population of 7 million comprises more than 70 Bantu-speaking tribal groupings. Economic and social needs are met on a generally nondiscriminatory basis. In 1989 compensation was promised to both black and Asian businessmen whose licenses and shops had been seized in 1988 (see Section 1.f.).

By law, women are entitled to full equality with men. In practice, while they participate increasingly in Zambia's social, economic, and political life and are gaining representation in the professions and higher education, they remain in a subordinate position in many ways. Zambian women are a major component of the rural work force. Customary law and practice, in contradiction to Zambia's Constitution and codified laws, place women in subordinate status with respect to property, inheritance, and marriage. Until 1989, under traditional customs, all rights to inherit property rested with the deceased man's family. The widow and her children were entitled to nothing. The Intestate Succession Act passed in 1989 guarantees widows a 20 percent share and children a 50 percent share in the inheritance of a deceased man's property. Divorce laws are applied to men and women equally.

There are no reliable statistics on the extent to which violence against women, including wife beating, occurs. Domestic assault is a criminal offense, but, in practice, police are often reluctant to pursue reports of wife beating or other forms of abuse. According to women's rights advocates, nondomestic violence against women is not generally tolerated by traditional or civil authorities. Victims usually report attacks, and legal action is taken. In crimes against women where rape, serious injury, or death occurs, men--including husbands--can receive sentences up to, and including, the death penalty.

According to the 1980 census, the percentage of literacy among Zambians above the age of 15 is 75.4 per cent for males and 53.1 per cent for females. In employment, Zambian men and women receive equal pay for equal work. However, there is no legal redress for women who are refused employment on the basis of their sex. Within the workplace, regulations often deny married professional women the fringe benefits (cars, housing etc.) provided to their male colleagues.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Zambia has a history of strong labor union organizations, dating from the establishment of the copper mines during the 1930's. Zambia's 18 large national unions, organized by industry or profession, are all members of the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), the sole legal confederation.

The ZCTU is not controlled by the party or the Government, and union leaders frequently criticize government policy on such subjects as wages, economic policy, conditions of service, and labor representation in party and government organs. The ZCTU is democratic and regularly conducts open elections to select its leadership.

ZAMBIA

With the economic downturn and implementation of stringent reform measures, there has been an increase in labor unrest. Under existing legislation, strikes are permitted only after all other recourse has been exhausted. In practice, virtually all strikes are illegal, since they almost always commence before the mandatory process of mediation has run its course. The Government normally has relied on persuasion and continued mediation to end strikes once they have begun.

Deteriorating economic conditions have resulted in widespread labor unrest. Throughout the year, teachers, bank workers, air traffic controllers, foresters, railway workers, sugar refinery workers, miners, and junior doctors were among the groups that mounted boycotts, "go-slows," and strikes. The Government instructed education officers to compile lists of teachers involved in class boycotts so disciplinary action could be taken but later backed down in the face of protests from the ZCTU and the teachers union. Twenty-six air traffic controllers were arrested and charged with taking part in an illegal strike. President Kaunda declared in 1989 that he would not tolerate any more wildcat strikes and would insist on total industrial peace. The Minister of Labor warned that trade union leaders abetting strikes would be deregistered and cease to hold office at any level while offending unions would be dissolved.

The ZCTU is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

ZCTU's right to organize and bargain collectively with employers is codified under regulations in the Industrial Relations Act (IRA). These rights are respected in practice. The IRA provides a mechanism for initiating and settling worker-employer disputes and provides for the establishment of an industrial relations court. Union rights against management interference or discrimination have been readily upheld by the industrial relations court. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Slavery, involuntary servitude, and forced labor are prohibited by the Constitution. Generally, these prohibitions are observed. In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts reiterated its longstanding request to the Government to modify various legislative provisions which it finds incompatible with Convention 105 on forced labor. The provisions in question impose imprisonment, involving forced labor, for expressing certain political views and/or for engaging in political activities outside the UNIP as a means of labor discipline or as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The ILO Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations also considered this issue at the ILO conference in June and requested the Government to take urgent action.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum age is 16. This and other age restrictions apply to the industrial sector, where, because of adult unemployment, there are few employees under age 16. However, persons under age 14 are often employed in the commercial and subsistence agricultural sectors. In 1986 (the most recent year for which statistics are available), 163,216 children aged 12 to 14 were employed--mainly on family farms--out of a total population of 464,809 in that age group.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Zambian law regulates minimum health and safety standards in any industrial undertaking. Enforcement of these laws is carried out by the Ministries of Mines and Labor. The Office of the Investigator General exists to redress the excessive use or abuse of power by government officials against their subordinates.

There is no general minimum wage in Zambia. However, each industry has its own minimum wage determined through the process of collective bargaining. In industries where collective bargaining is not effective, the Minister of Labor and Social Services has determined a lowest wage of an amount equivalent to about $1.00 a day for cleaners, office orderlies, and watchmen. An average wage for shopworkers is about $32 per month which is insufficient to provide an adequate standard of living. Most Zambian workers must supplement their incomes through second jobs, some subsistence farming, or reliance on the extended family. The normal workweek is 40 hours. There are legal requirements for annual leave (2 days per month of service) and maternity leave (90 days). Women are legally excluded from night work and a variety of hazardous occupations.

ZIMBABWE

Zimbabwe is governed by President Robert Mugabe and his Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU), who have dominated the legislative and executive branches of government since independence. In late 1987, Mugabe signed a unity accord with Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU) leader Joshua Nkomo intended to merge the two parties and fulfill the President's publicly stated intention to establish a one-party state. In 1989 the Zimbabwe Unity Movement (ZUM), a new opposition party, emerged with former ZANU stalwart Edgar Tekere as its chief. The new party contested seats in 1989 by-elections and pledged to run candidates for all 120 parliamentary seats in the expected 1990 general election. The Government has attempted to restrict ZUM's rise through the arrest and detention of its members and restrictions on its ability to campaign and have access to the media.

The armed forces, which number about 50,000 members, are primarily deployed to combat Mozambican National Resistance (RENAMO) incursions into villages along the eastern border and protect various transportation corridors in Mozambique. The Zimbabwe Republic Police (ZRP) is responsible for maintaining law and order. The Central Intelligence Organization (CIO), attached to the President's office, has police powers and can arrest, detain, and interrogate suspects in internal security cases. The CIO has often been accused of human rights abuses, including the use of torture.

Zimbabwe's economy has strong agricultural and mining sectors and a diversified manufacturing base. The economy is vulnerable to drought and falling commodity prices and is hampered by high taxes, price controls, restrictive labor regulations, and a chronic shortage of foreign exchange. With its important export-import capacity heavily dependent on rail links that pass through South Africa, Zimbabwe has undertaken a major effort, with Western donor support, to revitalize the rail-port system through Mozambique to the town of Beira.

The unity agreement led to a marked decrease in the number of human rights abuses by the Government; a significant exception has been the detention of ZUM followers, union members, and student leaders. The major incidents of 1989 included RENAMO attacks into Zimbabwe which resulted in the murder, kidnapping, and disappearance of Zimbabwean citizens, the bombing of a house formerly occupied by the African National Congress (ANC), the closure of the University of Zimbabwe and the arrest of student leaders, the detention and firing of workers striking for better wages, and the detention without bail of the head of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions for alleged subversive activities. In a mandatory relocation program, the Government moved over 9,000 villagers into protected areas to shield them from RENAMO attacks. The Government used these attacks to justify continuing the state of emergency (SOE) which the Parliament routinely ratifies every 6 months. Principal areas of human rights abuse in 1989 included torture, arbitrary detention, harassment of lawyers and human rights monitors, continued restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, the right of citizens to change their government, and societal violence against women.

ZIMBABWE

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political killings or summary executions by government security forces in 1989. RENAMO forces operating across the Mozambique-Zimbabwe border continued to commit atrocities, including arbitrary killings of innocent civilians in both Zimbabwe and Mozambique. In February 1989, the Minister of Home Affairs reported that there had been 420 RENAMO attacks in the preceding 6 months, with 93 Zimbabwean civilians killed.

b. Disappearance

Human rights observers in both Harare and Bulawayo reported that in 1989 there were no new cases of disappearance attributable to the Government. There has been, however, no progress in locating any of the people, almost all of whom were from Ndebele tribal regions, who disappeared in 1982-1985. Estimates of the number of disappeared ranged from at least 80 to as many as 400. The Government has never made a serious effort to account for these missing persons. Human rights organizations have pointed out that the ZANU-ZAPU unity accord has meant that the Government has not been called to account for past abuses.

Credible reports indicate hundreds of Zimbabweans continue to be abducted by RENAMO from the eastern border areas, and many never return from Mozambique where it is believed they are killed or forced to work for RENAMO.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Human rights organizations, including Amnesty International (AI), have stressed the problem of torture in Zimbabwe, especially by officials of the CIO. Detainees in security cases are often held incommunicado in the initial stage, and it is at this point that torture most often occurs, according to human rights observers. Firsthand reports in 1989 indicated that torture continued to be employed in some security cases, especially cases involving suspected South African and RENAMO agents. The case of Leslie Lesia, a South African trader who had been beaten so severely in 1988 that both of his legs were broken, again commanded international attention in 1989. Senior government officials strongly deny that torture is condoned but admit that isolated unauthorized instances have occurred. Local human rights officials claimed that security officials on a routine basis physically abused displaced Mozambicans suspected of being RENAMO supporters.

Police brutality in political and ordinary criminal cases is also a problem. In June baton-wielding riot police used excessive force in breaking up a university meeting addressed by Edgar Tekere. Black Zimbabweans often appear not to report instances of police brutality out of fear of reprisals and the perception that they will not receive much public attention. Occasionally, police are prosecuted on charges of brutality but rarely are severely punished. In one 1989 case, the authorities harassed and then detained an attorney defending a victim of police brutality.

ZIMBABWE

The Supreme Court abolished the use of whipping as a form of punishment in June 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The police must inform an arrested person of the charges against him before he is taken into custody. After completion of police questioning, the accused is asked to sign a statement which lists his replies to all the queries. The accused has the right to answer all questions in the presence of an attorney. The police (the arresting detail) must then decide if the accused should be released on bail or on his own recognizance. A Gweru magistrate has recently complained that many people are needlessly detained for petty crimes because police often fail to exercise their right to grant bail. However, respected Harare human rights observers opine that pretrial rights are generally respected, but occasionally inexperienced magistrates and overzealous police officers do not inform defendants of their rights.

Zimbabwean criminal law requires that a person arrested on a criminal charge must have a preliminary hearing before a magistrate within 48 hours, and the law is respected in practice. At that hearing, the magistrate decides whether the arrested person should be released on bail or held in custody until trial. However, in cases involving the SOE, the Minister of Home Affairs can issue a certificate which denies bail to a person under arrest even if the court has approved it. The Government has often used this prerogative in security-related or exchange control violations.

The Government has extensive detention authority in political and security cases. The SOE has been in continuous effect in Zimbabwe since 1965, and it permits indefinite detention without trial "in the interests of public safety or public order." The Minister of Home Affairs, who has broad powers under the SOE, has presented a motion every 6 months since that time calling for extension of the SOE. The Parliament has passed the motion 21 times, and on each occasion, the President then signed a proclamation extending the SOE.

Under the SOE implementing legislation, the Emergency Powers Act (EPA), persons may be detained without an arrest warrant and held for up to 7 days before being informed of the reasons for detention. The law states that a detainee has the right to see a lawyer "without delay" after arrest, must receive enough specific detail of the charges to make meaningful representations, and after 30 days must appear before an independent review tribunal. This tribunal can recommend to the Minister of Home Affairs that the detainee be released if evidence is insufficient to warrant continued incarceration. The Minister may, however, recommend to the President that the detainee continue to be held. In practice, due to procedural delays, a detainee may have to wait several months before appearing before the review tribunal. In the past, the President has generally followed the tribunal's recommendations to release, but in 1988 twice he overruled the tribunal. In one of those cases the Government finally released, in August 1989, four whites (including Leslie Lesia) who had been held for 2 years for allegedly spying for South Africa.

Every defendant has the right to select a lawyer of his or her choosing. In civil cases, the indigent can apply to have the Government supply an attorney. Unfortunately, this right is not widely known, which prevents the majority of the poor from taking advantage of it. In capital cases, the Government will provide an attorney to all defendants unable to afford one. In certain cases that pertain to the SOE, the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace will often provide an attorney at no cost to the defendant.

The most common reasons for detention under the EPA are suspected dissident activity and spying for foreign powers, particularly South Africa. In 1989 the authorities detained and charged a ZUM supporter with using South African supplied-funds to purchase arms from a military installation in Mutare, a city it turned out he had never visited. In another case, a repatriate from South Africa was charged in 1989 with attempting to spy on African National Congress houses in Bulawayo and Harare. Although the Government initially held him but did not formally charge him under emergency powers, it subsequently denied him bail and then charged him under the Official Secrets Act for attempted espionage. The professionalism of police investigations has been eroded because of the ease with which persons can be detained under EPA regulations without any solid evidence of wrongdoing.

In most cases, after the initial detention the Government ultimately orders the arrest and charging of persons under the Law and Order Maintenance Act (LOMA), which provides sanctions for political crimes. (Sometimes the charging comes under the Official Secrets Act.) Such action then becomes part of a judicial process with recourse to a court trial. In 1989, 22 ZUM activists were arrested under the Act and charged with engaging in political activity without first obtaining permission. Fifteen university student leaders were arrested for publishing antigovernment documents, and another 4 were arrested during the 1989 campus demonstrations (see Section 2.b.). In addition, a senior trade union official was arrested for speaking in support of the students. The students and union leader were subsequently released, although the union leader spent 42 days in solitary confinement (see Section 6.a.).

The Government used its prerogative to deny bail in these cases. However, the students petitioned the High Court which subsequently ordered their release on the condition that they report to the police once a week. This condition has since been removed. None of the persons charged under LOMA had been tried by the end of the year.

It is not known exactly how many persons are currently detained on politically related charges. Although the Minister of Home Affairs denied that any Zimbabweans are being detained on the basis of political activities, reliable estimates point to 10 long-term detainees. Approximately 200 Ndebele arrested and convicted prior to the 1988 amnesty remained in detention. Human rights observers report, however, that there are far fewer detainees in 1989 than there were in 1988. There is also very little information available on numbers of persons being detained by military forces in the conflict with RENAMO.

A number of persons, including Reverend Ndabingi Sithole, remain in exile. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

ZIMBABWE

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Zimbabwe's legal system is based on a mixture of Roman-Dutch and English common law practices and procedures and consists of magisterial courts, a High Court, and a Supreme Court. In most instances, defendants must retain their own legal counsel because there is limited provision for public defenders. Defense counsel can present evidence and confront witnesses. Approximately 90 percent of defendants are not represented by counsel. The right to appeal exists in all cases and is automatic in cases where a death penalty is imposed. All trials are open to the public, except in rare cases in which the Government orders that the proceedings be held in camera, e.g., in certain security cases involving alleged South African agents.

The judiciary is generally independent and persons brought to trial can be assured of a fair public hearing. Although there are at present 500 lawyers in Zimbabwe, there is a shortage of experienced magistrates. Zimbabwe's judicial system is hard pressed to cope with ordinary criminal cases. There is a lag of 3 years in case and law reporting.

In the past, the Government has generally abided by court decisions even when it strongly opposed the ruling. However, security officials have recently been ignoring High Court rulings. In October trade union leader Morgan Tsvangirai was detained again as he departed a local police station following another High Court order that authorities release him. In 1989 police ignored a High Court order to investigate the fate of nine ZAPU supporters who disappeared in 1985.

In a related matter, the 1989 Africa Watch report stated that another worrying recent development has been the use of threats and criminal charges against lawyers acting in important political cases. According to the report, they experienced harassment in varying degrees of severity.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

The Constitution formally protects citizens from arbitrary search or entry, but under emergency regulations a police officer may stop and search any person or enter any area without a warrant when the officer has "reasonable grounds" for believing evidence of a crime may exist. It is widely believed that the Government monitors private correspondence and telephones, particularly with overseas partners.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Zimbabwe Constitution provides for freedom of expression but allows for legislation limiting this freedom when the "interest of defense, public safety, public order, state economic interests, public morality and public health" are involved. In practice, the Government interprets broadly its power to discourage free speech, and at public events it is generally assumed that speakers are under surveillance and may be subject to follow-up questioning by the CIO if the remarks are judged too controversial. The LOMA provides for the prosecution of persons who make racially inflammatory remarks. Notwithstanding the Government's efforts to limit criticism in Parliament in 1989, there was discussion of several controversial issues, such as corruption, military involvement in Mozambique, and the movement toward a one-party system.

Zimbabwe's major print media (five English-language newspapers and one vernacular broadsheet) are influenced through the Mass Media Trust, a quasi-governmental institution set up after independence. There are also smaller, privately owned print media, including a widely read economic newspaper. Television and radio are wholly government owned. Senior media officials follow the official government and ruling party line closely and practice a high degree of self-censorship. Press coverage which disputes the main lines of government policy, criticizes the ruling party, or questions the actions of senior government or party officials is increasingly rare.

The Government uses various methods to keep the media in line. In 1989, following a scandal involving the Government's purchase of automobiles (the Willowvale auto scandal), which eventually led to the resignations of several Cabinet ministers, the authorities transferred or promoted several investigative reporters of the Bulawayo Chronicle in what was widely interpreted as a government attempt to prevent reporters from widening the probe. Similarly, government authorities suspended two employees of the Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation from their positions for reporting a press conference by ZUM founder Edgar Tekere and interviewing a University of Zimbabwe professor on the feasibility of new government investment guidelines. While media coverage of ZUM rallies and speeches is almost nonexistent, numerous articles detailing the arrests of ZUM activists for allegedly violating the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act regularly appear in the news.

Academic freedom was seriously affected by events in 1989. The University, which has an enrollment of 9,000 students, was closed after police officers broke up a student protest demonstration (see Section 2.b. below).

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution formally provides for the right of assembly and association for political and nonpolitical organizations, including a broad spectrum of economic, professional, social, and recreational activities. In practice, there are serious obstacles to the full exercise of this right, particularly in the case of political associations.

Police permits are required for public meetings and political rallies. Organizations must pay the town council (usually controlled by ZANU) to use civic centers and stadiums. Reliable reports indicate that on many occasions town council members changed the rules for renting public places to ZUM members for holding election rallies after police had granted permission to hold the rallies.

In September University of Zimbabwe students attempted to hold a seminar to mark the anniversary of a major demonstration held in 1988 against corruption. The Government banned the seminar, and security forces were despatched to disperse students trying to conduct the meeting. The Student Representative Council (SRC) then issued a statement protesting the police action as a violation of academic and intellectual freedom. In response the police arrested two SRC leaders, Arthur Mutambara and Enoch Chikweche, for publishing a statement offensive to government leaders. As news of the arrests spread, 300 students assembled to protest. In the course of this demonstration, the students burned an automobile belonging to the University Vice Chancellor, and police were again called in to quell the disturbances, using tear gas and riot sticks. The police arrested 70 students, and the University was then closed. It reopened briefly to allow students to take final exams, but the Vice Chancellor required all students to sign a document pledging not to participate in demonstrations. The University was then closed again and remained closed at the end of the year.

There are numerous nonpolitical business and employers' organizations, professional associations, and recreational and sports clubs. These are generally free of governmental interference as long as their activities are viewed as nonpolitical.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.c.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is respected in Zimbabwe. There is no state religion. Denominations are permitted to worship openly, pursue social and charitable activities, and maintain ties with affiliates and coreligionists abroad. Religious belief is neither a handicap nor an advantage in terms of professional or political advancement. Many government leaders received their education in mission schools, and a number of senior ZANU officials are, in fact, clergymen. Elective courses in religious studies are part of the secondary school curriculum.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel at home and abroad is not generally subject to official restrictions, although travel restrictions have been occasionally applied against those whom it was believed might criticize the Government before foreign audiences. This practice does not appear to be widespread. A far more serious practical obstacle to foreign travel is currency control which severely limits the amount of foreign currency Zimbabwean nationals can take out of the country. Travel in the areas contested with RENAMO is not officially restricted but can be dangerous. The Government has instituted a "villagization" policy creating centralized villages in areas where RENAMO attacks occur. Immigration is not restricted, although persons who have left the country are not guaranteed the right to return if they were not born in Zimbabwe. Applicants must be able to demonstrate proof of livelihood. Repatriates from South Africa are always suspected of being in the employment of the South African intelligence community.

At the end of 1989, the registered refugee population was estimated at 80,000, of whom 79,500 were Mozambicans located in four rural camps along the eastern border. The remainder, mainly South Africans, were located in Harare and Bulawayo. An estimated 100,000 Mozambicans, many of them migrant farmers, are self-settled in rural areas in the east. Adult males of military age (18-35) among this population are being relocated into the official camps. The Government fears that RENAMO guerrillas infiltrate Zimbabwe in the guise of these Mozambican refugees and has declared its intention to repatriate most of them. While Zimbabwe has acceded to a number of international agreements permitting the free entry of refugees, in 1989 it sought to keep its border closed to new refugees, thus seriously constricting the right of first asylum. In 1989 expulsions of arriving refugees numbered some 3,000 who were the object of government suspicion as RENAMO sympathizers.

The Ministry of Labor, Manpower Planning, and Social Welfare is responsible for refugee affairs. Within the Ministry, a commissioner for refugees oversees the administration of the camps and coordinates international and other assistance activities. Using the Zimbabwe Refugee Act of 1983 as the legal basis for the determination of eligibility for refugee status, a Zimbabwe refugee committee interviews applicants for asylum. A negative decision can be appealed to the Minister, whose decision is final. This formal process applies to persons mainly in Harare rather than along the border. In 1989 Zimbabwe refused to grant refugee status to several ANC members who had quit the organization. Former ANC members were forced to seek refuge in other countries.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In 1989 Zimbabwe was officially a pluralist parliamentary democracy with a popularly elected House of Assembly, and citizens still had the right to change their government through democratic means. Elections held in the latter part of 1989 were contested by multiple candidates from ZANU, ZAPU, and ZUM as well as by some independents. However, there were widely reported irregularities in these elections. With the ZANU-ZAPU unity agreement and government efforts to limit the growth of the new ZUM party, Zimbabwe was becoming a de facto one-party state.

President Mugabe and his Cabinet are the preeminent political figures, and the ruling party, ZANU (fully unified with the former ZAPU opposition party), is the dominant political organization in the country. Following the amendment of the Constitution in 1987 to create a strong executive presidency, Robert Mugabe, who previously served as Prime Minister, became in 1988 both the Head of State and Head of Government. Elected in 1988 by an electoral college made up of the two houses of Parliament, in 1990 the executive President will be selected by popular election to a term of 6 years. The President appoints the Vice President and the rest of the Cabinet, who serve at his pleasure.

The Parliament contains two chambers: the House of Assembly and the Senate. Eighty of the 100 members of the House of Assembly are popularly elected from specific constituencies to 5-year terms. Twenty members are nominated by the ruling party and elected by the House of Assembly. Members of the upper house (the Senate) are appointed by the President. Since the unity agreement, which helped break down the traditional party rivalries, there has emerged a vigorous "back bench" in the House of Assembly which has confronted the Government on a number of issues.

In particular, the debate over Zimbabwe's political future sharpened in 1989 with the formation in April of the Zimbabwe Unity Movement (ZUM), led by former ZANU Secretary General Edgar Tekere. Tekere has criticized corruption and the size of government as well as the movement toward a one-party system. Tekere is from the east, which has been hit hard by the RENAMO incursions and military conflict, and he has also advocated military withdrawal from Mozambique.

President Mugabe and other senior ZANU officials have indicated a desire for a one-party state and have taken a series of steps to counter ZUM activities. Reliable sources accused the ruling party of blocking free and fair campaigning in a June by-election held near Harare to choose a replacement for senior Minister Nyagumbo, who committed suicide in the wake of the Willowvale car scandal. During the campaign, the authorities detained 15 ZUM leaders for 5 days, prohibited ZUM political rallies, and denied ZUM media coverage. The ZANU candidate won, but the ZUM candidate received 25 percent of the vote, indicating some popular support for a two-party system. Moreover, there were widespread irregularities including reports of ZANU payments to people who did not live in the constituency to vote for its candidate. In the November by-election, there were widespread irregularities as well in favor of ZANU candidates. Observers charged ZANU with stuffing ballot boxes to keep ZUM candidates from winning.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is highly sensitive to charges by international nongovernmental organizations of human rights abuses in Zimbabwe. The Government permits the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to maintain a regional office in Harare. It cooperates with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to assist Mozambican, South African, and other refugees but does not accord UNHCR regular, unrestricted access to Mozambican refugee camps. Admonitions to the security services about refugee protection have fallen on deaf ears in the border areas.

The Government often has been critical of nongovernmental groups. For example, the Minister of Home Affairs, in response to the October 1989 Africa Watch report on Zimbabwe, warned the organization "to avoid meddling in our internal affairs." In 1986 the Government declared Amnesty International an "enemy of the people" and threatened that anyone who supplied the organization with information would be detained. AI is still not permitted to operate in Zimbabwe.

Private Zimbabwean groups supporting efforts to increase public awareness of human rights operate in Zimbabwe. In particular, the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace (CCJP) investigates complaints from private persons about human rights abuses in Zimbabwe and conveys its findings to the Government. Other local groups include the Bulawayo-based Legal Projects Center and the Harare-based Legal Resources Foundation, which operate libraries and information centers and train lawyers in humanitarian law. The Legal Projects Center also provides a legal aid clinic which handles matters ranging from locating missing detainees to domestic disputes. These groups in the past have operated without government hindrance, but in 1989 the lawyers for the CCJP and the Legal Resources Center were detained briefly or harassed by false charges in cases relating to human rights (see Section 1.e.).

ZIMBABWESection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

Government services in Zimbabwe are provided on a nondiscriminatory basis, and the Government has been able to work with the previously "whites only" infrastructure in urban areas to provide health and other social services to all. In many rural areas, however, the neglect of the preindependence period still leaves the Government struggling to provide minimum care. Blacks on most commercial farms are still dependent mainly on white farmers to meet basic health care and educational needs.

In social terms, Zimbabwe remains a racially stratified country despite bans against official discrimination. While schools, churches, and clubs are all integrated, there is limited social interaction between racial groups. The "colored" (mixed race) community has complained of discrimination in the allocation of civil service jobs, but President Mugabe made two "colored" ministerial-level appointments and appointed a Zimbabwean of Chinese heritage as Minister of Education,

The status of women in Zimbabwe has advanced steadily even though traditional attitudes and practices persist, especially in rural areas. Since independence, the Government has enacted major laws aimed at enhancing women's rights and countering certain traditional practices, some of which are based on the view of women as dependents or minors. For example, the Legal Age of Majority Act and the Matrimonial Causes Act recognize the capacity of women to act independently of their husbands or fathers and to own property. Judges on the high courts have adjudicated cases upholding women's rights, including the right of women to inherit property. In 1981 the Ministry of Cooperative and Community Development and Women's Affairs was established to facilitate the involvement of women in national development.

Nevertheless, many women remain severely disadvantaged in Zimbabwean society. Ignorance of reforms, illiteracy, economic dependency, and prevailing social norms prevent rural women in particular from benefiting equally from these changes. Women are still vulnerable to customary practices that operate against their personal rights. Zimbabwean law prohibits "kuzvarira," the practice of pledging a young woman to marriage with a partner not of her choosing. However, unless the woman is well educated and outspoken, marriages based on "kuzvarira" still take place. The Matrimonial Causes Act has removed the customary obligation of a groom to pay "lobola" (a bride price) to the parents of his would-be wife, but the practice of "lobola" continues to be widespread. The Child Protection Society of Zimbabwe has challenged the customary practice of offering a young girl as compensatory payment in interfamily disputes, but it persists.

A considerable expansion of the nation's education system has resulted in an increase in the absolute number of girls being educated but has not altered the pattern of male domination of the higher levels of education. Though legislation prohibits discrimination in employment on the basis of gender, women are concentrated in the lower echelons of the work force.

Domestic violence against women, especially wife beating, is believed to be prevalent in Zimbabwe. A 1988 survey uncovered over 1,600 police investigations of domestic assault in the southern townships of Harare alone. The police often treat violence against women as a domestic rather than a criminal matter and are reluctant to intervene. Well-informed sources report that most victims of domestic violence, fearing the loss of economic support, withdraw charges or fail to report the incidents. Although the number of reported rape cases has increased substantially, laws dealing with assault and rape present substantive and procedural problems for women. A women's action group has urged police to improve their services by giving women a full explanation of court procedures and possible defense attorney tactics before they appear in court. The Government has assigned community relations liaison officers to police precincts to counsel victims of sexual assault. These officers held workshops on rape for their fellow officers to inform them about victims' rights. Respected government officials and medical practitioners report that female genital mutilation is not widespread in Zimbabwe.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Under the Labor Relations Act, workers enjoy freedom of association, have the right to elect their representatives, publish newsletters, and set programs and policies which reflect the political and economic interests of labor. The Act specifies that workers may constitute workers' committees in each plant and a trade union in each industrial sector and elect appropriate officers. The Act specifies further that workers' committees and trade unions must be registered with the Ministry of Labor, but it also seeks to protect workers' organizations from arbitrary government interference. The Government does not control or restrict labor, but it has powerful levers affecting labor, notably in the handling of strikes and setting wages.

Since independence, the Government has encouraged trade unions in the same industry to amalgamate. The process of amalgamation was completed in 1987. About 17 percent of the salaried work force is organized in 22 trade unions which are members of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), the umbrella confederation of the trade union movement. The ZCTU is the voice of organized labor, and its officers and members frequently speak or comment on social issues in public forums. ZCTU officers are elected by the delegates of affiliated trade unions at biennial conventions, most recently in July 1988. Neither the Government nor any political party nor any ethnic or tribal group has a preponderant influence in the trade union movement. Most trade unions suffer from meager budgets which prevent them from conducting a greater range of organizing and educational activities.

Workers have the right to strike providing that the union advises the Government 2 weeks in advance of its intention to do so. The right to strike is further limited by the right of the Government to declare a specific industry to be essential and therefore not subject to strike action. In practice, the Government has employed a broad interpretation of what essential industries are, and strikes in Zimbabwe have been few and largely unsuccessful. In June 1989, after long negotiations with the Government over the terms of their employment, medical interns went on strike, and the Government arrested more than 70 striking doctors. Responding to an appeal from President Mugabe, the interns returned to work and their pay was later increased. Another, more serious wildcat strike occurred in July when 2,000 railroad mechanics walked off their jobs. They were eventually joined by other railroad workers. The Government declared the strike illegal but did not attempt to arrest the workers. Instead, the Government persuaded strikers to return to work by promising them an additional wage increase. However, when another wildcat strike took place 10 days after this settlement, 60 railway workers were summarily dismissed. In September, 1,500 postal and telecommunications technicians, seeking higher wages than those granted by the Government, engaged in a week-long strike. The Government used its emergency powers to dismiss the workers but rehired them later once it was clear indigenous replacements were not available. In October, after issuing a press statement supporting the students' right to protest government actions, the ZCTU Secretary General was detained, held in solitary confinement for 42 days, and charged with attempting to incite the public to revolt against the Government. In November the Commonwealth Trade Union Council (CTUC) field representative was deported after he protested the ZCTU Secretary General's detention.

The ZCTU and its officials are active in the international labor movement and are affiliated with the Trade Union Coordinating Council and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. The ZCTU has friendly relations with the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and its affiliates (including the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations), as well as with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

Zimbabwe has been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since 1980 but has ratified neither ILO Convention 87 regarding freedom of association nor Convention 98 on bargaining collectively.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Under the Labor Relations Act, workers have the right to organize. Workers' committees are empowered to negotiate with the management of a particular plant the conditions of labor in the workplace. Wages are negotiated on an industrywide basis but are effectively limited by the Government's minimum wage system. In the case of a union-organized industry, the employers association meets directly with a particular trade union. In certain cases when there is no trade union representing a specific industry, representatives of the organized workers meet with the employers' association under the mediation of labor relations officers from the Ministry of Labor.

Perceiving that workers are at a disadvantage in negotiations with better financed and better educated managers, the Government believes it is responsible for assisting workers with legislation and intervention with employers. The Labor Relations Act provides considerable job security for workers. Under the Act, a worker may not be fired without the Labor Ministry's concurrence that the dismissal is justified. Labor relations officers are authorized to handle worker grievances within the plant. Their decisions may be appealed to the regional hearing officer of the Ministry of Labor, and finally to a special Labor Relations Tribunal, over which the Chief Justice presides.

ZIMBABWE

In April 1989, Labor Minister Nkomo recommended that all labor laws be consolidated. He also announced the intention to open up the labor market to permit greater freedom for labor and management to negotiate wage increases. In past years, the Government would announce minimum wage increases prior to the start of the collective bargaining season that became, in effect--given the Government's refusal to ratify settlements which exceeded the minimum wage--the target for wage agreements. Though the Government has not completely withdrawn from setting wage increase standards, it now sets parameters for wage negotiations, and all collective bargaining agreements must be ratified by the Labor Ministry.

The Government does not promote or support antiunion discrimination. There are no export processing zones in Zimbabwe.

c. Prohibitions of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Compulsory labor is prohibited by law in Zimbabwe and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Under Zimbabwean labor regulations, the minimum age for the formal wage sector is 18, but it is possible to begin an apprenticeship at 16. In this sector, minimum age regulations are generally enforced. However, the Government does not attempt to enforce these regulations for children employed in household enterprises, e.g., family farms.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Conditions of labor are regulated by the Government according to industry. The Government publishes labor regulations for each of the 22 industrial sectors, based on previously negotiated collective bargaining agreements. These regulations specify wages, hours, holiday schemes, and required safety measures. The average workweek is 44 hours, and the law prescribes a minimum of one 24-hour rest period per week. The minimum wage for the agro-industrial sector is $96 a month. The employer also usually provides housing, food, and medical care to workers. On commercial farms, the employer may provide schooling for the workers' children. Citing the results of a 1981 government-sponsored wage and price survey, the ZCTU pointed out that current mandated minimum wages are between 50-75 percent below the adjusted poverty level determined by the survey. In many instances, workers must also rely on second jobs, extended family help, or some subsistence farming to meet a minimum standard of living.

Labor relations officers from the Ministry of Labor are assigned to monitor developments in each plant to ensure that government minimum wage policy and occupational and safety regulations are being observed.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

Antigua and Barbuda is a small two-island state with a parliamentary democracy modeled after that of the United Kingdom. It is governed by a prime minister, a cabinet, and a bicameral legislative assembly. The Governor General, with largely ceremonial duties, is the titular Head of State and serves as representative of the British monarch. The Constitution requires general elections at least every 5 years. Prime Minister V. C. Bird and his Antigua Labour Party (ALP) once again won a convincing victory in the March 1989 general elections, capturing 15 of the 17 seats in the House of Representatives. One seat went to United National Democratic Party (UNDP) candidate Baldwin Spencer, who was named leader of the opposition in Parliament. The other nongovernment seat represented the Barbuda constituency and was won by Hilbourne Frank, a political independent who leads the Barbuda faction advocating secession from the union with Antigua. The Governor General appoints the 17-member Senate with the advice of the Prime Minister and opposition leader.

Security forces consist of a police force and the Antigua and Barbuda Defense Force, a 120-man infantry unit. The police are organized, trained, and supervised according to British law enforcement practices. The security forces have a good reputation for respecting individual rights in the performance of their duties.

Antigua and Barbuda has a mixed economy, with a strong private sector. Tourism is the major industry. In 1989 the economy registered a 6.8 percent increase in gross domestic product, the fifth straight year of high growth. However, a large and growing external debt continued to concern the Government.

The Constitution provides for observance of political and civil rights, which are generally respected in practice, with the exception that opposition political parties have little or no access to the government-dominated electronic media. Antigua and Barbuda's generally good human rights record remained largely unchanged in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances or politically motivated abductions.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture and other cruel or inhuman treatment of prisoners or detainees, and these prohibitions are respected in practice.

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and detention, which do not occur in practice. Criminal defendants are guaranteed the right of judicial determination of the legality of their detention. Detainees must be brought before a court within 48 hours of arrest or detention. There were no reports of involuntary exile.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is modeled on that of the United Kingdom and is part of the Eastern Caribbean legal system. Final appeal may be made to the Queen's Privy Council in the United Kingdom and is invariably made in the case of death sentences. There are no military or political courts. Criminal defendants are assured a fair, open, and public trial. In capital cases the Government provides legal assistance at public expense to persons without means to retain a private attorney. There are no political prisoners in Antigua and Barbuda.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no reports of arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence in 1989. The police must obtain a warrant before searching private premises.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech, the press, and other forms of communication; these provisions are generally respected. However, the Government dominates the electronic media, the only daily source of news. The Government owns one of the two radio stations and the single television station, and the Prime Minister's family owns the second radio station. Opposition politicians have not been able to obtain adequate air time to present their positions. ABS radio and television report regularly on the Government's activities but rarely on those of the opposition political parties.

In September, for example, members of the opposition UNDP wanted to join a live broadcast on ABS radio in which participants were discussing disaster relief efforts in Antigua following Hurricane Hugo. They were told that, although they could not be part of the live transmission, ABS would prerecord an interview with them on the subject for later broadcast. When the half-hour tape later was broadcast, it was taken off the air before the opposition spokesman completed his answer to the first of a series of questions asked by the interviewer.

The opposition UNDP has also charged that, prior to the call for general elections this year, they unsuccessfully attempted to purchase time from the electronic media. Once elections were called, use of radio and television for political campaigning was prohibited by law under the People Act of 1975 (which was enacted when the currently ruling party was out of office). The Act provides that: "Pending an election, it shall not be lawful for any television or wireless transmitting station to broadcast any item for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any candidate or of any political party," but exempts bona fide scheduled news broadcasts which give fair and equitable coverage of all election meetings, as well as any announcement, not exceeding 2 minutes, concerning the time, date, and venue of a political meeting.

Weekly newspapers representing the opposition publish a variety of opinions. They are free to criticize the Government and do so regularly. Religious organizations also publish their own newspapers.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right of peaceful assembly. Public meetings and organized demonstrations are held without police interference. Required permits for public meetings are issued by the police, and they normally grant them. Permits for political rallies were routinely granted upon request during the period leading up to the general elections in 1989.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is unrestricted exercise of religious freedom. The population is overwhelmingly Protestant, but adherents of other religious denominations practice and proselytize openly without government interference. All groups are free to maintain links with coreligionists in other countries.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Neither law nor practice restricts the right of citizens of Antigua and Barbuda to move about within the country, to travel abroad, or to emigrate.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Antigua and Barbuda has a multiparty political system accommodating a wide spectrum of political viewpoints. All citizens 18 years of age and older may register and vote by secret ballot. The Constitution requires general elections at least every 5 years. The Government is obligated by law to hold voter registration during a fixed period each year, and parties conduct their own registration drives free from government interference. General elections were held in Antigua and Barbuda on March 9. The incumbent ALP led by Prime Minister Vere Cornwall Bird, Sr., easily won reelection, taking 15 of the 17 parliamentary constituencies, a net loss of one seat from the 1984 elections. The ALP has been in power since 1951, except for a period in opposition from 1971 to 1976. The opposition charged that the ALP's longstanding monopoly on patronage and its influence over the economic life of the country made it extremely difficult for opposition parties to attract membership and financial support.

Following the general elections, the opposition charged that serious polling irregularities had occurred on election day in seven of the constituencies and that election results in those districts were invalid. Absence of ballots or insufficient numbers of ballots prevented polling stations in these districts from adhering to the prescribed voting period of 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. on March 9. The matter was taken to the elections court for rulings on a district-by-district basis. When the justice declared the election invalid in the initial case to be heard, the ALP asked incumbents of the six remaining seats to resign and planned to hold by-elections in all seven constituencies in August. The opposition parties, however, failed to renominate candidates to stand for election. As a result, a by-election was unnecessary, and the seven ALP candidates were declared automatic victors. They were sworn back into office on August 8.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Internationally recognized human rights organizations have not expressed concern about Antigua and Barbuda. There were no requests for human rights investigations or inquiries during 1989.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Law and practice prohibit discrimination based on race, sex, creed, language, or social status. The role of women in society is not restricted by law, but tradition tends to limit women to home and family, particularly in rural areas. However, these traditional roles are changing. The Government has begun programs to provide enhanced educational opportunities for both sexes as well as family planning services. Under the energetic prodding of the Government's Directorate of Women's Affairs, which was upgraded in 1989, women are moving up in government and the professions, but progress is slower in the private sector. The Women's Desk began almost 10 years ago with one director and a secretary and now employs, in addition to the executive director, three professionals and clerical and support staff. In 1989 the Directorate continued educational programs for women in such areas as health, crafts, and improving business skills. It also produced a magazine on women in Antigua and carried out research into laws affecting women.

Most violence against women in Antigua probably goes unreported. Gauging the extent of the problem is difficult, due to the lack of accurate data, and is compounded by the reluctance of women in many cases to testify against their abusers. Police may be reluctant to interfere in cases of domestic violence, and some women charge that the courts do not take the problem seriously enough and that sentences are too lenient. The Directorate of Women's Affairs has scheduled an educational campaign through the media to increase awareness of the problem, and has also planned a workshop on women and abuse, including child abuse, for 1990.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely and to form labor unions. Although fewer than 50 percent of Antigua and Barbuda's workers belong to unions, the important hotel industry is heavily unionized. Unions are free to affiliate with international labor organizations and do so in practice.

Antigua and Barbuda has two major trade unions: the Antigua Trade and Labour Union (ATLU) and the Antigua Workers' Union (AWU). The ATLU is associated with the ruling ALP, while the AWU is allied with the opposition UNDP. During 1989 the ATLU did not hesitate to criticize government policies and practices with which it disagreed.

The right to strike is recognized by the labor code. This right can be limited in a given dispute by the Court of Industrial Relations. Once either party to the dispute requests the Court to mediate, there can be no strike. Because of the delays associated with this process, in practice labor disputes are often resolved before a strike is called. There were no strikes in 1989.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization's Committee of Experts cited legislation which allows either party or the Minister of Labour effectively to restrict the right to strike, and asked the Government to reexamine its legislation and take measures to ensure that provisions for the settlement of disputes through conciliation do not restrict the right to strike.

b. The Right To Organize and Bargain Collectively

Labor organizations are free to organize and bargain collectively. There have been no allegations of antiunion discrimination, which is prohibited by law. There are no areas of the country, such as export processing or free trade zones, where union organization or collective bargaining is discouraged or impeded.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution forbids slavery and forced labor, which do not exist in practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The law provides a minimum working age of 13, which is respected in practice. Responsibility for enforcement rests with the Ministry of Labour, which by law conducts periodic inspections of workplaces.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The law permits a maximum 48-hour, 6-day workweek, but in practice the workweek is 40 hours in 5 days. Workers are guaranteed a minimum of 3 weeks' annual leave and up to 13 weeks of maternity leave. There are no occupational health and safety laws or regulations. Different minimum wages for different work categories were established by law in 1981. Some representative minimum hourly wages at the present are: household domestics $0.50, unskilled laborers $0.61, construction workers $0.93, and skilled workers $1.30. Most such minimum wages would not provide a decent standard of living for workers and their families, but the great majority of workers earn substantially more than the minimum wage. A committee completed its review of these minimum wages and submitted a report to the Ministry of Labour for action. The report recommended increases in the minimum wage levels for various categories of workers.

ARGENTINA

Argentina is a federal, constitutional democracy with a president elected through an electoral college for a single 6-year term, a bicameral legislature, and an independent judiciary. Traditionally, the executive is the dominant branch in the Argentine Government. Since the end of military rule in 1983, there have been four national elections. In the most recent, on May 14, 1989, the voters elected Justicialist Party candidates Carlos Menem and Eduardo Duhalde as the nation's President and Vice President. A rapidly deteriorating economic situation and an evident lack of public confidence due to the prolonged period before the scheduled December inauguration caused former President Raul Alfonsin to negotiate an early turnover of the reins of government to Carlos Menem. The inauguration of Menem on July 8 marked the first constitutional turnover of the presidency from one democratically elected President to another from an opposing party since 1916. Candidates in the May elections represented the political spectrum from conservative to far left.

The President is constitutional Commander-in-Chief, while a civilian Defense Minister oversees the armed forces. The federal police report to the Interior Minister; provincial police are organized under provincial constitutions and report to locally elected provincial governors.

Argentina is beset by inflation, which averaged well over 100 percent annually during 1986-88 and which escalated to hyperinflation during 1989, with the consumer price index increasing by 4,923 percent for the year. Argentina has significant arrears on an external debt of more than $60 billion and requires fresh infusions of external capital. The state-owned enterprises are generally unprofitable, foreign investment is weak, and capital flight is a problem. The Menem administration moved quickly to introduce such measures as privatization, economic emergency legislation, and a tax reform bill, which attempt to confront the problems of deficit financing and lack of investor confidence. These and other steps resulted in a rapid drop in the level of inflation beginning in August 1989, but the trend reversed itself in November and December as financial markets lost confidence in the Government's ability to control deficit spending.

Human rights concerns in 1989 focused more on accounting for abuses during military rule (1976-83) than on the policies of the civilian Government. The courts continued the painful task of deciding custody of the children of people who disappeared during the military Government's rule. In October President Menem pardoned military officials accused of human rights violations or mutiny against the army high command, an action widely criticized by human rights and political organizations. An attack in January by members of the "All for the Fatherland Movement" (MTP) against the La Tablada military compound resulted in an estimated 38 deaths and 80 injuries. Twenty MTP members implicated in the attack were tried and sentenced to prison by a civilian court; a separate civilian court commenced criminal investigations into charges that some attackers were killed or disappeared after they had surrendered. In late May a series of attacks against food stores and other businesses took place in several Argentine cities. Police efforts to contain these riots resulted in 14 deaths, 80 injuries, and hundreds temporarily detained. The Government declared a 30-day state of siege, with curfew and other restrictions applied in those areas where rioting had occurred. Legal challenges to this state of siege were heard by the courts but eventually rejected. In general, the Government continued its efforts to protect human rights, but the use of excessive force by the police remained a concern.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no credible reports of politically motivated killings carried out by the Government in 1989. However, survivors of the January attack against the La Tablada military compound charged that several of those who carried out this attack were killed by police and military forces after they had surrendered. A civilian judge was assigned to investigate these charges, and this investigation was still under way at year's end. Human rights organizations, political groups, and the press criticized police for several deaths which appeared to involve excessive use of force in dealing with criminal suspects. Critics charged that police routinely shoot to kill. Courts investigating instances in which police officers were charged with specific unjustifiable killings ordered the arrest and sentencing to prison of several police officials, reportedly for terms of from 6 to 9 years. Sources could not confirm whether any police officers are actually serving time for such killings, as the judicial process is slow and complicated.

Politically motivated bombings continued but on a markedly reduced scale from last year. Most were small explosions late at night, causing little damage and few injuries. Targets through the year included national political parties; military, church, press, and judicial officials; trade union leaders; political figures of both the extreme right and left; and public buildings. The perpetrators never claimed responsibility for these bombings, and police have yet to make any arrests in these cases.

There were no known abductions, secret arrests, or disappearances linked to or condoned by the Government during 1989. A civilian judge is investigating charges by the survivors of the La Tablada attack that three or four of the attackers disappeared or turned up dead after surrendering to the police.

The independent judicial system continued the painful process of determining custody of children whose parents disappeared during military rule (1976-1983). In a related development, the Government of Paraguay returned to Argentina children tentatively identified as offspring of Argentines who disappeared during military rule. These cases remain under court investigations. In one instance a medical examination failed to confirm the paternity of two children.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture, and the criminal code provides penalties for torture which are similar to those for homicide. Argentina has ratified the U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. However, human rights groups and critics accuse police of mistreatment of prisoners. They charged the police with misuse of force and at least 18 instances of torture linked to efforts by the security forces to control the looting which took place in late May. According to a publication of the Permanent Assembly for Human Rights (APHD), charges were made before the courts in September in these 18 cases. Other complaints of mistreatment of minors were either dropped by the courts or lost in the legal system. In one case a court sentenced three police officers to what reportedly were 3-year prison terms after finding them guilty in a 1986 torture case. Investigations of claims of mistreatment are handled by the Undersecretariat of Interior for Human Rights and through judicial review. Several formal claims of mistreatment were filed in 1988 before the Interior Ministry. Human rights officials believe these are included among the cases considered by the courts during 1989.

ARGENTINA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Argentina has a well-developed legal code containing explicit protections of individual rights and controls on police arrest and investigatory powers. Arrests require probable cause or a judicial order, and the law provides for a judicial determination of the legality of detention. However, the penal code gives the courts authority to detain persons without notice or charges for up to 8 days during investigations. Even in the case of minor offenses, holding suspects without charges for several days is not uncommon. Involuntary exile is not permitted or practiced.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Argentina's judicial system is widely recognized as fair and independent, albeit slow and cumbersome. The Constitution and penal code provide for trials before judges and appellate review of all judicial rulings, including those of military courts. Federal courts interpret constitutional protection against "arbitrary" trial process to permit wide-ranging review of criminal prosecutions. As in most civil law countries, trial by jury does not exist; judges render verdicts.

The police have legal authority to adjudicate misdemeanors, which are often settled by senior police officials. The legal system provides public defenders, but 1989 caseloads exceeded their capacity. The right to bail is provided by law and observed in practice.

The pardon granted by President Menem provided for the release of those few persons considered by human rights groups to be political prisoners. Some human rights activists are beginning to focus on some of the La Tablada defendants as political prisoners. The Government rejects this contention, however, on the basis that none of these persons fall within the accepted definition of political prisoners.

The human rights community continued to criticize the Supreme Court's broad interpretation of the "Due Obedience" Law as it had earlier criticized passage of the law itself. Court proceedings against several military officers not covered by President Menem's pardons, the "Due Obedience" doctrine, or the "Punto Final" (Final Point) continue in the federal appellate courts.

Retired General Orlando Agosti, who had served 3 years and 9 months of a sentence for human rights violations committed during the period of military rule, was released in May.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is constitutional protection against unreasonable search and seizure. No cases of arbitrary intrusion by the State into the private lives of persons were reported in 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Under both the Alfonsin and the new Menem administration, Argentina continued to enjoy a free and relatively independent press, which covers a wide range of political viewpoints. Criticism of the Government and opposition viewpoints are vigorously expressed. The State owns 55 of 170 AM radio stations outright and other governmental entities own 11 more, while the Federal Broadcast Authority licenses and thus controls the franchises of the remainder. The Federal Government owns one of the four nationally syndicated Buenos Aires television stations (two others were privatized in December 1989), and two radio stations.

The Government plans to continue operating the official news agency, TELAM, which has more than 300 clients throughout the country and serves as the exclusive agent for all government advertising. With more than 40-percent of the Argentine economy in the hands of the State, TELAM wields formidable political influence to authorize or refuse government advertising to media outlets.

At both of its general assemblies in 1989, the Association of Newspaper Editors of Argentina (ADEPA) declared that freedom of the press did exist in Argentina, with only few exceptions. The group issued a detailed report of the various legislative and judicial acts which have impaired freedom of the press in recent years. For example, ADEPA denounced the house arrest of journalist Raul L. D'Altri, editor of the newspaper La Arena, for having refused to reveal a source of information, and deplored several provincial laws that imposed financial burdens on the press. ADEPA also reported other cases of judicial proceedings impairing freedom of the press, including the prohibition of an advertisement on behalf of former President Videla. The publicity generated by these cases indicates that the few exceptions to the prevailing freedom of the press received wide public attention.

Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All groups and political parties are free to organize and assemble. The law requires political parties to support the Constitution and a democratic, representative, republican, and federal form of government in order to register for elections. At present, no party is denied registration. During the campaigns leading to the presidential elections in May, all major political parties held mass rallies without interference. The labor movement, human rights organizations, ethnic communities, and other groupings held frequent demonstrations and rallies without interference or incident.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for the free exercise of religion, but also establishes Roman Catholicism as the state religion. The Government provides financial support to the Roman Catholic Church, and the Constitution requires the President and Vice President to be Roman Catholics. Other religions must complete a pro forma registration with the Government to obtain legal recognition. Missionaries from any religion are permitted to enter Argentina and proselytize, and the non-Catholic population is growing. Argentina's Jewish community (at an estimated 300,000, the largest in Latin America) practices its religion without official interference or legal restriction. In June the Government introduced legislation which would make those found guilty of mocking or ridiculing religious ceremonies subject to prison sentences.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

International and internal travel as well as emigration are unrestricted. Refugees are not forced to return to countries from which they have fled.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Since September 1983, Argentina has held four national elections to choose federal, provincial and local officials. The elections were free, fair, and democratic, with universal suffrage. The Justicialist (Peronist) Party currently controls the executive and legislative branches of government. Political parties ranging from left to right are represented in Congress as a result of the 1987 and 1989 elections. Additional parties hold office in individual provinces. From the powerful Radicals to miniscule provincial movements, Argentina's opposition parties operate without hindrance. Women and minorities have full political rights by law.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government cooperates fully with international human rights organizations, which enjoy unrestricted access in Argentina. Eleven domestic human rights organizations operated openly in 1989, despite occasional and anonymous bombings, death threats, and harassment. Since 1983 the domestic human rights community has strongly and continuously opposed all efforts to limit military accountability for abuses committed during military rule. Despite these forceful protests, a pardon was issued in October by President Menem absolving most military personnel from prosecution for human rights violations committed during the "Dirty War."

Argentina plays an active role in both the United Nations Human Rights Commission (UNHRC), where it chairs an important subcommittee of experts, and the Organization of American States' Inter-American Human Rights Commission. The Government has facilitated efforts by domestic human rights organizations to address both of these international bodies in opposition to the government's judicial policies towards the military, and has cooperated with UNHRC efforts to investigate cases involving missing children from the 1976-83 period of military rule. Argentina has ratified the American Convention on Human Rights (1984) and the U.N. Conventions on Torture, Civil and Political Rights, and Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (all in 1986) and accepted compulsory jurisdiction by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

ARGENTINA

Congress passed a law in 1988 that authorizes criminal penalties for discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religion, and other categories. Although there is no official policy of discrimination against them, Argentine women have to contend with bias rooted in the sociocultural traditions of the country. Argentina adheres to the U.N. Convention for the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women.

According to the Foreign Ministry's Undersecretary for Human Rights and Women, violence against women is not considered to be a major problem in Argentina. Such abuse, including domestic violence such as wife beating, exists, but because of inadequate statistical data, the true extent of the problem is difficult to determine. Because victims are frequently reluctant to file reports or to press charges, the likelihood is that cases are significantly underreported. There is an apparent increase in the number of cases being brought before the courts because there are now three police stations established to handle reports of violence against women. This increase may also be due to greater public awareness of this problem caused by extensive publicity given specific cases. Enhanced media interest in the issue is credited with bringing about a greater awareness of this type of violence, giving the appearance that it is on the rise. Neither society nor the Government condone violence against women.

There is a history of anti-Semitism in Argentine society, which produces occasional anti-Semitic incidents. In the course of 1989, the Delegation of Argentine Jewish Associations (DAIA), Argentina's umbrella Jewish organization, condemned anonymous threats and anti-Semitic public statements by public figures (none of them government officials). For example, an instructor at the La Plata Police School was dismissed for distributing anti-Semitic papers to students. Senior government and political officials have condemned such acts. There has also been an unofficial but systematic exclusion of Jewish Argentines from certain institutions such as the armed forces.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

There is free right of labor association in Argentina. The labor movement, which includes about one-third of the national work force, is a major independent economic and political force. Although trade unions are independent of the Government, the vast majority of union leaders are allied to the ruling Justicialist Party and are active in the Peronist movement, while retaining their freedom of decisionmaking outside of party control. Congress passed legislation in 1987 and 1988 which reinstituted laws governing labor relations and other trade union rights which previous military governments had suspended. The right of association was enhanced by these laws. Trade unions are free to associate with international organizations, and many Argentine unions are affiliated with, and active in, international trade union groups.

In 1989 the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations expressed satisfaction with the legislation passed in 1987 and 1988, but questioned whether the membership requirements for legalizing alternative trade unions were too stringent.

Unions have the right to strike, subject to compulsory conciliation and arbitration by the Labor Ministry. Workers have the right to receive their salaries while on strike until the Labor Ministry orders compulsory conciliation. Strikes by teachers, state-owned enterprise employees, and civil servants dominated the strike scene in 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

By law, labor and management have a binding collective bargaining process which sets wage levels on an industrywide basis. The State's involvement in this process is limited to ratifying the agreements, which provides them with legal status. The Government continues to offer wage guidelines under its economic emergency adjustment program, and directly sets wages in state-owned enterprises. Antiunion discrimination is prohibited by law and well-developed mechanisms are in place and functioning to resolve complaints. Some provinces provide rights and obligations additional to those in federal legislation.

There are no officially designated export processing zones in Argentina.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is illegal in Argentina and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The law prohibits the employment of children under 14 years of age, except in the family. Minors of ages 14 and 15 may work in restricted types of employment, but not more than 6 hours a day or 35 hours a week. The same law applies to minors 16 to 18 years of age, although competent authority may allow exceptions. Violations are tried before the appropriate courts. Enforcement of child labor laws is hampered by the severe economic crisis in Argentina, which forces many families to have as many members as possible working in order to survive. Laws are enforced to the extent possible by the authorities, but it has proven almost impossible to control this type of illegal labor activity under circumstances where economic necessity forces children to seek work.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Argentina offers comprehensive protection of workers' rights. The maximum workday is 8 hours; the workweek is 48 hours. Premiums must be paid for work beyond those limits. Rules governing vacations, minimum wages, and occupational health and safety are comparable to those in Western industrial nations and are enforced by the Government and labor unions in the formal economy. Argentina, however, has a large underground economy which employs an undetermined number of people, including children. This sector is difficult to police, and workers can be denied basic rights and benefits because they fear losing their jobs if they report labor code violations. Government and labor unions find it difficult to police small employers on the fringes of this underground economy.

The official minimum wage in Argentina, eroded by hyperinflation in 1989, is currently set at about $15 per month. Government and trade union officials agree this is not sufficient to provide a decent standard of living for a worker and his family, but they differ on how soon it should be changed. It was subject to monthly revision during the first 6 months of 1989, but remained steady since July as the Government attempted to bring inflation under control. Government officials argue that few workers are paid at the minimum wage level and that wages have improved under the collective bargaining process, without the necessity of boosting the minimum wage level. Union leaders accept the need for restraint on wages but argue for an increase in the minimum wage, to provide protection, and a wage floor to lower paid workers. Special salary bonuses were provided to all workers in December.

THE BAHAMAS

The Bahamas is a constitutional, multiparty democracy. A member of the Commonwealth of Nations, its political and legal traditions are similar to those of the United Kingdom. The Queen is recognized as Head of State and represented by an appointed Governor General. The Progressive Liberal Party (PLP) has governed since 1967 under the same leader, Prime Minister Sir Lynden O. Pindling. The last general elections were in June 1987.

The police and small defense force generally respect the human rights provisions of the Constitution and other statutes. There have, however, been allegations of mistreatment of some prisoners by the police. The Bahamas has a well-established judicial system based on British common law and procedures.

Tourism is the mainstay of the economy, accounting for approximately 60 per cent of the gross national product; finance and off-shore banking is the second most important sector. Government efforts to diversify the economy have met with little success.

The Constitution provides for the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms without discrimination by reason of sex, race, religion, national origin, or political opinion, and its provisions are generally observed. The Bahamas' human rights record remained generally good in 1989, but police abuse of detainees and unsafe and unhealthy prison conditions were cause for concern.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or other extrajudicial killing.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated abductions or disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits the use of torture and other forms of cruel or degrading treatment or punishment. However, both Americans and Bahamians detained by police continue to report instances of police brutality during the course of arrests and interrogations. In an incident currently under investigation, the Bahamian Defence Force boarded a U.S.-registered power boat to search for drugs, failed to produce identification, and allegedly physically assaulted the captain and crew.

Prisoners at The Bahamas' one prison facility, Foxhill, located just outside of Nassau on New Providence Island, have reported and independent observers have confirmed, that conditions are unhealthful and harsh. A local newspaper article described the "initiation" rite of homosexual rape performed on some new prisoners--a practice of particular concern given the relatively high incidence of AIDS in the population. Even prison officials acknowledge that overcrowding is a problem. Four to five prisoners are usually housed in 6-foot by 8-foot cells for 23 1/2 hours daily 5 days a week and are not permitted to leave their cells at all the other 2 days. Sanitation facilities are, at best, poor, with most cells equipped only with a slop bucket or trench-type urinals that provide breeding grounds for insects.

In the women's section, female prisoners are housed in dormitories containing 20 to 24 bunk beds. They are given considerably more time outside of the cells than are male prisoners and are not generally subjected to sexual assault. However, frequent floods caused by heavy rains sometimes leave about 2 inches of standing water in the dormitories. As pipes back up, human waste mixes with the water, and tarantulas and centipedes seek refuge in the beds. Some prisoners have alleged occasional deliberate neglect of ill prisoners by guards.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and detention. The right to a judicial determination of the legality of detention is respected; charges are normally brought within 48 hours of arrest, and those arrested are usually allowed access to an attorney of their own choosing.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

An independent judiciary, appointed by the executive branch on the advice of a Judicial and Legal Service Commission, conducts fair and public trials. The Constitution entitles defendants to counsel, and access to defendants is freely permitted. There have been instances, however, when persons accused of a crime have spent periods of as much as 18 months in maximum security facilities awaiting trial. Legal representation at public expense is provided only for capital cases. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not interfere in the private lives of its citizens. The Constitution prohibits arbitrary entry, search, or seizure, and the law requires warrants to be issued before privately owned property can be entered and searched. The Government neither censors mail nor restricts receipts of foreign correspondence or publications.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is restrained primarily by strict libel laws and the government monopoly of radio and television. The Bahamas operates under a libel law unchanged since the 19th century. While journalists generally find the law somewhat rigid, its supporters claim that it results in a more dignified and courteous treatment by the press than would be the case without it. While the two privately owned daily and one weekly newspapers freely criticize government policies, they also refrain from scrutinizing certain issues for fear of libel suits; the morning daily lost at least two major suits in 1989. The result is a form of self-censorship which attenuates public debate on controversial issues.

Radio and television broadcasting is a government monopoly under present legislation. The government-controlled Broadcasting Corporation of the Bahamas (BCB) operates radio services in Nassau and Freeport and a nationwide TV service from Nassau. A private U.S.-based cable TV system presently exists in Freeport, although there are reports that the Government is pressuring the owners to sell at below free market price. In September opposition politicians once again introduced legislation which, if adopted, would permit the licensing of privately owned radio stations. They argue that the government-run BCB cannot objectively comment on government policies, and that this is particularly important in the case of radio, the major source of news for Bahamians. For example, current legislation allows the government party to purchase four 15-minute broadcasts each year and the opposition to buy one 15-minute broadcast annually if it constitutes less than a third of Parliament. Two opposition broadcasts are possible if they hold more than a third of parliamentary seats. Generally, however, the views of the Government receive a thorough airing on radio and television programs while those of the opposition and the Government's other critics are given little notice. The opposition's proposal was referred to committee after a parliamentary debate in which even some government party members expressed support for amending the present law. Foreign books and publications freely enter the country and academic freedom appears to be respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the rights of free assembly and association, and these rights are observed in practice.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is full freedom of religion, and discrimination based on creed is prohibited. There is no favored or official state religion, but most church members belong to Protestant denominations.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens are free to travel domestically and abroad, and there are no restrictions on the right to change residence or workplace. Large groups of Haitians continued to enter Bahamian waters, and the Bahamian Defense Force and the U.S. Coast Guard have cooperated in repatriating them. From April 1988 to July 1989, 20 Cuban refugees landed while attempting to flee Cuba for Florida. Although The Bahamas is signatory to the U.N. Protocol of 1968 relating to refugees, the Cubans were treated as illegal immigrants and jailed for varying periods. They were eventually released to await third-country resettlement.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Bahamas is a constitutional democracy with a multiparty political system. The political process is open to all members of society, with citizens aged 18 and over eligible to register and vote. There are two principal parties: the governing Progressive Liberal Party (PLP) and the opposition Free National Movement (FNM). The PLP led the country for 5 years of internal self-government before independence in 1973 and has held power without interruption since.

General elections held in June 1987 returned the PLP to power with a clear parliamentary majority. The FNM, however, claiming extensive electoral violations, challenged the results in the electoral court. The PLP responded by challenging seats won by the FNM. The electoral court settled nearly all of these challenges in September; the composition of Parliament, in which the PLP holds 31 seats, the FNM 16, and independents 2, remained unchanged.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No international human rights organizations visited the Bahamas during 1989. There are two local human rights groups, the Grand Bahamas Human Rights Organization and the New Providence Human Rights Organization. During 1989 the latter took a strong stand against a proposed National Service Bill which would have restricted the constitutional rights of those in National Service; the bill never came to a vote in Parliament. The Government made no effort to restrict the activities of either of these organizations or any international organization investigating human rights issues.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The law prohibits discrimination on grounds of sex, race, or religion, and The Bahamas has a generally good record in this regard. Women participate prominently at all levels of government and are well represented in the judiciary as well as in professional and business sectors. There does not appear to be a significant wage gap. The Constitution does, however, make several distinctions between the sexes regarding citizenship by, for example, preventing female Bahamians from bestowing citizenship upon their spouses.

Abuse of women, particularly spousal abuse, is a problem in The Bahamas. However, it is unusual for a spouse to be charged and convicted of a crime stemming from domestic violence. In late 1989 the House of Assembly considered legislative changes to strengthen the provisions against spousal and child abuse. The bill was with the House of Assembly Committee of the Whole but was expected to be passed before the end of the session.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitutional provision for the right of free assembly and association specifically mentions labor unions, and unions operate freely without restriction. They are independent of government control, have the right to strike, choose their own delegations to the International Labor Organization (ILO), and maintain affiliations with international and regional labor organizations. Although construction workers at a hotel project conducted a three-week "withdrawal of services", no official strikes were registered in 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers are free to organize, and unions engage in collective bargaining without government interference or restriction in any sector. Collective bargaining is extensive for the 30 percent of the work force which is organized. The Department of Labor attempts to mediate disputes, and the law provides for arbitration tribunals to help resolve stalled contract negotiations. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act of 1970 which prohibit discrimination by employers against union members and organizers, unionization of retail store and restaurant employees has been discouraged over the years by employer pressure and arbitrary dismissal practices. Allegations of antiunion discrimination are ultimately decided by the Supreme Court. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution specifically prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and it is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no legal minimum age for the employment of children. Although the law does not specifically address child labor, the requirement of compulsory education until age 14 effectively discourages child employment.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, employers cannot permit their employees to work more than 48 hours a week. This provision is effectively enforced. Maternity leave is provided by law for female workers, who are guaranteed their right to reemployment following childbirth. The Labor Department conducts periodic inspections of workplaces to ensure lighting, safety, and ventilation standards are met. There is no minimum wage law in the Bahamas; however, wage levels in this primarily service-oriented, tourist-based economy are considered to provide a decent standard of living for workers.

BARBADOS

Barbados is a member of the Commonwealth of Nations and a constitutional democracy with a multiparty, parliamentary form of government on the Westminster model. Its House of Assembly is the third oldest elected body in the Western Hemisphere. Barbadians recognize the Queen of England as Head of State; she is represented by an appointed Governor General. The Prime Minister is the head of government and governs with an appointed Cabinet.

The Royal Barbados Police Force is charged with maintaining public order; it respects constitutional and legal guarantees of human rights. Police morale is good, and public respect for the police force is high. The small volunteer Barbados Defence Force is responsible for national security, but is used for public order in times of crisis, emergency, or other specific need.

The country's economy, based on tourism, light manufacturing, services, and sugar, is highly susceptible to external economic developments. Nevertheless, the economy has registered positive growth for the past several years, led by the tourism and construction sectors.

Barbados has a long record of respecting human rights. There was no change in that record during 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution specifically prohibits torture, and there were no reports in 1989 of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and requires detainees to be brought before a court of law within 72 hours of arrest. These provisions are respected in practice. Criminal defendants have the right to counsel, and attorneys have ready access to their clients. Exile is not used as a punishment or means of political control.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides that persons charged with criminal offenses be given a fair, public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial court. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty. The Government provides free legal aid to the indigent. The judiciary acts independently and is free of intervention from other branches of government. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not interfere arbitrarily in the private lives of its citizens. The Constitution prohibits arbitrary entry, search, or seizure, and the law requires warrants to be issued before privately owned property may be entered and searched. The Government neither censors mail nor restricts the receipt of foreign correspondence or publications.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, and these rights are respected in practice. There are five radio stations, two of which are government owned. CBC television service (the sole television station) is government owned. Though CBC is not independent of government control, views opposing government policies are regularly reported, though opposition political figures occasionally claim their positions are slighted or ignored. There are two independent daily newspapers in which opposing political views are presented. The Government regularly comes under attack in the newspapers and on two popular daily call-in radio programs. Barbados hosts the Cave Hill campus of the University of the West Indies, and academicians across the political spectrum express their views freely.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government observes the constitutional guarantees of peaceful assembly and private association. Permits are required for public demonstrations, and they are routinely granted. Political parties, trade associations, and private organizations function and hold meetings and rallies without government hindrance.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is full freedom of religion. While the Anglican and Methodist faiths have traditionally predominated, there are numerous other active religious denominations and organizations throughout the country. Foreign missionaries of various faiths proselytize freely. The Caribbean Conference of Churches is headquartered in Barbados and publishes its materials there.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens and legal residents move freely within Barbados, and leave and enter the country without restriction, rights provided for in the Constitution. Barbados has a small number of applicants for admission as refugees; their applications are processed on a case-by-case basis.

BARBADOS

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens have this right in law and exercise it in practice. Political parties freely compete in fair elections by secret ballot at least every 5 years. There are no impediments to participation in the political process, and all Barbadians over age 18 may vote. The present Democratic Labour Party (DLP) Government won the May 1986 election, taking 24 of the 27 seats and replacing the incumbent Barbados Labor Party (BLP) government. A small Marxist party, the Workers Party of Barbados, was formed in 1985, but has attracted little support. It participated marginally in the 1986 election and holds no parliamentary seats. In 1989 four DLP Members of Parliament resigned from the party and formed the National Democratic Party, replacing the BLP as the official opposition by virtue of its four seats in Parliament. A Cabinet of Ministers, appointed by the Prime Minister, exercises executive power.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no reports of human right violations in Barbados during 1989, and human rights groups have not requested any such investigations. The Government publicly advocates strengthening the human rights machinery of the United Nations and the Organization of American States, as well as more investigations into alleged violations of human rights in other countries and the increased use of fact-finding or observer teams to monitor controversial political and electoral situations.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Constitution provides for equal treatment under the law, regardless of race, religion, or sex. These provisions are respected in practice. Women form a large percentage of heads of household in Barbados and are not discriminated against in public housing and other social welfare programs. Compulsory education through the secondary level is enforced uniformly. Barbados is a signatory of the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women. Women actively participate in all aspects of national life and are well represented at all levels in both the public and private sectors. Women's rights groups exist; they are devoted primarily to promoting women's participation in the professions and, to a lesser extent, to safeguarding legal rights of illegitimate children.

The Government has not singled out violence against women as a particular or acute social problem, and this assessment that violence against women is not characteristic of Barbadian society is supported by female private sector lawyers who are active in women's issues, with the Attorney General's office, and with the president of the National Association of Women. Criminal penalties for violent crimes are the same regardless of sex of offender or victim. Penalties for simple assault are minimal for first offenders, usually a small fine. For repeat offenders or those with a history of violent acts, jail sentences are usually imposed. In cases of domestic violence, courts also typically issue restraining orders if requested by the victim, the breach of which is punished by a jail sentence. The penalty for rape is imprisonment for up to 14 years. In 1989 there were a number of cases in the local courts of domestic violence involving assault or wounding, although women's rights groups point out that there is still some reluctance on the part of victims to report such incidents. New legislation is under consideration by the Government which would change trial procedures in rape cases to provide additional protection for the privacy of the victim.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to form and belong to trade unions and to strike, and freely exercise these rights. There are two major unions and several smaller ones, representing various sectors of labor. The largest union, the Barbados Worker's Union (BWU), is historically closely associated with the governing DLP (BWU officers hold three elected parliamentary seats and the appointed post of President of the Senate), but the union is not controlled by the party or Government. Trade unionists' personal and property rights are given full protection under law. There were no major strikes or other industrial actions in 1989, but unions have resorted to strikes in recent years. Strikes are illegal in public services. Barbadian trade unions are free to affiliate to trade union internationals and are active in a variety of regional and international labor organizations. Barbados is a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) and has ratified ILO conventions 87 and 98 dealing with freedom of association and collective bargaining.

b. The Right To Organize and Bargain Collectively

The rights to organize and to bargain collectively are provided by law and respected in practice. Over 20 percent of the working population is organized, and wages and working conditions are negotiated through the collective bargaining process. Employers have no legal obligation to recognize unions but most do when a majority of their employees are organized. Workers who may be subject to antiunion discrimination have recourse to the Department of Labor, whose chief labor officer conducts inquiries. There are no manufacturing or special areas where collective bargaining rights are legally or administratively impaired. Barbados has a number of export processing zones; none of these are closed to union organizers, and there do not appear to be any informal strictures on unionization.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by the Constitution and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum working age of 16 in Barbados is generally observed. Minimum age limitations are reinforced by compulsory primary and secondary education policies.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The standard workweek is 40 hours in 5 days, and workers are guaranteed a minimum of 3 weeks of annual leave. Minimum wages for specified categories of workers are administratively established and enforced by law. The minimum wage for shop assistants (entry level commercial workers), $75 per week, is marginally sufficient to meet minimum living standards; most employees earn more. All workers are covered by unemployment benefits legislation, and by national insurance (social security) legislation. A comprehensive government-sponsored health program offers subsidized treatment and medication. Legally mandated health and safety standards are enforced by the Department of Labor, and are in keeping with normal standards.

BARBADOS

BELIZE

Belize is a parliamentary democracy organized under a Constitution enacted in 1981 upon independence from the United Kingdom. It is governed by a Prime Minister, a Cabinet of Ministers, and a Legislative Assembly. A Governor General represents Queen Elizabeth II in the largely ceremonial role of Head of State. Both local and national elections are scheduled on a regular, constitutionally prescribed basis, and the two national political parties--the People's United Party (PUP) and the United Democratic Party (UDP)--field competing slates of candidates. The Government changed hands, for the second time since independence in 1981, when the PUP won a majority of National Assembly seats on September 4, 1989.

The security forces of Belize consist of the Belize National Police (BNP) and the Belize Defence Force (BDF). They are responsible to and controlled by civilian authorities. During 1989, narcotics producers and transshippers in Belize continued to tax the scarce resources of the security forces.

A developing nation with an estimated population of 203,000, Belize has an open market economy. The Government favors free enterprise and actively encourages increased private investment, both foreign and domestic. In 1988 the gross domestic product increased 7.6 percent, and per capita gross domestic product was an estimated $1,284.

Constitutional protections for the fundamental rights and freedoms of all Belizeans are upheld by an independent judiciary. Persons may freely associate, hold private property, speak freely, and pursue private interests. An active and unconstrained press buttresses these civil and political rights. The country's overall human rights record remains good.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture or other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. Such treatment is expressly forbidden by the Constitution.

Occasional allegations of police misconduct have led to prompt investigations, followed, when necessary, by disciplinary action or dismissal.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest or detention, and these provisions are respected in practice. A person must be informed of the cause of detention within 48 hours of arrest and must be brought before a court within 72 hours. The Constitutional Affairs Committee in the House of Representatives has recommended that the maximum allowable time for informing a detainee of the cause of his arrest be shortened from 48 to 24 hours. In practice, all detainees are informed immediately. Bail is granted in all but the most serious cases. Exile is forbidden by the Constitution and does not occur.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Persons accused of criminal activity have constitutional rights to presumption of innocence, protection against self-incrimination, defense by counsel, public trial, and appeal. Trial by jury is mandatory in criminal cases.

Those convicted by either a magistrate's court or the Supreme Court of Belize may appeal to the Court of Appeal. In some cases, including those resulting in a capital sentence, the convicted party may make a final appeal to the Queen's Privy Council in the United Kingdom. In 1989 these constitutional guarantees were respected by a judiciary which is independent of the executive and is an effective guarantor of an equitable system of justice. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Constitutional provisions for the protection of personal property, privacy of home and person, and recognition of human dignity are generally honored by the Government. A search of private premises may be undertaken only if a warrant is obtained in advance, except in the case of suspected possession of illegal firearms, and search of the person may be effected only with just cause.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and the press are protected under the Constitution and by local custom. In practice, all viewpoints are publicly presented without government interference. Five privately owned weekly newspapers, three of them fiercely partisan, engage in lively debate of public issues. The opposition press is a frequent critic of government officials and policies. All newspapers are subject to the constraints of libel laws.

Before winning the September 4 election, the opposition PUP accused the Government of censorship because the Belize Broadcasting Authority (BBA), a government agency, screened all advertisements submitted for television broadcasting and rejected several PUP submissions on grounds that they were not factual. The PUP played the rejected advertisements at rallies. Other PUP ads were aired on television. The PUP turned down an offer from the BBA to participate in a televised debate between leading candidates of the two parties.

Fourteen privately owned television broadcasting stations, including several cable networks, operate throughout Belize under the authority and regulation of the BBA. The BBA bans such programming as pornography, requires that a minimum of 2 percent of programming be locally produced, and must authorize certain broadcasts, such as those with political content. The BBA continues to assert its right to edit any defamatory or personally libelous material from the political broadcasts of both parties before these are aired. For lack of privately owned commercial radio stations, the BBA has a de facto monopoly on radio broadcasting.

Academic freedom is vigorously exercised.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally assured and is honored in practice. Political parties and other groups with political objectives freely held rallies and mass meetings in 1989, especially before the September elections. The intelligence service, dissolved in 1989, at times observed and monitored public political meetings, but no instance of harassment or interference has been reported. Under the Constitution Belizeans are free to form and join associations of their choice, both political and nonpolitical. The Government officially charters those associations which wish to benefit from legal provisions, such as tax-free status for charitable and nonprofit organizations, but less formal, unchartered associations also exist. The organizers of public meetings must obtain a permit 36 hours in advance of the meetings, and such permits are rarely denied.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Belize. All groups may worship as they choose, and all groups and churches may establish places of worship, train clergy, and maintain contact with coreligionists abroad. There is an active missionary presence. In church publications and from the pulpit, church leaders comment on government and political policies as these affect the social welfare of the country. A broad-based partnership of the Government and several different churches active in education successfully operates and administers most of Belize's primary and secondary schools. No political party is affiliated with any particular church or religion, and no church or religious affiliation gives political advantage or disadvantage to its adherents.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement within the country. Foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation are unrestricted. The Constitution mandates forfeiture of Belizean citizenship for those who knowingly and willingly accept citizenship of another country.

While emigration is widely accepted, a wave of immigration from neighboring Central American countries has proven controversial. Estimates of the number of aliens living in Belize since 1980 continue to hover around 40,000. There are no exact numbers for alien arrivals or departures. In 1990, however, the Government of Belize is scheduled to undertake a census which may yield a more accurate tally of aliens. The original government enthusiasm for, and assistance to, the new arrivals waned as public resentment of their increasing presence spread. The Government has worked closely with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in planning a wide variety of future assistance projects which will benefit both Belizeans and aliens, thereby defusing potential resentment toward the aliens and helping to minimize the chance that they will suffer discrimination. In 1989 no refugees were either forced or pressured to return to their countries of origin. The UNHCR maintains an office in Belize, but the Government has not ratified the United Nations Convention on Refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Belize is a parliamentary democracy governed by a fairly elected Legislative Assembly, with executive direction coming from a cabinet of ministers headed by Prime Minister George Price. By constitutional mandate, the Governor General instructs the leader of the majority party of the National Assembly to form a Government following national elections, which must be held at least once every 5 years. Municipal and town board officials are elected in local contests at 3-year intervals. Belize experienced a peaceful and orderly transfer of power from the UDP to the PUP in the national elections of September 1989, when the PUP won 15 of the 28 seats in the British-style House of Representatives in an election in which 73 percent of the electorate voted.

All elections are by secret ballot, and suffrage is universal for Belizean citizens 18 years and older. Observers of the polling in each of Belize's six regions during the September 1989 national elections found procedural safeguards to be fully functioning. There were no allegations of electoral fraud despite the narrow margin of the popular vote (50.2 percent) by which the Government changed hands.

The two main parties dominate Belizean political life, and each party's membership cuts across all segments of Belize's diverse ethnic groupings. The ruling party's narrow parliamentary majority suffices for setting policy, but Belize's democratic heritage and the forces of public opinion, an independent judiciary, and a free press ensure that public policy making remains open.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no known requests by international human rights organizations to investigate human rights violations in Belize, and no international human rights organization maintains an office in Belize. Senior government officials state that the Government would cooperate with any reputable, internationally recognized human rights organization which wished to establish an office in Belize.

The Human Rights Commission of Belize, a nongovernmental organization that opened offices in late 1987 maintained a low profile throughout the year and issued few public statements.

BELIZESection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

There is no discrimination on ethnic or religious grounds. All Belizeans have equal protection under the law.

Despite constitutional provisions of equality, Belizean women face some prejudices rooted in social and economic practice. The Government worked to overcome this problem by funding a Women's Bureau charged with developing programs to improve the status of women in Belize. Founded in 1981, the Women's Bureau was upgraded in 1986 to a government department within the Ministry of Labor and Social Services. A number of officially registered women's groups work closely with various government ministries in promoting social awareness programs. Women have access to education and are active in all spheres of national life. Women generally receive the same wage as men for similar work.

Domestic violence against women is a chronic cultural problem. In 1985 a group of Belize City residents began the Belize Women Against Violence movement (WAV) which now has branches elsewhere in Belize. The group operates a shelter for battered wives and a hotline for rape victims, and has obtained cooperation from the Ministries of Home Affairs and Education. The Government is committed to increasing the safety of women; it has imposed a minimum sentence for rape convictions of 7 years' actual custody.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

By statute and in practice Belizean workers and employers are free to establish and join labor organizations, and the labor union movement is a significant factor in Belize's economy. Eleven active unions, with an estimated 30 percent of the labor force on their rolls, effectively represent a broad cross-section of white-collar, blue-collar, and professional workers, including most civil service employees. The unions are considered official by the Ministry of Labor when they have filed with the Office of Registry. Members are empowered to draft the by-laws and constitutions of their unions, and they are free to elect officers from among the membership at large. Unions which choose not to hold elections can act as representatives for their membership, but only unions which hold free and annual elections of officers are permitted to join the national Trade Union Congress of Belize (TUC), which is affiliated with the Caribbean Congress of Labor and, through the Inter-American Organization of Workers, with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). By both law and precedent, unions are effectively protected against dissolution or suspension by administrative authority.

Unions are legally permitted to strike, but unions representing essential services may strike only after giving 21 days of notice to the ministry concerned. Only employees providing "essential services" must accept conciliation by the Labor Commissioner before going on strike. In practice, the Labor Commissioner acts as a conciliator in deadlocked collective bargaining negotiations between labor and management, offering nonbinding counsel to both sides. Historically, the Commissioner's guidance has been voluntarily accepted. However, should either union or management choose not to accept the conciliator's decision, both are empowered to a legal hearing of the case, provided that it is linked to some valid provision of civil or criminal law. There were no strikes during 1989. No union is officially affiliated with any political party, although several unions are clearly allied to one or the other of the two main parties.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Legally, all unions may freely organize. Union activities are protected from antiunion interference by article 13 of the Constitution which specifically prohibits antiunion discrimination both before and after the union is officially registered. Cases of antiunion discrimination can be brought to the Supreme Court for Constitutional redress. The last such case was brought to the Court 5 years ago. Virtually every sector of the economy has been unionized to some degree. Established unions are effectively protected from antiunion interference by both precedent and law, and union officials and membership rarely, if ever, encounter discrimination. Collective bargaining is the rule rather than the exception in most labor negotiations, and workers are fully represented in negotiations for the prevention or settlement of disputes with employers.

There are no export processing zones or other areas where union organization or collective bargaining are impeded or discouraged.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is forbidden by the Constitution and does not occur.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age of employment in Belize is 14 years, or 17 years for employment near hazardous machinery. Inspectors of the Ministries of Labor and Education enforce this regulation, although in recent years school truancy officers, who have historically borne the brunt of the enforcement burden, have been less active.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

No set minimum wage covers all Belizeans, but some categories of service employment, such as retail, restaurant, domestic, and health care jobs have minimum hourly wage standards of approximately $0.75 per hour. Although unemployment is widespread, the conjunction of wage rates and hours worked has normally been sufficient to provide employed Belizeans and their families with an adequate standard of living. No worker is obliged to work more than 6 days or 45 hours per week. Payment of overtime work is obligatory, as is an annual paid holiday of 2 weeks. A patchwork of health and safety regulations covers numerous industries, and these are enforced to varying degrees of effectiveness by the Ministries of Labor and Public Health. Enforcement is not universal countrywide, and in 1989 limited inspection and investigative resources were committed principally to urban and more accessible rural areas where labor, health, and safety complaints had been registered.

BOLIVIA

Bolivia is a multiparty democracy with an elected president and bicameral legislature. With no presidential candidate receiving an absolute majority of the popular vote in the elections of May 7, 1989, the Bolivian Congress selected Jaime Paz Zamora to be President, in accordance with procedures mandated by the Constitution. Paz Zamora succeeded Victor Paz Estenssoro as President on August 6, 1989.

Police security forces and the military are generally controlled by and responsive to the civilian Government.

Bolivia is the second poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, and its economy only began to show consistent growth in 1988-89 after years of severe contraction. Although rich in mineral resources, in recent years Bolivia has experienced high domestic production costs and low international minerals prices. A major restructuring of the minerals industry has contributed to already high unemployment, currently about 20 percent.

The outgoing Paz Estenssoro administration's stringent economic reforms ended the financial mismanagement and hyperinflation of 1982-85 but were strongly opposed by organized labor. Small coca-growing farmers resisted the outgoing administration's antinarcotics campaign.

Human rights are provided for by the Constitution and are widely respected. In response to increasingly violent street demonstrations and a prolonged hunger strike in support of teachers' union demands, the Government imposed a state of siege on November 15 and detained more than 850 labor activists; most were released within hours, nearly all within 10 days. People of European or mixed-race origin continue to dominate the political and economic system to the detriment of ethnic Indians. There are occasional reports of abuse of prisoners and detainees by police, as well as concerns about an overburdened and sometimes corrupt judicial system. Bolivian women do not yet enjoy a status in society equal to that of men but are gradually assuming a greater role in business and the professions.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no political or other extrajudicial killings by the Government in 1989. A terrorist group calling itself "Zarate Willca" claimed responsibility for the politically motivated machine-gun murder of two American citizen Mormon missionaries in La Paz in May 1989. A government investigation resulted in the arrest of four persons on charges of terrorist activities and other crimes. No findings were announced in the Government's investigation into the reported death of a peasant at Achacachi last year at the hands of the military.

Late in 1989 Bolivian authorities arrested Luis Arce Gomez, the notorious Interior Minister of the regime of General Garcia Meza in 1980-1981. Widely despised for his role in the tortures, kidnappings, and extrajudicial killing which characterized that regime, Arce Gomez was also active in narcotics trafficking. He faced charges and prosecution in both Bolivia and the United States.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances in Bolivia in 1989. Judicial proceedings are continuing in cases involving disappearances during the early 1980's (before the restoration of democracy), and the courts collected further testimony as evidence during 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture, and the Government neither condones nor practices such activity. However, there have been occasional charges of cruelty toward or degrading treatment of detainees by individual police officers. Police, prison, and security personnel are rarely tried and punished for such acts. Corruption, malnutrition, unsanitary conditions, and drug-related problems are endemic in Bolivia's overcrowded prison system.

Clear evidence surfaced in 1989 of serious human rights abuses over a period of years at the Espejos Rehabilitation Farm in Santa Cruz department. According to testimony and forensic evidence made public in late 1989, a number of prisoners were severely mistreated and some, perhaps 40 or more, died and were secretly buried in a clandestine cemetery. The officer in charge of Los Espejos has been remanded for criminal prosecution, and other officials face sanctions of various kinds.

The Government which took office on August 6 is publicly committed to ameliorating conditions in the country's prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution requires a court order for an arrest, and detainees must be charged or released within 24 hours. The Constitution also provides for a judicial determination of the legality of a detention, and prisoners are usually released if a judge rules that they have been detained illegally. After the initial detention, prisoners may consult a lawyer of their choice. Provisions for bail exist in Bolivia except in certain narcotics cases, and bail is generally granted.

Under the provisions of the state of siege declared by the President on November 15, constitutional protections were suspended and over 850 labor union activists were detained in overnight police roundups. About 150 were transported to small communities for internal exile, but all were released within 10 days.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The constitutional right of fair public trial is adhered to in most respects, but long delays in the judicial system are common. Investigations, trials, and appeals procedures are so lengthy that some prisoners eventually serve more time than the maximum sentence for the crime with which they are being charged. Defendants have the right to an attorney, to confront witnesses, to present evidence, and to appeal a judicial decision. These rights generally are upheld in practice. Although the law provides for a court-appointed defense attorney at public expense, if necessary, one may not always be provided because of a shortage of funds and qualified personnel. The Constitution authorizes the Supreme Court, Bolivia's highest civilian judicial body, to review legislative measures to determine if they are in accordance with a citizen's "specific rights or the Constitution."

The military regime of 1976 revised the military penal code and established the military court system. The law defined and established military jurisdiction over actions against the security of the State and against military personnel and property.

Corruption of the judicial system remains a serious problem. Narcotics traffickers often bribe judicial and other officials in exchange for releasing suspected traffickers and their aircraft, returning captured drugs, and purging incriminating files. The Government has taken some steps to discipline Bolivia's judicial system. Under provisions of the antinarcotics legislation signed into law in July 1988, the Government has begun creating three-judge special narcotics control courts. They are to function as first-instance tribunals in narcotics-related cases.

Terrorist threats against judges and other officials involved in the cases of four detainees allegedly linked to "Zarate Willca" (see Section 1.a.) delayed the timely consideration of the charges against the four defendants.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home and the privacy of citizens' lives are protected by the Constitution and are normally respected in practice.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

By law, citizens enjoy freedom of speech and exercise it widely without government interference. Both state-owned and private radio and television stations operate in Bolivia. All newspapers are privately owned. Since the restoration of democracy in 1982, Bolivians have enjoyed a generally unrestricted press representing the full spectrum of political views.

The privately owned La Paz television channel 4 and Radio Metropolitana, which were closed by the Government in June 1988 after they broadcast an interview with then-fugitive narcotics trafficker Roberto Suarez, were allowed to reopen in 1989. The owner of the two closed media outlets organized a political party in September 1988 and campaigned freely for president, even while his stations remained off the air. His party won a plurality in the balloting in La Paz Department.

The Government has consistently respected academic freedom. Public universities enjoy autonomous status by law, and that status is respected.

BOLIVIA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The rights of peaceful assembly and association are provided for by law and generally respected in practice.

On November 14, however, the Government imposed a state of siege in response to civil disturbances growing out of a strike by the nation's teachers, and police arrested over 850 people (see Section 1.d.). Apart from the arrests, curfew restrictions and other curbs on assembly were relatively minor.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Roman Catholicism predominates in Bolivia, and the Constitution recognizes it as the country's official religion; Catholic bishops receive a nominal stipend from the State. Other religious groups, however, operate openly. The Mormons, Baha'is, Seventh-Day Adventists, Methodists, and others freely proselytize and operate churches, training centers, and social welfare projects throughout the country. The small Jewish community has not reported any discrimination. Citizens are free to practice the religion of their choice and to maintain links with coreligionists abroad.

The Government has issued rules designating the Roman Catholic Church to coordinate all public ceremonies in which governmental authorities and institutions participate. Based on a decree issued in July 1985, the Government of President Paz Estenssoro (1985-1989) declared all existing religious registrations void, and required religious groups to reregister. In 1989 the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Worship reiterated that numerous religious groups were operating in Bolivia illegally (that is, without legal registration) and threatened to begin legal proceedings against them. The Government of President Paz Zamora has indicated that it may move soon to write the administrative regulations for registration into law, a step which would require further congressional action. Some evangelical Protestant groups complain that they are subject to more stringent registration procedures than the Catholic Church.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on travel within Bolivia or abroad. The Government does not impede emigration and guarantees departing citizens the right to return. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Bolivia is a multiparty democracy with an elected president and a functioning, independent, bicameral legislature. Opposition groups function freely both in and out of the Congress. On May 7, Bolivia held free and fair elections which resulted in a peaceful, constitutional change of administration on August 6.

Suffrage has been universal since the 1952 revolution. Nevertheless, people of European or mixed-race origin are predominant in the political system.

BOLIVIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is sensitive to the opinions of both international and domestic organizations and is willing to discuss human rights concerns with them. The Congress has committees responsible for monitoring observance of human rights. The Catholic Church, the Permanent Assembly on Human Rights in Bolivia (APDHB), labor organizations, and the press have been aggressive monitors of human rights. These organizations comment frequently on issues and developments related to human rights.

Although protected in theory and sometimes in practice by social legislation, Bolivian women do not enjoy a social status equal to that of men. Cultural traditions, social conditions, and limited political influence remain major obstacles to advancement for women. In rural families, women contribute significantly to economic activities and often control the family finances, but nonetheless they are considered socially and politically subordinate. In urban settings, women are slowly achieving a greater role in business and professional life, as their participation in cooperatives, community affairs, and education increases.

There are no reliable and complete statistics indicating the extent of violence against women in Bolivia. A study prepared by a women's rights group in November 1989 cataloged 98 articles in 5 major newspapers between March and October 1989 concerning violence involving women (including such categories as suicide, attempted suicide, and death in childbirth). Violence against women is a criminal offense in Bolivia, and legal sanctions are regularly applied when cases come to the attention of the authorities. However, many women are reluctant to bring charges in cases of domestic violence, and the incidence of such abuse as wife beating is very likely underreported. Legal counseling is available for women on a limited basis through private organizations.

Although prohibited by the Constitution, discrimination against people of indigenous background continues. The Aymara- and Quechua-speaking Indian majority of the population remains at the lower end of the country's socioeconomic scale and is disadvantaged in terms of health, life expectancy, education, income, and employment. All political leaders acknowledge it is a problem. The Government's programs to ease Bolivia's economic crisis, including activities sponsored by the Social Emergency Fund, are of direct benefit to some of the disadvantaged, within the constraints of severely limited resources.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Bolivian workers have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, and they are free to elect their own leaders. They possess and exercise the right to strike. Labor law prohibits any labor contract which denies workers' constitutional rights and freedoms. The Bolivian Workers Central (COB), an umbrella labor organization which represents the majority of unionized workers, is independent of the Government. In past years it has frequently paralyzed the economy with crippling strikes. In 1989, despite declines in membership and political influence, the COB mobilized demonstrations on various social and economic issues throughout the country.

Some COB affiliates, such as the teachers' union, went out on strike for extended periods during 1989. Antigovernment labor demonstrations, most of which were associated with these strikes, were generally more peaceful than in the past, but some occasionally resulted in violence between demonstrators and police or military personnel. On November 15, the Government declared a state of siege and detained over 850 labor activists including officials of the teachers' union as well as senior officers of the Communist-led COB. About 159 of those detained were sent to internal exile in small towns but all were released within 10 days.

The Government places no restrictions on a union's right to join international labor organizations. The COB, which had been independent since its founding in 1952, became an affiliate of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions in 1988. As in previous years, the COB in 1989 was represented at the International Labor Organization (ILO) convention in Geneva.

In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) cited several provisions of Bolivian labor law which do not conform with Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, including: denial of the right of public workers to organize unions; the requirement for prior authorization before forming a union; the limit of one union in an enterprise; the possibility of dissolving a union by administrative action; and, the power of the executive to prohibit strikes by imposing compulsory arbitration. The Committee encouraged the Government to adopt legislation developed in cooperation with the ILO which would rectify these shortcomings.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Bolivian workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively. The law does not extend this right to government workers, but the distinction is largely ignored in practice, as virtually all government workers are unionized. Negotiations between government representatives and freely elected labor leaders are common.

The Labor Ministry has an established procedure for resolving union complaints of discrimination or unfair practices by employers and does not hesitate to involve itself in mediation of labor disputes. In the wake of a Supreme Court ruling, a legal dispute over the procedure by which unions select their leaders is pending and may have to be settled by legislation. There are no export processing zones or other areas in which organizing or collective bargaining are impeded.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Bolivian law prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and none has been reported.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

BOLIVIA

Bolivian law prohibits the employment of minors under 18 years of age in dangerous, unhealthy, or immoral work. Revisions in Bolivia's 50-year-old Labor Code, which Bolivian officials discussed during the year with experts from the ILO, may clarify ambiguities in the law concerning the employment of children under 14 years of age. In practice, the legal provisions concerning employment of children are not rigorously enforced.

Bolivia's labor laws contain conditions for child protection, paid vacations, and protection of workers' health and safety. In practice these laws are not rigorously observed, and the Government has not provided funds for adequate enforcement. The mines, often old and operated with antiquated equipment, are particularly dangerous and unhealthy. In urban areas, about half the labor force observe an 8-hour day and a workweek of 5 or 5 1/2 days.

Bolivia has a minimum wage law as well as an elaborate system of bonuses and compensations for the private sector. In 1989 the Government fixed the minimum wage at the equivalent of approximately $23 per month. A minimum wage earner cannot easily support a family at an acceptable standard of living. Moreover, labor leaders and the APDHB, while conceding the Government's achievements in bringing financial stability out of the chaos of 1985, continue to express concern that high rates of unemployment are contributing to difficult living conditions, despite the modest economic gains of 1987-89.

Brazil held its first direct presidential election since 1960 on November 15, 1989, after returning to civilian rule in 1985. A runoff election took place on December 17 and Fernando Collor de Mello won the presidency. Congressional elections will take place in October 1990. The present Congress, elected directly in 1986 to serve also as a Constituent Assembly, finishes its term on February 1, 1991.

Internal security is provided by federal, state, and local police. The armed forces have traditionally considered external threats as their principal responsibility, but they also have a constitutional responsibility to guarantee law and order. They have been deployed internally in cases of threats to public order and to protect critical industrial installations during strikes and emergency situations. Brazil was under military rule from 1964-1984.

Brazil experienced negative growth of some 2 percent per year per capita during 1988 and 1989. The country is marked by a wide disparity in income distribution among different income segments and geographic regions. It has the eighth-largest economy outside the Communist world and an external debt of about $115 billion. The Government ended a unilateral moratorium on most of its debt service to foreign commercial banks in early 1988, but did not make timely payments to commercial bank creditors in September 1989.

The new Constitution of 1988 contains a series of provisions designed to increase the protection of human rights in Brazil. One is the "writ of injunction," which can be filed in court to request enforcement of a constitutional provision which has not yet been implemented by legislation. Others broaden the protections of individual and collective rights, especially in the labor area.

The principal human rights concerns in Brazil are the treatment of Indians, of peasants involved in land disputes, and of common criminals. While the number of unauthorized homesteadings by the landless increased in 1989, reported killings of peasants and union organizers involved in land disputes continued to decline. The press frequently reports that common criminals in the custody of police are beaten and some criminal suspects not in custody are killed by unknown assailants. While the statistics of the government and Indian organizations show a decline in the number of violent deaths of Indians, the number of deaths due to disease reportedly increased. Demarcated Indian lands are threatened by settlers, miners, and lumber companies. The Constitution establishes additional rights and legal protections for Brazil's Indians, giving them full legal standing in the courts.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Several hundred Brazilians died in 1989 at the hands of vigilante groups, in urban gang wars, and in land conflicts. Brazilian human rights organizations charge that policemen and hired thugs often kill persons suspected of common crimes.

The rate of violent crime in Brazil's major urban centers has continued to rise, and Rio de Janeiro now has one of the highest murder rates in the world. Kidnaping of prominent industrialists and innocent bystanders has also risen. The growing crime rate has led to a high degree of public acquiescence in police brutality against criminal suspects. Resources devoted by local and state governments remain insufficient to combat the problem.

Conflicts between rural landholders and the landless continued in 1989. Many organizations involved in the landless movement attribute the large number of illegal peasant takeovers of land this year to a reported slowdown in land distribution efforts by the Brazilian Government during 1989. Most of the people killed in land conflicts were rural laborers or squatters in the northeast, the south, and the interior. Although there were fewer killings in land conflicts in 1989, they attracted considerable publicity because the victims included rural labor leaders, lawyers, clergy and journalists helping to organize agricultural worker unions. According to the Pastoral Land Commission (CPT) of the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops, there was a 63 percent decrease in the number of killings compared to 1988. However, officials of the National Confederation of Agricultural Workers and the CPT expressed concern that growing assertiveness by rural workers will lead to further violence. They noted that confrontations have become more frequent in Pernambuco, Maranhao, Rio Grande do Sul and Santa Catarina, where rural unions are best organized and most active.

Several prominent labor leaders were killed in 1989. Jose Mariano Dias, the president of the Rural Workers Union of Ribeirao, Pernambuco, was murdered in June after investigating a sugar mill for possible labor code violations. Verino Sossai, leader in the Sole Labor Central (CUT), was murdered in July after his involvement in a land "invasion." Journalist Rubens de Vabo, a leader in the landless movement, was killed in western Rio de Janeiro state in September. In Itaituba, Para state, city councilman Raimundo Silva de Sousa was murdered on July 26, as was Socialist Party leader Jose Marciao Ferreira on November 23. The CPT estimates that in the first half of 1989 an estimated 27 people died in land-related conflicts. As in recent years, less than 10 percent of the victims were landholders and, according to CPT, in 1989 there seems to have been an increase in the number of hired gunmen (working for landowners) who themselves were killed.

Shootings, beatings, and death threats against advocates for the landless are also common. A CPT lawyer, Antonio Eder John de Souza, for example, was shot and injured in Manaus in March. Clergy involved in the landless movement and reporters who follow the stories routinely receive death threats. Federal and state authorities have expressed serious concern over the violence, but the national Government asserts that it does not have the legal authority to intervene unless asked to do so by a state government. State governments tend to neglect the issue until forced to respond to a land "invasion." The number of convictions for these murders and other crimes remains minimal, although the persons accused of murdering Francisco "Chico" Mendes Filho in 1988 for his efforts to preserve the Amazon rain forest were indicted in 1989.

Brazilian human rights organizations charge that federal, state, and local authorities have failed to take legal action against those responsible for such killings. These groups charge that police often fail to conduct complete investigations and frequently cooperate with either the hired gunmen themselves or their employers. Officials at the CPT estimate that, of more than 1,200 murders in recent years, fewer than 40 have resulted in convictions.

While many urban murders result from narcotics gang wars, there are reports also of widespread killings of alleged or suspected criminals by unidentified vigilante groups. Often the corpses showed signs of torture or brutality. Vigilante groups tend to operate in working-class neighborhoods and in the shantytowns ("favelas"). The killings are viewed by some as the actions of hired thugs or policemen employed by shopkeepers who have either been robbed or are taking preventive action. These vigilante actions were cited as a major problem by Amnesty International and by most human rights groups in Brazil. Investigations into these incidents are hampered because witnesses hesitate to cooperate with authorities for fear of retribution or because they sympathize with the actions of vigilantes.

On December 28, 1988, journalist Luis Otavio Monteiro was murdered in Manaus by a vigilante group apparently linked to or made up of local police, reportedly because of his investigation of the police role in local robberies. In March, Luis Tenderini, president of the Commission for Justice and Peace of the Archdiocese of Olinda and Recife, was kidnapped and tortured.

According to human rights groups, the police use scarce resources for what they consider important cases, i.e., cases involving middle or upper class victims. It is also widely assumed by human rights groups in Brazil--given the slow nature of Brazilian justice, the frequency of escape of criminals from inadequate prisons, and the absence of a death penalty in Brazil--that the police commonly take justice into their own hands, including revenge for the killing of police. In the first 9 months of 1989, 32 Rio de Janeiro state uniformed policemen were killed in the line of duty. Police in major cities are frequently accused of the deaths of innocent persons in the course of conducting their operations, especially when raiding the shantytowns in search of narcotics traffickers or assailants.

In the cities of Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo there are indications that the situation with regard to vigilante group activities improved somewhat. Through October 1989 there were 63 investigations initiated by the Commission of Inquiry on Death Squads in Rio de Janeiro. Of these, 18 were completed and three resulted in guilty findings. In Sao Paulo, police sources reported that 63 police and 450 civilians died violently this year, a slight increase over the figure for 1988. These sources attributed the increase in deaths to the addition of 12,000 police, which increased the possibility of a confrontation between police and suspects. There were 208 police disciplined for corruption and unjustified violence, including unjustified killings. Of the 208, 170 were expelled from the force and some face prosecution. In Sao Paulo, some human rights groups praised the current Sao Paulo administration for vigorously investigating and pressing charges against police and vigilante groups suspected of killings. Human rights groups reported that government reformers confront many obstacles in their efforts to contain these killings, including lack of support by the general public, which is more concerned with high crime rates, and opposition among professional levels of the uniformed police. (Because the uniformed state police investigate alleged abuses by its own officers, many instances of unjustified use of lethal force by police go unreported and unpunished, according to human rights sources.)

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated abductions in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by the Constitution, which strengthens the legal penalties for torture and acquiescence in torture. There continue to be many credible reports, however, that police beatings and torture of poor prisoners and landless peasants are widespread. These acts are intended to extract information, confessions, or money from criminal suspects, and sometimes to administer punishment. Human rights groups in Rio de Janeiro and southern Brazil note a continued reduction in reports of police brutality. They attribute the apparent trend to the promulgation of the new Constitution.

In cases where police officers have been brought to trial for abuse, there have been few convictions. Human rights organizations find little public support for defending the rights of alleged criminal offenders. Public criticism of the police is directed not at the abuse of persons in detention nor at the dismal prison conditions, but rather at the lack of effective crime control.

Most prison facilities are poorly maintained. In April, Americas Watch (AW) published a report entitled "Prison Conditions in Brazil." The report cited severe overcrowding, with only half the necessary prison spaces needed for Brazil's inmate population, and noted that many prisoners were being kept longer than their sentences due to poor record keeping. AW found that many long-term prisoners were held in short-term detention facilities because of lack of space. The report cited testimony that the "parrot's perch"--a bar on which a prisoner is suspended from the back of his knees, with his hands tied in front of his legs--continues to exist, as does beating of prisoners by guards. Poor prison conditions in Brazil were given international publicity in February when 51 naked men were forced into a 5- by 10-foot room, causing 18 of them to die of suffocation. The three police officials believed responsible for the deaths were transferred to administrative positions pending trial. The detention facility where the incident occurred was closed and the surviving prisoners were moved to other jails or prisons. Partly as a result of poor security conditions and overcrowding in Brazilian jails, there are periodic outbreaks of violence and riots. In November 1989, in the Piraguara state penitentiary in Parana, prisoners took 40 hostages. This led to the killing of 10 prisoners and 1 hostage. A few days later, five inmates died in Rio de Janeiro's Evaristodo Morais prison uprising.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution limits arrests to those caught committing a crime or those arrested by order of a judicial authority. In addition, soldiers charged with violating military rules and regulations, or with military crimes as defined by law, may be arrested. The constitutional provision for judicial determination of the legality of detention is respected.

Legally, a person may not be arbitrarily detained, but the law does permit provisional detention in exceptional circumstances when ordered by a judge. Detention also may be ordered by a court during a police investigation or the prosecution phase and can be extended until the case comes to trial or until a judge rules that reasons for the detention no longer exist. Provisional detention in Brazil is used infrequently. In 1989, however, there were several cases of illegal and incommunicado detention without a judicial order, as well as allegations of arbitrary detention of squatters during evictions. Human rights groups charge that police detain people for questioning without probable cause, in some cases based on race or other questionable motives.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is an independent branch of government. The federal judicial system, with the Federal Supreme Court at its apex, includes courts of first instance and appeals courts. The states organize their own judicial systems, so long as they do not violate basic principles in the federal Constitution. Brazil also has a system of specialized courts dealing with military, labor, electoral, and juvenile matters, among others. A system of small claims courts has been created by the new Constitution. Under the Constitution, military courts no longer have jurisdiction to hear cases against civilians.

The right to a fair public trial is provided for by law and is generally respected in practice. Defendants are entitled to counsel and must be made fully aware of the charges against them. In cases where a defendant cannot afford an attorney, one must be provided free of charge; private attorneys are appointed by courts to represent poor defendants where public defenders are unavailable. The state of Rio de Janeiro recently established a special group of public defenders on continuous duty to serve newly arrested defendants. Defendants and their attorneys have the right to be informed of the evidence on which charges are based. Only cases of willful crimes against life are tried by jury; all others are tried by a judge. The judicial system has a serious backlog, and many cases may not be tried for months.

Lynchings of suspected criminals by irate citizens attracted press coverage in 1989, and several human rights sources believe the number of lynchings was higher this year than in 1988--14 occurred in a 2-month period in the spring. Lynchings arise out of public rage against rising crime and a feeling that the judicial system cannot be counted on to mete out justice.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for freedom from arbitrary intrusion into the home. There have been no reports of illegal entry for political reasons. However, entry into homes without a warrant occurs in searches for criminal suspects.

The new Constitution provides the right for a person to file a "habeas data" writ in court, at no financial cost, to obtain information about himself in the possession of Brazilian authorities. This writ may also be used to request the correction of inaccurate data about the citizen which may be in government files.

Wiretaps are unconstitutional except for purposes of criminal investigation and prosecution when authorized by a judicial authority in circumstances defined by law. The inviolability of private correspondence is respected.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The right to free speech and to a free press is provided for in the Constitution and is broadly exercised. The press and broadcast media routinely discuss controversial social and political issues. Opposition viewpoints are aired freely. Most radio and television stations are privately owned, but the Government controls licensing authority. Newspapers are also privately owned and are vigorous in reporting and commenting on government policies and performance. Some media sources privately charge that self-censorship is widely exercised by many media organizations to avoid offending major governmental advertisers and creditors, including federal, state, and local governments and government-influenced banks.

Foreign publications are widely distributed in Brazil. The new Constitution abolished all forms of censorship. Prior review of films, plays, and radio and television programming is practiced only to determine the acceptable viewing age.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right to assemble peacefully. Permits are not required for outdoor political or labor meetings, but such assemblies may not disturb another meeting previously scheduled for the same place, and prior written notification to government authorities is required.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no favored or state religion. Most Brazilians belong to the Roman Catholic Church, which maintains an active social and pastoral program. Spiritism has many adherents, and Protestantism has been expanding in recent years. All faiths are free to establish places of worship, train clergy, and proselytize, although the Government reserves the right to decide who may enter Indian lands. The National Council of Brazilian Bishops and other missionary groups continue to complain that visas for missionaries and other foreign religious personnel are systematically delayed by immigration authorities. In 1989 there were no expulsions of missionaries or other religious denominations by the Federal Government from the areas in or near Indian communities. In 1989 Catarimani, a Catholic missionary group, was allowed to return to the Yanomami Reservation from which it was expelled in 1988.

BRAZILd. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within Brazil, nor are there any restrictions on emigration or return. Brazil admits few immigrants, does not formally accept refugees for resettlement, and is selective in granting asylum.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution provides for the right of citizens to change their government through free elections; the November 15 election confirmed that this right exists in practice. On that day, Brazil completed its democratic transition and held its first direct presidential election since 1960. After a runoff election on December 17, Fernando Collor de Mello was declared the winner by the Supreme Election Tribunal in an election that was singularly free and fair. Brazil had returned to democratic rule in March 1985, with the inauguration of a civilian president after 21 years of military governments. During the last few years, executive and legislative offices throughout the country at local, state, and national levels have all been filled through fair and democratic direct elections among candidates representing as many as 38 separate political parties.

Voting is secret and mandatory for all literate Brazilian citizens aged 18 to 70 except military conscripts who may not vote. It is voluntary for minors aged 16 to 17, for the illiterate, and for those over age 70. Women have full political rights under the Constitution, and they are increasingly active in politics and government. Indians were also given the franchise under the 1988 Constitution.

When one of the political parties which was in opposition to the military regime came to power in 1985 through a vote of the electoral college, it was viewed as a major test of the ability of the citizenry to change its government. Most Brazilians believe that the true test of the transition to full democracy were the free popular presidential elections held in 1989. The armed forces retain significant influence in the Government, but the military establishment is respecting its limited role under the new Constitution.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Many local human rights groups cite the importance of the 1988 Constitution and the discussion preceding it in making Brazilians more aware of their civic, political, and social rights, and more sensitive to cases of human rights violations. Brazil is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission. A number of Brazilian nongovernmental organizations (NGO's) actively investigate allegations of human rights violations and often initiate legal proceedings. Several international NGO's either maintain offices in Brazil or visit periodically. None of these organizations has complained of government interference in its activities. Brazilian human rights groups previously concerned with political repression have turned their attention to problems involving Indians, police mistreatment of suspected criminals, poor prison conditions, urban vigilante groups, and rural violence.

Since 1985 a federal prosecutor in each state has been designated to monitor and assist in identifying human rights violations, and many states have established their own Councils for the Defense of Human Rights.

Both Brazilian and foreign human rights organizations assert that elements of the Federal Government have been fairly responsive to human rights investigations, as have some state governments. State and federal police officials have accused the CPT of collaborating in illegal land invasions.

Discrimination on the basis of sex, race, religion, and nationality is unconstitutional, and racial discrimination --illegal since 1951--is a crime excluded from bail. Brazil is a multiracial society with a high degree of racial tolerance. Public opinion polls, however, show most Brazilians believe that poor and uneducated darker-skinned Brazilians encounter substantial de facto discrimination. The vast majority of the black population is disproportionately concentrated in the lowest economic strata, a reflection of history and cultural attitudes. For example, while 40 to 60 percent of Brazil's population is of African or other non-European ancestry, few senior officials in the Government or armed forces are black. In early 1988, the media reported that the Foreign Ministry had hired its first black career foreign service officer. Black consciousness organizations, generally lacking in political influence, challenge the view that Brazil is a "racial democracy" and denounce discrimination in housing, education, the workplace, and society at large. These organizations complain that blacks are more inclined to be stopped by police and deprived of their civil rights, and that they bear the brunt of police brutality.

One year after the 1988 centennial of Brazil's abolition of slavery, black consciousness organizations have not been able to sustain broad public interest in discrimination. However, black rights activists believe the attention given to racial discrimination in the Constitution has served to improve the awareness of blacks' civil and political rights. Recently, there have been signs that the situation is improving. In Porto Alegre, a large department store was closed temporarily in November under a municipal anti-discrimination ordinance when an elderly black man suspected of shoplifting was detained and verbally abused. In the city of Sao Paulo, a man was arrested and jailed for verbally harassing a young black student and spraying her with a hose.

The 1988 Constitution specifically addresses the question of women's rights, prohibiting discrimination in employment or salaries as well as guaranteeing 120 days of paid maternity leave. As a reaction against the new maternity leave law, some employers reportedly seek sterilization certificates from prospective employees or try to fire women in their childbearing years.

There is a high incidence of physical abuse of women in Brazil, principally but not exclusively among the lower classes. Women are killed and assaulted with virtual impunity in crimes of passion, where traditionally a man's "honor" takes precedence. However, men who commit crimes against women are beginning to be brought to trial, albeit in small numbers. In 1989 a man in Sao Paulo was convicted of sexual harassment of a woman. Officials note that women are increasingly sensitized to the problem and are more willing to make official complaints. Concern over abuse of women led to the opening of special women's police precincts in more than 12 major cities. These centers provide shelter, assist in bringing actions against aggressors, and provide general information on women's health. Women's organizations have been active in promoting women's rights and lobbying the Government. Women's groups have also been active in politics, holding seminars and forums to inform women voters; one nationally televised presidential candidates' debate dealt exclusively with women's issues.

The country's estimated 220,000 Indians suffer from higher levels of disease and infant mortality than other Brazilians and from the impact of greater contact with non-Indians as Brazil's internal frontier expands. Despite the Government's responsibility under the Constitution and the 1973 Indian Statute to protect the indigenous population, Indians continue to receive inadequate assistance. According to a June 1989 report prepared by a citizens' action committee made up of members of Congress, attorneys, and human rights activists, several tribes lost half their population in the last decade due to disease and other factors associated with the colonization of nearby lands and the influx of miners and lumber companies.

In 1989 the situation of some of Brazil's Indian tribes deteriorated, partly as a result of the Federal Government's decisions and actions. Following an August 1987 shooting incident in which four Yanomami Indians were killed by prospectors, the Federal Government declared that all outsiders would be removed from the Yanomami area, which contains 9,000 Indians. The outsiders who were forcibly expelled included anthropologists, missionaries, doctors, and nurses, while up to an estimated 50,000 prospectors remained in the area throughout 1989. With one exception, the medical teams have not been allowed to return. Indirect evidence suggests that, as a direct consequence of the prospector influx, the number of Yanomami who died from mercury poisoning or in epidemics of infectious diseases increased in 1989. According to the Committee for the Creation of Yanomami Park, it is likely that several hundred Yanomami died in 1989 due to these factors.

In 1989 violence associated with land disputes between isolated tribes and non-Indian settlers increased. According to the citizen's action committee's June 1989 report cited above, three Yanomami were injured in January by miners who invaded their lands; in February a policeman entered the Maxcuxi area in the State of Roraima, burned down houses and arrested five people illegally; and in April four Indians were injured in a land dispute in the national Xingu Park. The same report states that in May, police entered the same Maxcuxi village in Roraima and burned down eight homes, the church, and the school, and detained 25 men, women, and children without charging them. According to the Indigenous Missionary Council of the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops (CIMI), more Indians have died as a result of attacks or of disease in the past 2 years than in the previous decade.

Indian leaders complain that the Government has systematically ignored their needs and promoted settlement or development projects at their expense. They claim that many state and local governments, for example, have refused to pay the salaries of Indian teachers in schools where grade school instruction is in their native language. Indian leaders charge that the Federal Government has used pressure and legal subterfuges to avoid the demarcation of traditional Indian lands required under the 1973 Indian Statute and the Constitution. They criticize the Federal Government's decision to establish national forests on the grounds that they are open to colonization and economic exploitation by prospectors and other non-Indians. Indian leaders claim that the federal and state governments are more concerned about the exploitation of mineral and other natural resources than attending to the needs and rights of Indians.

The Constitution includes a chapter on the rights of Indians. It guarantees them the exclusive use of the riches existing in the soil, rivers, and lakes located on their lands, including a share of the proceeds from any exploitation of water, mineral, or energy resources found on these lands as demarcated by law. Any act which permits the occupation or possession of Indian lands by non-Indians, or which permits exploration or exploitation of the natural resources existing on them (except when there is relevant public interest, as defined by law), will be considered null and void. The Federal Government has the responsibility to demarcate and protect Indian lands. Such lands cannot be sold, and Indian rights over them will not expire under any statute of limitations. Indian groups cannot be removed from their lands except with Congressional approval, and in cases of force majeure their immediate return is statutorily guaranteed as soon as feasible. Brazilian Indians now have the authority to bring suits in court to defend their rights and interests. In all such suits they are to be assisted by a public prosecutor. How effectively these provisions will be implemented was unclear at year's end.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Brazil's labor code has long provided for union representation of all Brazilian workers. The law imposed a hierarchical, unitary system known as "Unicidade," which prohibited multiple unions of the same professional category in a given geographic area. It also stipulated that no union's geographic base could be smaller than a "municipality." Workers in a union whose numbers increased (as when an industry grew) could petition the state to split a preexisting union into two or more unions. Brazil's Constitution retains both "Unicidade" and the requirement that no union's geographic base may be smaller than a municipality, but it frees workers to organize new unions out of old ones without prior authorization from government authorities. The 1988 Constitution also eliminates powers previously granted to the Minister of Labor to "intervene" (i.e., depose) a union's independently elected representatives and substitute others of the Minister's choosing. The Government did not exercise this authority from 1985 to 1988.

At its June 1989 meeting, the International Labor Organization's (ILO's) Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA), considering a complaint by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), concluded that provisions of Brazil's Constitution providing that no more than one union can be formed in any occupational category in any one territory, as well as compulsory union contributions, violated Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. The Committee asked the Brazilian Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Organized labor actively participated in the drafting and approval of the Constitution in 1987-88. Reacting against labor code provisions that made most work stoppages "illegal," the unions lobbied successfully for a constitutional guarantee of the right to strike. The same meeting of the CFA cited above considered two complaints filed by the ICFTU and other labor entities alleging the discharge of strikers, and government use of the military to suppress strikes resulting in death and injury to the strikers. The Committee deplored the violence and concluded that the Government's actions did not conform with relevant ILO Conventions.

Complementary legislation passed in June 1989 stipulated that essential services remain in operation during a strike, and that workers notify employers at least 48 hours before beginning a walkout. The Constitution prohibits interference and intervention in labor unions by the Government, but provides that abuse of the right to strike (such as not maintaining essential services or giving advance notice, denying workers not on strike access to their jobs, damaging property, etc.) will be punished under the law. It also incorporates a provision from the labor code which prohibits the dismissal of employees who are candidates for union leadership positions from the date of the registration of candidacy until 1 year after the termination of their mandates, if elected, except in the case of serious misdeeds, as defined by law.

The two major labor centrals are the General Workers Central (CGT) and the Sole Workers Central (CUT). Until mid-1989, the two maintained similar positions regarding international affiliation. Provisions in the CGT and CUT founding charters mandated cooperation with all international labor organizations and affiliation with none. Following an April congress, however, new CGT leaders applied for affiliation with the ICFTU. In May 1989, the Government designated labor delegates to the ILO Conference from both the newly formed centrals and the traditional confederations.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize is guaranteed by the Constitution, and trade unions are legally mandated to represent workers. Although Brazilian laws do not make any provision for a central labor organization, three such groups have emerged--the CGT, CUT, and the Independent Workers Central (USI). Communist Party of Brazil officials recently launched a "fourth" central, the so called Classist Union Movement (Corrente Sindical Classista). To date this organization has attracted no unions of significance. The Centrals do not have legal standing to represent professional categories of workers and have been created in Brazil as nonprofit civil associations.

The Government has encouraged labor and management to resolve differences through collective bargaining, which has become commonplace. Nevertheless, a system of special labor courts continues to exercise normative powers with regard to the settlement of labor disputes, thereby discouraging direct negotiation. Existing law charges these same courts (as well as personnel linked to the Federal Labor Ministry) with mediation responsibility in preliminary stages of dispute settlement. On the other hand, arbitration by neutral, professional third parties is unknown.

Labor law applies uniformly throughout Brazil, including the Free Trade Zones and Export Processing Zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

While the Constitution prohibits forced labor, there have been repeated charges that it is utilized in Brazil, despite federal government assertions that it is taking steps to halt the practice and prosecute perpetrators. In 1989, the CPT again denounced specific labor contractors in certain northeastern and Amazon states for maintaining "slave" work forces. The CPT charged that these contractors deducted transportation and other inflated expenses from the workers' meager salaries and employed armed guards to prevent the "indebted" workers from leaving. According to press reports, such cases of forced labor typically involve the exploitation of vulnerable workers, especially minors or migrants. The CPT charges that such work forces are most common deep in the Amazon, where jungle areas are being cleared to prepare land for agricultural use. The CPT has complained that state and federal authorities have not promptly investigated reports of the practice of compulsory labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum working age under the Constitution is 14, except for apprentices, and legal restrictions have been approved to protect working minors under age 18. By law, permission of parents or guardians is required for minors to work, and provision must be made for them to attend school through the primary grades. All minors are barred from night work and from work that constitutes a physical strain. Minors are also prohibited from employment in unhealthy, dangerous, or morally harmful conditions. However, it is estimated that 34 percent of all children between the ages of 10 and 14 are economically active. Many, perhaps most, of these working minors are thought to be working in violation of the law, but accurate statistics are not available. Enforcement of the law is severely limited because of the lack of resources.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Organized labor demonstrated growing political strength by lobbying for and achieving the adoption of significant provisions in the Constitution. A workweek limit was set at 44 hours, pay benefits were expanded, and new protections were established for agricultural and domestic workers. Several of these advances were conditioned on the passage of complementary enabling legislation that proved difficult to enact. In June Congress overturned presidential vetoes of minimum wage and cost of living adjustment measures. Real worker income continued to lag in 1989. It is estimated that some 40 percent of those economically active, including minors, earned no more than the equivalent of one minimum monthly salary of about $80, which is probably not adequate to support a family with only one wage earner.

Brazilian workers also suffer because of the gap between the legal assurance and reality of a safe work environment. Labor Ministry figures indicate that Brazil ranks first worldwide in the number of workplace accidents. According to figures gathered by the Government's Social Security system, 17 workplace-related fatalities occur daily across the country. As these figures measure only those incidents involving covered workers (some 23 million), they undoubtedly understate the problem. (The total work force exceeds 50 million.) There are no reliable statistics available covering the incidence of job-related illness. Unofficial estimates, however, link as much as 80 percent of Social Security system payments to workplace factors.

CHILE

The transition to democracy, begun with the October 5, 1988, plebiscite which denied President Pinochet 8 more years in office, continued with the December 14, 1989, election of a civilian President and Congress. The elections were characterized by international observers as free and fair. The new President and Congress will assume office in March 1990; until then, General Pinochet will remain President, and the military junta will continue to exercise the legislative function. There is a separate judicial branch, but crimes relating to state security continue to be heard in military tribunals. In a plebiscite held July 30, amendments to the 1980 Constitution were approved by 85 percent of those voting.

The uniformed national police, the 28,000-man Carabineros, is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Defense and has primary responsibility for public order and safety, crime control, and border security. The 5,000-man Investigations Police, also under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Defense, is responsible for controlling and investigating serious crime. The National Information Center (CNI), responsible for internal and external intelligence-gathering, is part of the Ministry of the Interior, but the President exercises significant personal control. The majority of this 2,500-man force is composed of military personnel. The 85,000-man armed forces assert a role as the ultimate guarantor of constitutional order and, in keeping with longstanding tradition and under the terms of the current election law, are responsible for ensuring the security of voting places during elections.

Chile's economy is largely based on free market principles and has a dynamic and growing export sector. Copper is Chile's major source of foreign exchange, followed by fresh fruits and fish meal. 1989 marked the sixth consecutive year of positive real economic growth and the fourth consecutive year of annual growth in excess of 5 percent. As a result, real wages have increased and, while unemployment remains high in urban areas, on the whole has decreased. Chile continues to make substantial progress in overcoming its foreign debt problem.

The human rights environment in Chile improved dramatically during 1989, although there were continuing instances of abuses. Freedom from arbitrary arrest continued to be undermined by vaguely defined and far-reaching state security laws. Torture and kidnappings were considerably reduced in comparison to previous years. Twenty-four persons, among them 9 Carabineros, a retired military officer, and a spokesman for the Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR), were killed for political reasons. The absence of any resolution to longstanding cases of serious human rights abuses, among them the 1976 murder in Washington, D.C., of exiled opposition leader Orlando Letelier and his American assistant Ronni Moffitt, continued to concern both Chilean and international human rights organizations.

Restrictions on freedom of speech and press have been greatly reduced in law and have largely disappeared in practice. The Government announced it would no longer accept a Special Rapporteur of the United Nations Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) after the incumbent resigned in April. Delegations from other human rights organizations, such as Amnesty International (AI), Americas Watch, and the International Human Rights Law Group, visited Chile during the year and in some instances were given permission to visit prisons and individual prisoners.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Deaths and injuries resulting from political violence continued during 1989. According to the Vicariate of Solidarity, the human rights organization of the Catholic Church, 24 persons had died in acts of political violence as of December 31. The independent Chilean Human Rights Commission (CHRC) indicated that 30 deaths had occurred due to political violence as of October 30. (For a discussion of the bases of the statistics provided by these two groups, see Section 4). Of the 24 deaths listed by the Vicariate as politically motivated, 10 of the victims were members of the military and security forces. The Lautaro Youth Movement (MJL) took responsibility for ambushing and assassinating nine Carabineros, and the Manuel Rodriguez Patriotic Front (FPMR) killed an army officer during an assault on an army air station in August.

A member of the FPMR unit attacking the air station died in the attempt. Another FPMR member died in September when, officials claim, he activated a grenade following a shoot-out with Carabineros; others claim he was shot. A member of the MIR was killed in August in a failed assassination attempt against a CNI official. A shopkeeper, who may have been mistaken for his twin who worked for the CNI, was killed by presumed members of the MIR in January. A young member of the Communist Party was shot while being pursued by Carabineros for painting slogans on a public wall early in 1989; the police maintain he was killed, and a policeman wounded, by gunshots from a passing car, but the victim's family claim the Carabineros were responsible. In June a former air force officer, who had been charged with human rights abuses but whose case was dismissed because it was covered by the 1978 Amnesty Law, was assassinated by the FPMR.

Jecar Neghme, a spokesman for the political faction of the MIR, was assassinated on September 4 as he walked from his party's headquarters. Although the Minister of Government cited (but did not divulge) evidence suggesting Neghme's death was prompted by differences between the political and armed factions of MIR, most observers believe he was the victim of a rightwing group with ties to the security forces, perhaps in reprisal for the killing of security officials. There is, however, no clear evidence implicating any individual or group.

In July a pregnant woman was shot and killed when Carabineros attempted to disperse a group of demonstrators which had symbolically seized public land. According to government reports, Communist or other leftwing terrorist groups in 1989 caused 5 deaths and 69 personal injuries in attacks which included 273 bombings, one of which occurred across the street from the U.S. Embassy and 6 of which occurred at American-Chilean binational centers. There were 12 attacks, including bombings, of Mormon churches. Rightwing terrorist groups continued to issue threats against journalists, human rights activists, and political figures. In November the car of journalist Monica Gonzalez was bombed and the home of the director of the magazine Analysis was set on fire. Also in November, a cable television station and the offices of Radio Minería were bombed, allegedly by leftist terrorist groups. A special investigator was appointed to investigate these attacks on the media.

In January two Carabineros were charged with killing three persons on June 30, 1986, and another was charged with covering up the crime, known as the "Calle Mamina case." Allegedly, the police had attempted to cast the deaths as suicides during a confrontation. In March, a military investigating judge recommended a finding of guilty against two Carabinero officials in the torture-death of a young student in 1985, and against another official for covering up the crime, calling for a sentence of 6 years for the first two, and 4 for the latter. However, as of December 31, the military judge had not ruled on the matter. In August, the Military Tribunal confirmed the December 1988 manslaughter verdict against an army officer for the 1986 death by burning of Rodrigo Rojas, a young Chilean who had lived in the United States, and the near-fatal burning of his companion, Carmen Gloria Quintana. A suspended sentence of 300 days in jail was also confirmed. Human rights groups, including the Vicariate, denounced the leniency of the sentence.

b. Disappearance

Human rights organizations report that politically motivated kidnappings by private or paramilitary groups continued in 1989, but the number of incidents were lower and the duration of the detentions shorter than in past years. The Vicariate reported 7 kidnappings in Santiago as of December 31, and 4 in other parts of the country as of August 31; the CHRC reported 18 through October 31. Because of the vehicles used and the boldness of the operations, some official complicity is suspected. There were no known arrests or prosecutions in any of these kidnapping cases. Rightwing extremist groups may have been involved in numerous kidnapping threats against persons associated with political opposition organizations, including journalists, judges, political leaders, and human rights activists. Charges continued to surface that members of the security and military forces, not always acting on orders, were involved in some of these groups.

During 1989 there were no reports of persons disappearing following detention by security forces or by persons suspected of being official security agents. Investigations into the last reported case of disappearance, that of five men in September 1987, are inactive and appear to have been suspended.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There was a significant reduction in the use of torture in 1989. The Vicariate reported 24 instances as of December 31, but the figure only covers cases in Santiago; the CHRC reported 48 as of October 31. Agreements concluded in 1987 by the Investigations Police, the CNI, and the Carabineros with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), appear to have reduced the incidence of torture and lesser forms of police brutality. The agreements, which have generally been honored, allow the ICRC to visit anyone detained by the Carabineros and Investigations Police for violations of state security laws. The ICRC is notified immediately when persons are detained for politically motivated crimes and is allowed to visit the detainees after 24 hours of detention and before the detainees are released or brought before the courts. However, the ICRC is not allowed to visit detainees if the prosecutor in the case orders them held for the 10-day periods of isolation provided for under the Antiterrorist Law. Although there were instances when periods of incommunication were extended beyond 10 days, this practice was considerably reduced in 1989. The CNI continued to abide by the 1987 agreement with the ICRC to turn over persons it arrested to the Carabineros or the Investigations Police. One of the constitutional amendments approved in the July 30 plebiscite gave the status of constitutional law to international agreements such as the U.N. and the O.A.S. Conventions on Torture, signed by Chile in 1987 and ratified in September 1988. However, the Government attached reservations which have the effect of denying any international efforts to ensure compliance.

Government officials deny that torture is used or authorized and assert that charges of alleged mistreatment by members of the security forces are always investigated. In May, 10 members of the Investigations Police were indicted for torturing 2 prisoners held for politically motivated crimes, and in June 2 Carabineros were indicted for torturing a suspect in April 1988.

Judicial investigations of torture are seldom concluded, due in large part to the refusal of some state security organizations to comply with court orders to make security agents available to the courts for questioning. Last year's Country Report on Human Rights Practices noted that Judge Rene Garcia Villegas, who had publicly denounced the repeated failure of CNI officials to cooperate with his investigations into torture incidents and who had opined that torture cases investigated by military judges implied impunity for those charged, was suspended for 15 days with half pay. In October 1989, his offices were ransacked and the warning "Be Careful" was scrawled on the window. He has received repeated threats against his life. Early in January 1990, Judge Garcia was rated "unqualified" by the Supreme Court for the second year in a row, forcing his retirement, unless an appeal of the decision is successful. The Supreme Court ruled that Garcia's public statements criticizing the behavior of his judicial colleagues for failing to pursue vigorously charges of torture by security forces violated public norms.

Human rights leaders agree that Carabinero efforts to avoid the use of unnecessary force continued in 1989. Opposition political figures generally agree that Carabinero conduct during legally held political demonstrations has been generally evenhanded; detentions during rallies were relatively few, given the large numbers of participants involved in what was a very active political year, and most of those held were released within 24 hours.

Activities of some Carabineros, however, detracted from that organization's improved image. During a demonstration in July, for example, Carabineros used excessive force in evicting "squatters" in a poor Santiago neighborhood, and in the confusion shot and killed a pregnant woman.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Article 19 of the Constitution, civilian and military courts may order detention for 5 days, and up to 10 days when terrorist acts are alleged to be involved. In some cases involving special military prosecutors, detainees have had their access to lawyers limited even after the prosecutor formally charged them. The ad hoc military prosecutors continued to order arrests of persons suspected of being linked to four cases under their purview: the discovery of arms caches in 1986, the attempted assassination of President Pinochet in 1986, the kidnaping of an army colonel in 1987, and the 1986 assault on a bakery in which a Carabinero official was killed. None of those arrested in these cases has been brought to trial. By January 1990 three of these cases reached the summary stage; in each one the investigating judge sought harsh sentences for those accused. These findings and sentences are preliminary and remain to be confirmed by a military tribunal.

The Vicariate reported 235 individual arrests and 450 group arrests during demonstrations in Santiago through December 31; there were 119 individual and 371 collective arrests in the rest of the country through August 31. The Vicariate reported 833 individual and 2,983 collective arrests in 1988, and 699 individual and 2,596 collective arrests in 1987. The CHRC reported 203 individual arrests and 1,241 collective arrests as of June 30, 1989. Only a small number of those arrested were arraigned before the courts; the vast majority were released without charges, or charged with minor violations and fined.

Many of those detained under Article 19 of the Constitution are never charged and are released after several days. The state security laws often appear to be used to harass opponents of the Government but to a lesser degree than in previous years. Persons are detained for prolonged periods of time while their cases are investigated or released on bail without any formal charge against which they can defend themselves. Four persons associated with the Vicariate are in this position. Moreover, charges are often levied well after the event, heightening the impression of arbitrariness and harassment. For example, five leftist political leaders were charged in May for offenses against the armed forces because of statements made in August 1986 in a private letter to the then Vice Commander of the Army. Because of charges pending against them, several political figures were denied the opportunity to run for Congress.

Once formally charged with, or convicted of, violations of state security laws, the accused are generally imprisoned separately from common criminals and have rights of visitation and communication with their families, friends, legal counsel, and representatives of the ICRC. The ICRC has access to most of those detained under the state security laws after a 5-day period of incommunicado detention.

On August 17, 1988, the Supreme Court sentenced President Manuel Bustos and Vice President Arturo Martinez of the Unified Workers' Central (CUT) to 541 days' internal exile. The action stemmed from a petition by the Ministry of the Interior to overturn an appeals court verdict exonerating the two from charges relating to the deaths of persons in the wake of an October 1987 general strike. Despite pleas from Chilean political leaders, international labor organizations, and others, the Chilean Government held off on granting a pardon until October 23, 1989, when one was issued apparently to forestall an expected visit to Chile on their behalf by Polish Solidarity leader Lech Walesa.

CHILE

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

First instance jurisdiction for the prosecution of proscribed political activities remains with the regular civilian courts, but broad interpretation of state security laws has greatly expanded military court jurisdiction. As in most civil law systems, trial is not by jury, reliance is on the written record rather than oral testimony, and the judge renders a verdict after directing the investigation. The investigation phase is considered secret, with limited access for the accused or his attorney to evidence or testimony which has been developed by the judge. Secrecy makes it extremely difficult to ascertain if justice is being done. There is a well-developed, multistage appeal process leading ultimately to the Supreme Court. Weapons violations (often the basis of charges against suspected terrorists) and charges of "Offenses Against the Armed Forces," including slandering the Commander-in-Chief of the Army (President Pinochet), are tried before a military court. Appeals may be made to a military court consisting of two civilian judges and three military judges and, in the last resort, to the Supreme Court. In March the President of the Supreme Court criticized the number of cases handled in the military judicial system and questioned the impartiality of decisions in a system characterized by a military hierarchy.

Investigation by the courts of present and past human rights violations made little progress during 1989. Human rights organizations continued to charge that judges failed to investigate vigorously charges of government abuses of human rights.

The Social Aid Foundation of the Christian Churches (FASIC) reported that, as of September 30, there were 439 persons in prison facing 613 judicial proceedings related to state security laws. Thirty-seven of these people have been in prison since before 1983, but 138 were detained in 1986 and 1987. Sixty-three were detained in the first 9 months of 1989. Of the 613 judicial proceedings, 476 are before military courts. Another 26 persons were released on bail during 1989, 2 were released after completing their prison terms, 1 was released unconditionally without a trial and 4 were pardoned. Of a total prison population of 439 involved in violations of state security laws, 85 have been convicted and are serving their sentences, while 354 remain in detention with their cases still under investigation. In at least one case, the investigation phase has lasted 8 years. Of four persons charged in the 1984 murder of 2 Carabineros, one, Dogoberto Lopez, was found innocent on February 8; the investigating judge found the other 3 guilty. The sentences still must be confirmed by a military tribunal.

International attention continued to focus during 1989 on nine prisoners who face possible death sentences because of charges of involvement in assassinations of senior military officers and Carabineros and robberies in which people were killed. Defense lawyers have charged that all were tortured and their confessions obtained under physical and psychological duress. Human rights organizations have assisted 111 prisoners, including the 9 facing a possible death sentence, to obtain visas to other countries. This was done in the belief that possession of such visas might either allow these prisoners to seek remission of their prison terms for exile or protect them from the death sentence. While the Government permitted many Chileans serving prison sentences related to politically motivated acts to seek exile in the mid-1970's, this practice has been severely restricted in recent years. One reason given has been that some of those who sought exile later returned to Chile illegally and became involved in terrorist activities. The death penalty can only be imposed by unanimous decision of a military court. No one has been executed by judicial order in Chile for a politically motivated crime under the Pinochet Government.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Searches of the home and interception of private communications are permitted by the Constitution, provided search warrants are issued by either a civilian or military court for specific locations. The 1984 Antiterrorist Law provides for surveillance of those promoting political views contrary to the Constitution or those suspected of terrorist crimes, and for intercepting, opening, or recording private communications and documents in these cases. The requirement for proper court documents to authorize searches and surveillance, however, was not always complied with during the year. Searches were carried out by security forces or by armed groups who failed or refused to show identification or without the necessary court orders. However, the Vicariate noted that during 1989, as in 1988, there were no reported instances of security forces closing off entire neighborhoods in order to conduct searches and that, in general, detentions were more directly connected to specific cases and less sweeping than in the past.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution recognizes freedom of speech and press. Restrictions on those freedoms have been greatly reduced in law and have largely disappeared in practice. Among the constitutional amendments approved in the July 30 plebiscite was the elimination of Article 8, which had provided for sanctions against "persons or groups propagating doctrines undermining the family, espousing violence or a concept of the society, the state, or legal order...contrary to the institutional order of the country." This Article had been applied to media coverage, commentary, or publicity about such groups or doctrines, and its elimination was welcomed as a victory for freedom of speech and press. However, the Military Code providing for sanctions against persons charged with "Offenses Against the Armed Forces" remains in force. In past years, critical editorials, satirical reports, and articles on issues deemed sensitive by the Armed Forces have been cited under this provision. According to the Chilean National Association of Journalists, there were more than 30 charges pending in military courts against 19 of its members in 1989. Most of these cases date from 1985 to 1988. In 1989 only two cases against journalists or media organizations were initiated in the military courts. Additionally, the Interior Ministry requested that a judge investigate possible charges against the editor of a new leftwing magazine, Punto Final for "Offenses Against the President." In another instance, a judge declined to prosecute in a case brought before the civil court by the Government. Military courts also are prosecuting at least five nonjournalists for "Offenses Against the Armed Forces" made in interviews or because of their position as director or owner of an offending medium. Most of these cases were initiated 2 or 3 years ago. Several journalists have received suspended sentences. A lawyer with the Vicariate, indicted for an article he wrote for the Jesuit monthly magazine Mensaje in 1987, was found not guilty in 1989 by a military judge; however, there is a petition before the Supreme Court to have the decision overturned.

Generally, however, informal censorship was no longer in evidence, and self-censorship was no longer as pervasive as in the past. Several books dealing with human rights abuses under the Pinochet administration were published in 1989. Media access for political and other leaders critical of the Government was greatly expanded in 1989, and various opinions on such formerly sensitive issues as human rights violations, the civilian/military relationship, and controversial actions of the Government were widely covered in both print and electronic media. The media extensively covered and commented on the political campaigns and the process of the return to democracy. Candidates for the December 14 elections received generally equitable television exposure, and political personalities representing a wide spectrum were regularly seen on weekly televised political forums. A debate between the two leading presidential candidates, the first of its kind in Chilean history, was aired on October 9. However, the press chief of the government-owned national television was forced to resign after the August 29 telecast of an interview, notable for its objectivity and fair treatment, of the candidate for the center-left coalition.

In October the Government promulgated a law to privatize television channels. A seven-member National Television Council (NTC), appointed for a 6-year term, is authorized to grant and take away licenses and sanction channels. Critics of the measure cited it as an attempt by the Pinochet Government to extend its control over television programming through the 4-year presidential term which begins in March 1990 and to insure that only individuals or entities sympathetic to the Pinochet Government receive licenses. An army lieutenant colonel and a navy captain are among those appointed to the NTC, and it includes no opposition representative. The Television Law can be modified by an absolute majority vote in the new Congress which takes office in March 1990.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There were few restrictions on peaceful demonstrations and association in 1989. Although official permission to hold rallies is no longer technically required, authorities must be notified in writing of planned public events. Several large demonstrations were held during 1989, including May Day labor demonstrations and political rallies. Carabinero crowd-control methods were generally nonconfrontational, although there were occasional clashes when tear gas and water cannon were used, and which resulted in arrests.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for freedom of religion. Although Chile is predominantly Roman Catholic, there are no restrictions on religious practices and no official discrimination against any religious group. A number of Protestant denominations and other groups are active and report full freedom and tolerance, as does the local Jewish community. Religious belief and adherence appear to have no effect on acceptability for government positions. The Mormon Church continued to be a target of leftwing terrorist groups, primarily the MJL; Mormon churches were bombed, but there were no reported injuries.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Chileans are promised full constitutional freedom to move within and to enter and leave their country. However, as noted in Section 1.d., two Chilean labor leaders remained in internal exile until they were pardoned in October. Many exiles presumably choose to remain in their adopted countries for economic and family reasons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The transition from a military junta, which has held power for 16 years, to a democratically elected civilian Government is proceeding in keeping with the terms of the 1980 Constitution. Presidential and congressional elections were held December 14. Over 95 percent of registered voters cast ballots in the fair and orderly elections. The new Government will assume power on March 11, 1990. There is universal suffrage for citizens 18 years of age or over, and over 95 percent of those eligible are registered to vote.

Discussions among government officials and political leaders led to an agreement in April on changes to the 1980 Constitution, for purposes of "perfecting" it (in the view of the officials) and to make it more democratic (in the view of the political leaders). The package of reforms was then submitted to a plebiscite on July 30. Approximately 92 percent of registered voters participated in the peaceful plebiscite, and 85 percent approved the package of reforms. Although critics of the 1980 Constitution contend the reforms were not sufficiently far-reaching, the reforms included provisions to make amendment of the Constitution less burdensome; increased the number of elected Senators, thus diluting the power of appointed Senators; diminished the role of the National Security Council and equalized the number of civilians and military officers within it (it had previously been weighted in favor of the military); and shortened the next presidential term of office to 4 years.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In April the UNHRC Special Rapporteur resigned for health reasons, and the Chilean Government announced it would not accept a replacement. Subsequently, the Special Rapporteur rescinded his resignation yet was refused entry by the Chilean Government. Nonetheless, the Special Rapporteur plans to submit a report.

The Government continued its cooperation with the ICRC, which provided confidential reports to key government ministries on the results of its visits to prisons, as provided for in the agreements signed late in 1986 and early in 1987 with the CNI, the Investigations Police, and the Carabineros. The Government permits visits and investigations by private international human rights groups. The Government accorded them no official status but made no effort to impede the journalists and other international observers of the July plebiscite and the December elections.

The Catholic Church continues to take the lead in defending human rights. It supplies legal counsel to those accused of politically related crimes and to victims of human rights abuses. Its Vicariate of Solidarity monitors the human rights situation throughout Chile, issues factual monthly reports, and protects and defends significant numbers of people. The statistics provided by the Vicariate generally cover cases actually handled by it. An attempt by the Government to secure certain files of the Vicariate was eventually suspended when the Vicariate refused to surrender the documents. The CHRC, a private organization, also continued to publicize abuses. Statistics provided by the CHRC cover violations brought to its attention throughout the country. Because some persons involved in human rights violations may not go to the Vicariate for assistance, the CHRC statistics provide a wider but less first-hand picture of human rights violations.

Minority groups do not suffer from any specific legal discrimination. The only significant racial minority, the Mapuche Indians in southern Chile, remains separated from the rest of society because of historical, cultural, educational, and geographical factors rather than official policy.

Legal distinctions between the sexes still exist, despite a law passed in 1989 to reduce restrictions on women. For example, wives can now retain control over income earned independently from their spouses, although assets held at the time of marriage become community property controlled by the husband; decisions on where to live are to be jointly taken, whereas before a woman was obliged to live where her husband decided. The legal retirement age for women is 5 years lower than that for men. Inheritance laws provide strong protection for wives and favor female over male heirs.

There are no readily available figures on the magnitude of the problem of violence against women, including domestic violence, such as wife beating. Major media outlets rarely cover the issue, and the most prominent human rights groups, including women's organizations, concentrate their attention and resources on other human rights issues. Under the changes in the law which were enacted in 1989, a husband no longer has legal control over a wife's person as well as her goods. This change, at least in theory, should make it easier for women to bring charges of physical abuse against their husbands.

The U.N. Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination was signed by Chile in 1980 and ratified on October 17, 1989. It entered into force on December 29 when the text of the Convention was published in the official gazette.

CHILE

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers in Chile have the right to form and join unions. Approximately 10 percent of the work force is organized. Most aspects of labor rights are codified in 12 laws passed in 1987. The political parties law was amended to permit union (and professional association) leaders to be political party activists, but the prohibition against their simultaneously holding both party and union or association office was maintained.

Legally recognized unions do not need permission to hold union meetings or conferences. Under the law, unions cannot elect as an officer a person who is under indictment. The Labor Code also discourages the development of national union confederations, but labor unions can and do maintain relations with international labor bodies in their fields. The Government selects Chilean worker delegates to participate in the conference of the International Labor Organization (ILO). In 1989, as in prior years, the Government sought to avoid challenges to the credentials of these delegates by consulting with representative trade unions in Chile. However, in selecting delegates to represent the Chilean workers in the ILO, the Government ignored the major de facto umbrella labor organizations, such as the Unified Workers Central (CUT), which the Government does not recognize.

Under the Labor Code there are severe restrictions on the right to strike. Strikes are prohibited in 25 designated strategic enterprises, primarily public utilities, the largest government copper mine, and the petroleum industry. There is no indication that blacklisting of trade union leaders and members who participated in illegal strike actions in past years has ended; however, there was no instance of massive dismissal of workers for striking during 1989. Legal strikes which did take place tended to be brief; there were only three strikes in 1989 which lasted 60 days or longer. After 60 days, striking workers are subject to loss of benefits and jobs.

On January 26, 1988, President Manuel Bustos and Vice President Arturo Martinez of the National Workers Command CNT (which was subsequently subsumed into the CUT) were sentenced to 541 days imprisonment for calling a general and illegal strike on October 7, 1987, in the aftermath of which several people died. An appeals court overturned the conviction. Subsequently, the Minister of the Interior appealed to the Supreme Court to restore the original sentence; on August 17, 1988, the high court imposed a sentence of 541 days of internal exile, a sentence rarely handed down by Chilean courts. Despite widespread national and international appeals for a pardon, the Government had refused to grant one until October 23, 1989, after the two had served 403 days of the sentence. In April 1989, four other CUT officials were charged with the same offense as Bustos and Martinez, calling an illegal strike (to demand, among other things, the release of Bustos and Martinez) which prompted some violence. They had not yet been brought to trial at year's end.

In January the Ministry of Economy ordered the Association of Teachers' President and Vice President to leave office because they had failed to submit, as required by law, a Carabinero certificate stating they had no charges pending against them; both have charges outstanding in connection with their involvement in an allegedly illegal demonstration several years ago. The Ministry of Economy rescinded the order at the end of January, however, and fined them instead. By year's end the Government had not yet responded to petitions from two labor unionists for restoration of their citizenship, which they lost when exiled; several exiled political figures did have their citizenship restored.

Chile has not ratified ILO Conventions 87 on Freedom of Association or 98 on Collective Bargaining.

The cases listed above are among numerous complaints filed against Chile with the ILO by a number of national and international trade union organizations over the past several years. In its most recent interim report (June 1989) on the status of these cases, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) noted that the Government had provided detailed information on most of the allegations, and made recommendations for the resolution of outstanding charges.

In its review of the application of conventions in 1989, the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) reiterated its call for Chile's repeal of provisions of the Constitution and various laws which bar individuals from holding public jobs or offices, or positions in publishing or education by virtue of their membership in or association with organizations which espouse certain prohibited ideologies or political viewpoints. The COE also cited laws which provide for discharge without compensation for activities unrelated to the work place, as incompatible with ILO standards. The Committee also called on the Government to repeal laws which grant broad discretionary power to executives of educational institutions and permit the barring of students and teachers from such institutions for the expressing of political opinions.

Organized labor continued to press during the year for a full investigation of the 1982 murder of labor leader Tucapel Jimenez. Efforts to pursue the investigation continue, but the case remains officially closed. While the Supreme Court dismissed indictments against a political leader and a trade union officer for having slandered the Government in this case, there remained high interest within Chilean and international trade union circles in seeing this case reopened.

On December 24, 1987, after failing to make promised changes in its Labor Code to enhance workers' rights, Chile was formally suspended from the list of countries eligible to participate in the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) Program, and it remained suspended throughout 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

While the rules governing union organizing in firms employing between 25 and 50 workers were eased in 1988, collective bargaining is strictly regulated, and the entire collective bargaining procedure can be nullified if any of a series of legally imposed deadlines are missed by either the union or management. Further, a union does not have the option of delaying the bargaining process in anticipation of a more propitious future bargaining atmosphere. A decision not to negotiate a new contract upon expiration of the former one results in automatically extending the expired contract for a minimum 2-year period. Although Chilean law protects the right for workers to form unions, in practice such laws are not effective, especially in small workplaces.

right for workers to form unions, in practice such laws are not effective, especially in small workplaces.

Despite the restrictions in the Labor Code, there were 1,402 collective bargaining agreements signed in 1988, the latest year for which data are available.

There are no export processing zones or other special districts where different laws apply.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is implicitly prohibited in the Constitution and Labor Code, and there have been no complaints on this issue since the mid-1970's.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Child labor is regulated by law. Young persons aged 14 and 15 may be employed with the permission of their parents or guardians, if they have completed their schooling and then only in restricted types of labor. Those between the ages of 15 and 18 can be employed in a larger variety of labor, and at expanded hours, but only with their parents' or guardians' permission. Enforcement of these regulations in the formal sector is good, but economic factors have forced many children to seek part-time and full-time employment in the informal economy which is generally difficult to regulate.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health standards are regulated by law. The normal workweek is 48 hours. The minimum wage is approximately $70 per month; it is not considered sufficient for a decent standard of living, but many households have two full-time wage earners. The law permits the hiring of apprentices, but pay may not be less than the minimum wage. Laws covering wages and hours of work are difficult to enforce, and there are complaints that occupational health and safety laws are not adequately policed. Workers have the right to denounce employers who pay less than the minimum wage, and employers can be forced to pay back wages, but an employee who brings such a complaint risks losing his job for having done so.

COLOMBIA

Colombia is a constitutional, multiparty democracy. Two parties, the Liberals and the Social Conservatives, have dominated national politics since the mid-19th century, but smaller parties are usually represented in Congress, state assemblies, city councils, and among popularly elected mayors. The Constitution provides for independent legislative and judicial branches of government. In practice, the courts and, to a lesser extent, the Congress provide significant checks on presidential power.

Internal security is the primary responsibility of the Ministry of Defense, which includes the National Police. The Ministry is responsible directly to the President and operates under civilian control. The Department of Administrative Security (DAS), roughly equivalent to the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, reports directly to the President.

Colombia has a mixed economy in which private enterprise plays the dominant role. The coffee industry, which accounts for some 30 percent of the country's legal export earnings, is essentially in the private sector, as are most entities engaged in manufacturing, agriculture, and the service sector. There is also a large informal economy. State enterprises control domestic participation in the oil and coal industries and play an important role in the electrical and telecommunication utilities.

Despite Colombia's strong democratic traditions, it has suffered from social unrest and an extraordinary level of violence for most of the past 40 years. The main causes of the violence and the concomitant human rights abuses are political extremists of both the left and the right, and the enormously wealthy narcotics traffickers, with the latter being the single largest cause in 1989. There have also been significant abuses by individual members of the army and police in responding to violence from these other sources.

The extreme left includes several armed guerrilla groups which use terrorism and narcotics trafficking to achieve their goal of violently overthrowing the democratic Government. The extreme right is composed of disparate elements, including a number of "self-defense" groups which were originally formed by rural landowners to defend against guerrilla attacks and which have degenerated into vigilante squads that assassinate, torture, and massacre people believed to have links with leftist political figures or the guerrillas. In areas where traffickers are powerful, these groups are often allied with the traffickers. The traffickers control enormous illicit enterprises which utilize extreme violence in attempts to bend the Colombian political and judicial systems to their own purposes. The major traffickers have achieved virtual immunity from prosecution by threatening, kidnapping, and murdering judges, government officials, political leaders, and their families. The relationships among the traffickers and between traffickers and rightwing elements or guerrillas are complex.

To cope with the persistently high level of violence and human rights violations, the Government has resorted to extraordinary measures. In August President Barco launched a major offensive against the traffickers and issued constitutionally authorized state of siege decrees providing for confiscation of the property of persons involved in narcotics trafficking and the reimplementing of extradition for fugitive traffickers. The President's September 1988 peace plan led to a reduction in guerrilla-related violence in 1989. Colombia's largest guerrilla group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), announced a unilateral cease-fire in February, and the number of its attacks declined although it has not abandoned violence. The M-19 guerrilla group signed a peace accord with the Government in October, and tentative talks were begun with the FARC and another guerrilla organization.

Human rights abuses violate government policy, and there is no evidence that the Government or senior military officers have ordered such acts; many take place in remote regions without the knowledge of central authorities. Although much more needs to be done, the Government in 1989 continued its efforts to improve the human rights record of its own security forces. It provided training on human rights to about 300 military personnel and, with the assistance of Canada, it trained all village ombudsmen in human rights. Nevertheless, soldiers and policemen have also been involved in assassinations and massacres of suspected leftists, and rural-based local military commanders have sometimes assisted rightwing groups, seeing them as allies against the guerrillas. Some of these same groups have been linked to narcotraffickers. In past years little was done to stop such actions. Military officers have attempted repeatedly to obstruct prosecution of military personnel who committed human rights abuses. In early 1989, however, the armed forces' high command and the police began to dismiss officers and enlisted men believed to be involved in human rights violations, and some of these cases were subsequently being prosecuted in the civilian court system. None of these trials had been concluded by year's end, and violations continued.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Colombia has one of the highest murder rates in the world, and its police and judicial systems lack the resources to investigate and prosecute most of these crimes, making it difficult to separate political and nonpolitical murders. Nevertheless, the figure of 324 confirmed political killings in Colombia from January through August 1989 provided by the Bogota-based group Centro de Investigaciones y Educacion popular (CINEP)--a Jesuit-affiliated social research institution which follows the human rights situation--seems reasonably accurate. This is a significant drop from the 706 political killings recorded by CINEP during the same period in 1988. CINEP labeled an additional 1,069 murders as possible political killings, compared to 1,145 during the same period in 1988. These numbers exclude deaths in combat. Narcotics-related killings increased some 140 percent during this period for a total of 129.

A number of spectacular assassinations in 1989 highlighted the vulnerability of even figures at the highest levels of Colombian politics and government. In the 90-day period beginning May 30, killers hired by the narcotics traffickers murdered a governor, a state police chief, two judges, and, on August 18, Senator Luis Carlos Galan, a leading presidential candidate. The head of the DAS narrowly escaped death on May 30 when a car bomb exploded in a crowded Bogota street as his motorcade passed by during the morning rush hour. Seven persons died in the explosion. On October 17, Hector Jimenez Rodriguez, a judge of the Medellin Superior Court who, as a member of the Court's penal chamber, heard narcotics cases, was shot to death outside his home. On December 5, Criminal Court Judge Bernardo Jaramillo Uribe was also assassinated in Medellin. The self-described "Extraditables" (top traffickers) publicly admitted many such killings.

Narcotics traffickers did not restrict their killings to prominent public figures. They, and groups of bandits and rightwing extremists backed by them, slaughtered hundreds of peasants, minor politicians, and low-level government officials, either because they were suspected of leftist or proguerrilla sympathies or because they had attempted to interfere with the criminal activities of the traffickers. On January 18, near the town of La Rochela, gunmen massacred a team of 12 judicial officials investigating a previous massacre of townspeople which likely had been ordered by traffickers. Narcotics interests are also believed to be responsible for the many deaths resulting from the bombing of an Avianca aircraft on November 27 and certainly were responsible for an explosion at DAS headquarters in Bogota on December 6, which killed 64 and injured over 700

Labor suffers a disproportionately high rate of violence. Many affiliates of the largest workers' confederation, the Unitary Workers Central (CUT), are Communist controlled, and some, like the banana workers unions in Uraba, are controlled by guerrilla groups. Many of their members have been killed by presumed rightwing elements. Trade union leaders of the Democratic Labor Confederation (CTDC) have been threatened and assassinated by guerrillas trying to weaken and intimidate moderate unions. Two gunmen on November 21 murdered Nel Dario Gomez, the secretary of his CUT-affiliated union, who worked in Monteria, Cordoba department, distributing land reform parcels to rural members. Forty-seven union activists were killed during the first 8 months of 1989, according to CINEP figures; it is not clear that all these murders were politically motivated, however.

At least 45 persons associated with the Union Patriotica (UP) party, which was established as the political arm of the FARC, were killed during the first 8 months of 1989, according to CINEP statistics. Most of these murders were probably by extreme rightists, although a few of the assassinated politicians may have been the victims of common crime. Many UP figures assert that the Government is either unwilling or unable to afford them adequate protection. The most notable UP casualty was senior party official Jose Antequera, who was assassinated on March 3 in Bogota's airport. On November 21, Gustavo Castro, a UP activist, was assassinated by unidentified gunmen near Ibaque, Tolima department.

Political killings also affected the ruling Liberal and the opposition Social Conservative Parties. At least 14 elected officials and a much larger number of party activists of these two major groups had been assassinated as of mid-September. Few of these killings have been solved, and the specific motivations for many of these incidents of political violence are often unknown.

Although the gunmen responsible for some of these crimes have been apprehended, those who ordered them almost invariably escape prosecution. Even if a major figure were to be captured, a conviction would be difficult; the judicial system has been paralyzed by intimidation.

The leftist insurgent groups are responsible for a large number of killings which occur outside the scope of armed conflict. The guerrillas frequently kill those who refuse to submit to guerrilla extortion, those who attempt to leave the guerrilla organizations, and persons who are perceived to have helped the Government. In several January incidents, the FARC murdered three fishermen, four cement workers, and five peasants, apparently because they did not support the guerrillas or were suspected of being army informers. The following month, another guerrilla group, the Popular Liberation Army (EPL), killed six peasants who had refused to pay a guerrilla-imposed "tax."

The Government took action in 1989 against the military and police officials who participated in the 1988 massacre of residents of the village of Segovia, Antioquia. Two army officers and one police official were dismissed from service and along with three civilians were turned over to a civilian court to be prosecuted for terrorism. In addition, three more army officers and two police officials were under investigation by the Attorney General's office for human rights abuses.

In October Amnesty International (AI) issued a report on Colombia in which it charged that government security forces were directly responsible for thousands of extrajudicial killings and also suggested that the traffickers and their allies operate with government support. Clearly, Colombia, whose democratic system is under assault by narcotics traffickers and political extremists, has a serious human rights problem. AI's assertion that the high command of the security forces has adopted a deliberate policy of gross human rights violations was rejected as inaccurate and misleading by Colombians with a wide variety of political views as well as by local and international human rights groups. Two other reports issued in late 1989, one by the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights and the other by the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), assert that persons connected to the Government or security forces have links to violence. An Americas Watch (AW) report of April 1989 was "certain" that the Government was not behind any of the killings but was not prepared to absolve the military or political leadership. In any case, AW held the Government indirectly responsible for the murders by failing to fully protect all its citizens.

In 1989 senior military and police officials initiated a campaign to expel officers believed to be cooperating with armed rightwing groups. While never condoning such cooperation, in previous years the highest officials of the Government had not taken effective steps to recognize and stop it. In the first 8 months of 1989, however, 84 officers were dismissed from the armed forces, according to Attorney General Alfonso Gomez Mendez, most of them for association with narcotics traffickers, cooperation with armed rightist groups, and violations of human rights. In one of the most publicized cases, the army high command removed and retired Lieutenant Colonel Luis Bohorquez, the top military commander in the Magdalena Medio region, who was accused of supporting the armed rightwing groups which dominate the region. In April the Government announced the formation of a 1,000-man special police force devoted exclusively to combating rightist groups. Despite the Government's efforts, however, there likely are members of the police and army who continue to participate in extrajudicial killings. Punishment for human rights abuses within the military judicial system seldom extends beyond dismissal from the service. In 1989 the Supreme Court upheld the right of civilian courts to try military personnel in a wide variety of situations. In the immediate future, however, there appears to be little prospect of effective action by judges of the weak civilian judicial system.

b. Disappearance

The number of disappearances in Colombia appears to have declined in 1989. CINEP reported 101 disappearances in the first 8 months of 1989 compared to 192 during the same period in 1988. Most disappearances take place in areas of active guerrilla insurgency as a result of forced recruitment by the guerrillas, flight from such recruitment, executions by either the guerrillas or rightist groups, or common kidnaping. Despite efforts by the security forces to dismiss human rights abusers over the past year, there continue to be reports that individual military and police personnel are also involved in specific disappearances.

Kidnapings by guerrillas and common criminals remained prevalent in 1989. The kidnapings of wealthy persons for ransom is an important source of revenue for the guerrillas, but they also kidnap for political reasons, sometimes executing their victims after mock trials. Reliable statistics on kidnaping are unavailable because friends and relatives often fear that the victim's life will be endangered if his situation is publicized or reported to the authorities.

The Attorney General's Human Rights Office was created by President Barco in 1986 specifically to investigate allegations of disappearances in which government officials are suspected to have been involved. The Human Rights Office receives complaints from the public, and the Attorney General has the power to impose administrative sanctions and recommend dismissal of officials involved in violations of the law, although he cannot bring criminal charges. This is the responsibility of a judge acting on a complaint which may be filed by the person against whom the crime was committed or anyone else who has knowledge of the offense.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law. There are reliable reports, however, that police frequently beat and torture detainees--whether arrested as common criminals or as suspected guerrillas--especially during the first 24 hours of detention. The rightwing groups which operate in the countryside frequently torture their victims cruelly before killing them, as evidenced by the condition in which their bodies have been found. The guerrillas also mistreat their captives. In one early May incident, a guerrilla group tortured and subsequently executed two soldiers captured in the department of Meta. In October the National Liberation Army (ELN) kidnaped and tortured the Bishop of Arauca before murdering him.

COLOMBIA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The right to challenge the legality of detention is generally respected. A person may be arrested if apprehended in the act of committing a crime or if an appropriate order of capture has been issued by a judge. The police must inform a judge of a person's detention within 24 hours. Within a specified time, depending on the circumstances of the case, the judge must decide if there is enough evidence to pursue the case. If there is, he issues an order of detention under which bail is possible, or an order of preventive detention, under which the person is incarcerated until trial. However, there are occasional instances of arbitrary arrest or detention for political purposes, and the police sometimes arrest persons of modest economic means on charges of dubious validity in an effort to extort money for their release.

In response to the wave of apparently narcotics-inspired assassinations which culminated in the August murder of presidential candidate Galan, President Barco issued a state of siege decree which provides for 7 days of incommunicado detention of those suspected of narcotics trafficking. Detainees must then be turned over to the civilian judicial system. In practice, those arrested under the decree are often turned over to a civilian judge or released before the 7 days have expired.

There are no legal provisions for exile. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is independent of the executive and legislative branches of government. The rights of public trial and due process are provided for in the Constitution. Accused persons have the right to representation by counsel; if they do not have an attorney, the court will appoint one. However, due to an overburdened judicial system and a traditional reluctance to grant bail, most prisoners incarcerated for common crimes never come to trial but are simply released after serving the minimum sentence applicable to the crimes alleged. Only about 25 percent of prison inmates have been convicted of crimes. Bail is prohibited during the first 210 days of detention for suspected terrorists arrested under an antiterrorist decree of 1988.

When a narcotics-related case does come to trial, the judicial system is usually so intimidated that it is unable to conduct it impartially. Many magistrates, judges, jurors, and attorneys have been threatened with death, killed, or had family members killed because they were investigating or prosecuting narcotics traffickers or their associates. Following the Galan assassination, the President issued a decree abolishing the easily intimidated three-person juries which had been used in murder cases.

A system of specialized judges to investigate and prosecute narcotics cases has existed since 1987. A system of public order judges was created in August 1987 to investigate and prosecute public order crimes (terrorism, torture, personal injury, narcotics trafficker violence, etc.). In January 1988, the Government established the Tribunal of Public Order as a court of appeal for the above crimes. These officials expedite legal proceedings because they both investigate and prosecute. (Normal legal procedures in Colombia involve separate judges for the investigation and prosecution stages of the judicial process.)

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

A judicial order is constitutionally required for authorities to enter a private home, except in the case of hot pursuit. While Colombian human rights organizations report widespread violations of this requirement in the more remote regions of the country, government forces in urban areas generally respect the sanctity of the home and the right of privacy. Persons from rural areas frequently claim that they have been forced to leave their farms by military counterinsurgency operations, guerrilla conscription and confiscation, and by armed thugs hired by narcotics traffickers and local landowners.

Telephone taps and mail intercepts are normally allowed only under close judicial supervision. Nevertheless, a 1988 state of siege decree allows police to use such measures without judicial authorization if it is deemed necessary to facilitate an investigation into terrorism or related activities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These constitutionally assured rights are respected, and the press often vigorously criticizes the Government and its leaders. The privately owned print media are under no governmental restraints and publish a wide variety of political views, including public calls for the President's resignation. Television frequencies and transmission facilities are controlled by the State, which leases time to private television production companies and imposes some guidelines relating to the coverage of terrorism. Under a 1988 state of siege decree, television and radio programs are prohibited from identifying witnesses to terrorist acts and from broadcasting live transmissions of ongoing terrorist incidents. During a crisis, the Government reserves the right to prohibit the broadcast media from covering certain news events. This right was not exercised in 1989. All significant candidates for public office generally receive unbiased coverage on television and radio newscasts.

The most serious threat to freedom of expression comes from the narcotics traffickers, who both threaten and kill journalists and others who publicly support extradition or strong antinarcotics measures. In September a truck bomb severely damaged the offices of the Bogota daily El Espectador, which has long been a vigorous critic of the traffickers. Later that month Guillermo Gomez Murillo, a correspondent for the newspaper, was assassinated in his home. Gomez was one of more than a dozen journalists who have been assassinated in recent years, most of them by trafficker-affiliated rightwing extremists. In mid-October a car bomb almost completely destroyed the offices of La Vanguardia Liberal, the principal newspaper of the eastern city of Bucaramanga. Narcotics interests have threatened advertisers in the press as another part of their effort to halt the press campaign against them.

COLOMBIA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly is respected. Public meetings and demonstrations are normally held without interference. Under the state of siege, prior permission is required for demonstrations and is usually granted, except when the Government believes there is a clear and imminent danger to public order. Following the August murder of Luis Carlos Galan, which was followed by a wave of terrorist actions directed by the narcotics traffickers, the mayor of Bogota temporarily banned all demonstrations in the city.

Colombians have the constitutional right to form political parties, trade associations, unions, clubs, or groups of any type which do not advocate violence. Theoretically, the Government can deny legal status to newly formed groups, but this power is almost never used. Any organization is free to associate with international bodies in its field.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for freedom of religion. According to official statistics, 217 different religious sects are registered in Colombia. Although the predominant position of the Catholic Church is established by a treaty between the Government and the Vatican, and the overwhelming majority of Colombians are Catholic, no legal discrimination exists against any religious group, and there is little or no religious discrimination in practice.

The Government permits proselytizing among Indians as long as the Indians welcome the missionaries and are not induced to adapt changes that inhibit their survival on traditional lands. The Government requires all missionary groups (both Catholic and non-Catholic) to keep it informed of their activities and expects them to respond to guidance.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens are free to travel domestically and to leave and return to Colombia. In traveling through areas where operations against rural guerrillas are under way, civilians require safe conduct passes from the military; guerrillas reportedly use a similar means to restrict travel in areas under their control. There are no restrictions on emigration. Colombians who have sought and been granted diplomatic asylum in foreign embassies have always been allowed to depart the country. Expatriates can, by law, repatriate. Colombia uses accepted United Nations standards to determine the status of refugee and asylum seekers and does not turn away those who qualify.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Colombia has a democratic system of government, and elections have been conducted fairly and openly for the past 30 years. Persons are enfranchised by the Constitution at age 18. Public employees are forbidden by law to participate in political campaigns but, with the exception of military personnel, may vote.

COLOMBIA

Colombian politics are dominated by the Liberal and the Social Conservative Parties. Both include elements with widely divergent political views. All parties operate freely without government interference. The UP, which participated in national elections for the first time in 1986, is the third strongest party. It received 3.1 percent of the total vote cast in city council elections in 1986, and less than 1 percent of the vote in the 1988 mayoral elections. Elections will be held in 1990 for the presidency, the Congress, and local offices.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Colombia is sensitive to its human rights image abroad and cooperates with investigations by international and nongovernmental human rights groups based abroad. AW's factfinding missions which visited Colombia in December 1988 and in February 1989 were able to interview a number of government officials. WOLA also cited interviews with government and party officials in its 1989 report on Colombia.

The two most respected human rights organizations within Colombia are CINEP and the Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights. Information compiled by these groups has been used extensively by international organizations such as AI, AW, and WOLA. CINEP, the Permanent Committee, universities, and other groups regularly sponsor conferences to analyze violence in Colombia. Colombia is an active participant in international and regional human rights bodies.

The law provides women equal civil and property rights. Women comprise just over 25 percent of the country's economically active population. Women are legally entitled to remuneration equal to that of their male counterparts, a law generally respected more by the Government than private industry. Forty percent of the university population is female.

Violence directed against women appears to be disturbingly common, especially in the countryside and in lower income strata in the cities, but a lack of reliable statistical data makes it impossible to gauge its true extent. Victims of domestic violence such as wife beating often are reluctant to file reports or to press charges, thus leading to the likelihood that such abuse is significantly underreported. There is a code of family law to protect the interests of mothers and children, and women who are the victims of domestic violence can bring charges brought against their assailants. The Government does not condone such abuse. Domestic violence, however, is not treated as a serious crime in Colombia.

There are women's associations active in Colombia which work for the rights of women in the workplace, in the home, and in public life. Through the Colombian Institute of Family Welfare, the Government provides education in domestic relations and personal behavior, primarily to families in lower income levels. Churches are also active in this domestic education of their parishioners. Because the judicial system in Colombia is weak, the police and courts are no more effective in enforcing laws relating to the treatment of women than they are in enforcing other parts of the law.

Several million black Colombians comprise the country's largest racial minority. They enjoy the full legal rights of all other citizens.

Colombian Indians also legally enjoy all the rights and privileges of full citizenship. Nevertheless, Indian rights groups protest that they suffer a variety of abuses, and they are seeking to promote improvements through community action, public education, and legal aid. Their most common complaint continues to be that Indians are forced off contested land by armed thugs hired by landowners. When the Indians retaliate, the landowners call on local police and military forces for protection. There were no incidents of this nature reported in 1989. In an effort to protect Indian culture, the Government in 1989 designated certain land in southern Colombia for the use of the Indians.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of workers to organize labor unions and to strike is recognized specifically in the Constitution, although public service unions may not strike. Law 26 of 1976 affirms the autonomy of labor organizations to produce their own statutes and rules, to elect trade union officials, and to administer their own activities. Law 26 also prohibits the dissolution or suppression of trade unions by administrative fiat and allows the almost automatic granting of official status to labor organizations which have the requisite number of members.

While the right to strike is guaranteed, the steps required before a legal strike may be called include direct negotiations, followed by conciliation, and only then may the problem advance to the stage of either a strike or arbitration by the Ministry of Labor. Arbitration is compulsory in the public service sector and for official employees who legally do not have the right to strike. In the private sector the Minister of Labor may intervene in a dispute at the stage of conciliation and when it affects the national economy.

Almost half of the country's 1.2 million unionized workers belong to the CUT, formed in 1986. Although the CUT is not officially a member of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions, it is heavily influenced by an element that has retained strong links to the international Communist labor movement. The rest of Colombia's organized workers belong to three long established confederations, two of which are affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the third with the World Confederation of Labor.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) expressed deep concern at the violent situation in Colombia which creates hardship for the population and prevents the exercise of union activities. The COE also cited a number of provisions in the labor law which it said were incompatible with Convention 87 because they allowed the Government to interfere with the internal administration of unions and inhibit the right of unions to further and defend the interests of their members. The COE asked the Government to make the necessary modifications in the legislation.

At its May-June 1989 session, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) expressed its deep concern over the large number of trade union leaders and members who had been murdered or had disappeared since 1986. The Committee recalled that it had considered allegations concerning the murder or disappearance of more than 200 trade unionists at its November 1988 meeting and that, since that time, complaints of an additional 46 murders and one disappearance of trade unionists had been received. The CFA noted important government measures to fight the death squads and hired assassins but regretted that there was no indication of steps taken to strengthen the judiciary.

The CFA's May-June 1989 session also considered a complaint filed by several Colombian and international trade union organizations alleging that the Government violated Convention 87 on Freedom of Association by arresting four trade union leaders and 80 workers, searching and closing the trade union premises, and arbitrarily discharging 50 trade union officials and 350 workers because they had engaged in a strike for wage increases. The Government contended that its actions were based on common crimes and sabotage committed by the workers and their union, which resulted in the cutoff of electric power throughout the country for a 24-hour period. The Government alleged further that the actions of the union had a political motivation relating to a coup attempt which occurred at the same time. The CFA asked the Government to provide information on the charges against the detained unionists and workers, and to reply to the allegations of arbitrary discharge.

The observations of the two committees were the subject of a "special paragraph" in the 1989 report of the ILO Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CACR), urging the Government to take the necessary steps to bring its law and practice into line with ILO Conventions and guarantee the safety of trade unionists.

(See Section 1.a. for a discussion of violence directed against unions.)

b. The Right To Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right of workers to organize labor unions and to engage in collective bargaining enjoys constitutional protection. At the present time, unions have been successful in organizing only the largest firms and the public services, which include from 9 to 11 percent of Colombia's economically active population.

In the private sector, workers have the right to bargain collectively; however, because of high unemployment, they have limited bargaining power. The use of strikebreakers is prohibited by law, and generous severance benefits tend to discourage management from firing union militants. However, this provision, like other provisions of labor law, is effectively ignored by small and medium-size enterprises.

Colombian labor law is applied uniformly throughout the country, including the export processing zones.

COLOMBIA

The COE report cited above also urged the Government to take steps to provide public employees the right to bargain collectively, and to protect them from antiunion discrimination in accordance with Convention 98 on Organizing and Collective Bargaining.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is legally prohibited, and the prohibition is respected in practice. The COE report, cited above, requested the Government to bring certain provisions of law relating to prison labor into conformance with ILO Convention 29 on Forced Labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The law prohibits the employment of children in most jobs before the age of 14, particularly where such employment might interfere with schooling. This provision is respected in larger enterprises and major cities. However, the extensive informal economy is effectively outside government control. Approximately 2.5 million children under 15 years of age work in the informal sector for low pay under poor conditions with little protection from the labor code, according to a 1987 study.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Government annually sets a national minimum wage which serves as an important benchmark for wage bargaining. The minimum wage (about $100 per month as of December 1989) is insufficient to maintain an acceptable standard of living. One report noted that 60 percent of the work force is paid the minimum wage or less.

The labor code regulates the hours of labor and other work conditions. While the 8-hour day is standard in larger companies, the workweek for most Colombians generally exceeds 40 hours. A standard week of five 8-hour days remains an important long-term goal of Colombian trade unions.

Workers' occupational safety and health are extensively regulated, including the use of protective clothing and ventilation, first aid and fire fighting equipment at the job site, sanitary facilities and potable water, and compensation for injuries. These regulations apply to the larger agricultural enterprises as well as industry and mining. However, exemptions for small companies, the frequent use of workers as subcontractors rather than employees, and general enforcement difficulties leave large numbers of workers outside the protection of the law. The Government is endeavoring to improve regulatory enforcement, and improved working conditions are a priority goal of trade unions. Violations appear to be more frequent among the newer, smaller industries. More than half of all the violators are concentrated in the commercial sector and in the restaurant and hotel industries, while almost one-fourth are in the manufacturing sector. Labor regulations most frequently violated by management are mandatory affiliation of workers to the Social Security Institute, observance of minimum salary levels, timely payment of salaries, and maintenance of hygienic conditions and occupational safety standards.

COSTA RICA

Costa Rica is a 100-year old democracy with separate executive, legislative and judicial branches. Elections for president, two vice presidents, and 57 deputies to a unicameral legislative assembly are held every 4 years and have been free and fair. Oscar Arias won the presidency in February 1986 in an election in which approximately 80 percent of all eligible voters participated. New elections will take place in February 1990. The President is constitutionally barred for life from reelection. Members of the Legislative Assembly may be reelected but only after at least one term out of office.

The 1949 Constitution abolished Costa Rica's standing army. The country's small security forces consist of the Civil Guard, the Crime Prevention Unit, the Directorate of Intelligence and Security, the Narcotics Control Unit of the Ministry of Public Security, and the Rural Guard of the Ministry of Government. The Judicial Police, charged with investigating crimes, report directly to the Supreme Court. These public security organizations observe the procedural safeguards established by the law and Constitution and are subject to the strict control of the civilian Government.

Significant agricultural and light industrial sectors lead the Costa Rican economy. The steady economic growth of recent years continued during 1989 at a projected rate of 3.6 percent. Private enterprise accounts for 70 percent of the gross national product. The right to hold private property is protected by the Constitution, although delay in compensating foreign and Costa Rican citizens for expropriated properties has been a problem in recent years. Properties are expropriated for incorporation into nature protection reserve areas or are based on legal claims of Indians.

During 1989 the Arias administration continued to demonstrate a strong commitment to the longstanding Costa Rican tradition of respect for human rights. There were, however, some problems of de facto, though not de jure, discrimination against women, blacks, and Indians.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The Government does not practice, abet, or condone political killing, and none was reported.

b. Disappearance

There were no known or reported incidents of politically motivated abductions or secret arrests.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits cruel or degrading treatment and holds invalid any statement obtained through violence. These prohibitions are respected in practice. Prisoners generally receive humane treatment in Costa Rica. The press, however, occasionally reports incidents of alleged police mistreatment of prisoners. In 1989, for example, the press reported allegations by two men that they had been imprisoned and tortured in the basement of the Judicial Police (OIJ) building. However, their accusations were dismissed after a thorough investigation by the Judicial Inspections Department. Charges of mistreatment of prisoners in 14 other cases are still under investigation.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Warrants are required for arrests, and an arraignment must take place within 24 hours of arrest. Article 48 of the Constitution entitles detained persons to a judicial determination of the legality of the detention. These rights are generally respected, although there are frequent reports of detainees remaining in custody long periods awaiting trial. Costa Rica has separate pretrial detention for major offenses, such as narcotics trafficking, and this detention can last for months.

The right to bail is provided for in law and observed in practice. Bail is sometimes denied to repeat offenders, however, and is usually denied to foreigners on the assumption that they would leave the country before coming to trial. A 1988 drug law, upheld by the Supreme Court, allows denial of bail to accused drug offenders. Detainees may be routinely held incommunicado for 48 hours after arrest and for up to 10 days with authorization of judicial authorities. The judiciary is generally effective in ensuring that legal and constitutional safeguards are observed.

The Constitution bars exile as punishment. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is widely recognized as independent and fair. The Supreme Court, the final court of appeal, supervises the work of the lower courts. Its 24 magistrates are elected for 8-year terms. Accused persons may select their own attorneys; access to counsel is guaranteed and honored in practice. The State provides legal counsel for those who cannot afford an attorney.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no reported instances during 1989 of extralegal invasions of privacy conducted by, or with the knowledge of, the Government. Warrants are required to search private homes.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution specifically provides for freedom of speech and press. These freedoms are generally respected in practice. Nine private newspapers (including two Communist weeklies), six private television stations, and several radio stations pursue independent editorial policies. The media freely criticize the Government, and there is no evidence of self-censorship or intimidation.

Foreign journalists challenged a law requiring the accreditation of journalists by the government-sponsored Costa Rican National Journalists Association; the Inter-American

COSTA RICA

Court of Human Rights declared in 1985 in an advisory opinion that the law is incompatible with the freedom of information provisions of the Inter-American Human Rights Convention. The Minister of Information in 1988 recommended formally that the Government remedy this perceived restriction of freedom of the press, but in October 1988 President Arias came out in favor of the journalists' accreditation law in a speech to the Costa Rican National Journalists Association. To date, the law requiring the accreditation of Costa Rican and foreign journalists has not been revised. A Costa Rican newsman was convicted in 1989 by a criminal court for engaging in journalism without a license.

In what some charged was a violation of the freedom of expression, the censor's office banned the film "The Last Temptation of Christ" early in 1989. In June the Law Students' Association of the University Costa Rica denounced the ban before the Attorney General for Human Rights. At year's end, the Censorship Tribunal of the Ministry of Justice was awaiting the Attorney General's decision before issuing its own opinion.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Constitutional provisions of freedom of assembly and association are fully respected. Permits are not required for public meetings. Authorization is needed only for parades or similar large-scale gatherings.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution and observed in practice. While Roman Catholicism is the official state religion, Costa Ricans affiliated with a wide range of religious groups participate without prejudice in social and political life. The Constitution stipulates that the President must be a layman. There are no restrictions on religious activity, and foreign missionaries and clergy of all denominations work and proselytize freely.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no unusual restrictions on travel within the country or abroad, and both citizens and foreigners are free to live anywhere within the national boundaries. Neither emigration nor a citizen's right of return is restricted. Costa Rica supports multinational refugee programs and has accepted many refugees from Central and South America, although the continuing influx of Nicaraguan refugees has provoked government expressions of concern over strains on the economy and social fabric. During 1989, there were two instances of border officials forcing Nicaraguans entering Costa Rica to return to Nicaragua without allowing them to be interviewed by the proper authorities (immigration officials and office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees) to determine if they were in fact political refugees. In July 111 Nicaraguans and in August 10 Nicaraguans were turned away at the border. The Constitution specifically prohibits the Government from repatriating any foreigner who may be subject to political persecution in his own country, and political asylum traditionally has been granted to exiled dissidents of various political orientations.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Costa Rica is a democracy in which citizens choose their government through free, open, and competitive elections. The integrity of elections is ensured by the independent Supreme Electoral Tribunal, and election results are respected. The Legislative Assembly can and does reject executive branch initiatives. Citizens can and do petition their elected representatives for legislative redress and assistance with government bureaucracies. The ruling National Liberation Party and the opposition Social Christian Unity Party control 29 and 25 seats, respectively, in the 57-member Legislative Assembly. Two rival Communist parties, which freely participate in the political process, each hold one seat. An independent provincial party holds the remaining seat.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

A 1984 Executive Order created the Ombudsman for Human Rights, under the Attorney General's office. Called the Defensoria Para Derechos Humanos, it hears complaints from individuals. There is also a similar office for complaints concerning the penitentiary system.

Costa Rica has traditionally been a strong supporter of international and private human rights organizations. The Inter-American Institute of Human Rights maintains its headquarters in San Jose. The Government has invited the Inter-American Human Rights Commission to visit the country whenever it wishes. Three nongovernmental groups monitor and report on human rights matters in Costa Rica: the Costa Rican Commission for Human Rights, the Commission for the Defense of Human Rights in Central America and the Family and Friends of Political Prisoners of Costa Rica.

Costa Rica's population includes some 26,000 Indians, most of whom live in traditional communities on 21 reserves which, in part because of their remote location, often lack access to schools, health care, electricity, and potable water. The Government is attempting to improve the quality of basic services in the Indian communities. Indians participate in the management of their own affairs through the National Indian Commission. Indian leaders continue to urge the Government to devote more resources to improving the welfare of the indigenous population.

The role of women, although still primarily domestic, is legally unrestricted. Women and men generally are paid equally for equal work. A law designed to supplement existing legislation against sex discrimination was introduced in the Legislative Assembly in August 1988, but it was not enacted. Physical abuse of women is prohibited by law but does occur. When reported, cases of physical abuse of women, including domestic violence, such as wife beating, are prosecuted and often result in stringent penalties, usually prison terms determined by the gravity of the crime. Abuse of female minors is considered aggravated assault. Neither the Government nor Costa Rican society tolerates violence against women. The Costa Rican press has reported a recent increase in the number of violent crimes against women and these reports have increased the awareness of Costa Ricans to the problem. There are a number of women advocacy groups in the country with various degrees of effectiveness. These groups monitor official and unofficial reports of abuse and provide counseling.

Costa Rica's population of 30,000 blacks, who reside largely on the Caribbean coast, enjoys full rights of citizenship as well as other rights and protections, including laws against all forms of racial discrimination. However, prejudice toward blacks and Indians, generally covert, still exists in some elements of the population. The Caribbean coast, with its large black minority population, suffers from a lower level of development than San Jose and the Central Valley. The consequent high unemployment in the region has resulted in labor and racial tensions.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Costa Rica has ratified International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. Approximately 15 percent of the work force is organized, and there are several different trade union centrals in Costa Rica. Unions are independent of government control and are free to maintain relations with recognized international bodies such as the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO), the ICFTU, and other trade union organizations contend that the Solidarismo movement in the country, an alternative to traditional trade unionism, is an employer inspired and dominated "company union", supported by the Government as an alternative to independent trade unions. Leaders of the Solidarismo movement claim that it is a legitimate form of employee organization, and that Solidarismo organizations and their officials are prohibited by law from engaging in antitrade union activities.

At the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) Conference in Geneva in June 1989, the ICFTU filed a formal complaint against the Government of Costa Rica, alleging that it supports the Solidarismo movement in violation of Convention 87. At its November 1989 meeting, the CFA noted that the Government had not supplied information requested by the Committee and adjourned consideration of the case until its next meeting in February 1990.

When labor disputes arise within the San Jose metropolitan area, the presiding judge of the Labor Tribunal attempts to negotiate a settlement. Labor inspectors from the Ministry of Labor handle disputes outside the capital. If conciliation fails, the case is referred to a labor court, which decides the legality of the strike. Unions have complained that this process is complicated, time-consuming, and often fruitless. Public sector strikes are illegal but occur with some frequency.

Strikes and labor unrest were at higher levels in 1989 than in the past year. Two of the most significant strikes were a doctors' strike and a general strike in the port city of

Limon. In the former, the strike was declared illegal, but an agreement was reached under which no reprisals were to be taken against strike participants. In the latter, the strike was also declared illegal, but an agreement was reached with the Government providing for the lifting of the strike and subsequent negotiations, and for affected employers to decide individually whether or not to withhold the salaries of striking workers.

At its 1989 meeting, the ILO Committee of Experts (COE), recalling its previous complaints about the broad strike prohibitions in Costa Rican law, noted that provisions in the pending revision of the law are still too broad. The COE called on the Government to bring the latter provisions into conformance and enact the new law.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Costa Rica has ratified ILO Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining. The right to organize is provided for in the Constitution. The commitments are observed in practice. However, there have been some allegations that the Government is unresponsive to charges of antiunion discrimination in the private sector.

In spite of guarantees in the 1943 labor code, many labor leaders claim that the statute is outdated and unjust. They cite in particular a clause which permits employers to fire workers for "any other grave fault" not specified elsewhere in the code as a mechanism used by management to fire would-be labor organizers. To date, this code has not been revised, although the Government has attempted to negotiate a mutually acceptable revision with representatives of both management and labor. In the report of its 1989 meeting, the COE noted that the pending revision of the labor code includes provisions providing for nondiscrimination and nonintervention vis-a-vis unions suggested by the ILO in 1981. The COE urged early enactment of the new code.

Labor regulations in Costa Rica's nine export processing zones do not differ from the rest of the economy, either in law or in practice.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and there are no known instances of either.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Constitution provides for special employment protection for women and minors and establishes the minimum working age at 12 years, with special regulations in force for workers under 15. The government child welfare agency, in cooperation with the Labor Ministry, is responsible for the enforcement of these provisions. Regulations concerning the employment of children are effectively enforced by the responsible government agencies.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Constitution defines the normal hours of the workday, remuneration of overtime, days of rest, and annual vacation rights. It specifies compensation for discharge without due cause, and the right to a minimum wage.

A national wage board, composed of three members each from government, management, and labor, sets minimum wages and salaries for all sectors. While violations sometimes occur, these wage and salary levels are generally respected. The minimum wage ranges from $156 to $391 per month, depending on occupational field. Workers at the low end of this wage scale often find it difficult to maintain a minimally decent standard of living. The minimum protection wage, which is set as the bare minimum a worker may receive, is currently $5.20 per day.

Normal work hours are set at 8 hours for daytime and 6 hours for nighttime work, with weekly totals of 48 and 36 hours respectively. Ten-hour days are permitted for work not considered unhealthful or dangerous, but weekly totals may not exceed 48 hours. Nonagricultural workers receive an overtime premium of 50 percent of regular wages for work performed in excess of the daily work shift. Agricultural workers are not paid overtime if they voluntarily work beyond their normal hours.

A 1967 law governs health and safety at the workplace. This law requires that industrial, agricultural, and commercial firms with 10 or more workers must establish a management-labor committee. The law allows the Government to inspect workplaces and to fine employers for violations. However, there are too few labor inspectors, especially outside of San Jose, to ensure that minimum conditions of safety and sanitation are maintained.

CUBA

Cuba is a totalitarian state dominated by a single person, Fidel Castro, who is Chief of State, head of Government, leader of the Communist Party, and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. With support from a few long-time associates, President Castro exercises control over nearly all aspects of Cuban life through a network of directorates ultimately responsible to him through the Communist Party. The party is the only legal political entity and is headed by a self-perpetuating elite. All government positions, including judicial offices, are controlled by the party. Elections are held only to endorse party-approved candidates; there was one isolated exception in 1989 (see Section 3). Though not a formal requirement, party membership is a de facto prerequisite for high-level official positions and professional advancement in most areas.

The Ministry of Interior (MININT) is the principal organ of repression and of totalitarian control. It operates border and police forces, orchestrates public demonstrations, determines the legality of associations, investigates evidence of nonconformity, regulates migration, and maintains pervasive vigilance through a series of mass organizations and informers. The Ministry underwent structural reorganization in 1989 and is now under de facto control of the Revolutionary Armed Forces (FAR). The mass organizations attempt to extend government and Communist Party control over each citizen's daily activities at home, work, and school. Citizens are exhorted to ensure ideological conformity and to report deviation.

The Cuban economy is highly centralized and managed by a group of advisors close to President Castro. The Government controls the means of production and is virtually the country's sole employer. In the late 1970's, Cuba began to use market mechanisms, but in 1986 the Government reversed course and began the ongoing "rectification of errors" campaign. It sought to stamp out an emerging informal private sector while promoting antimaterialist "socialist morality." The abandonment of the liberalization program in favor of more orthodox Communist policies has played a major role in the Cuban economy's recent stagnation. In 1989 this campaign of Marxist economic orthodoxy caused sharp conflicts with Cuba's reform-minded socialist trading partners.

Cubans do not possess equal protection under the law, the right to freely choose government representatives, freedom of expression, freedom of peaceful assembly and association, or freedom to travel to and from Cuba without restriction. There is no independent judiciary, due process safeguards can be and are constitutionally circumvented, and defense attorneys face severe disadvantages under the judicial system. Aside from the churches, which themselves are monitored by the party, there is virtually no institutional autonomy in Cuban society. All media are Government-owned and remain under tight control, and the practice of religion continues to be discouraged. Government efforts to monopolize control over many aspects of life remain very intrusive.

The human rights situation in 1989 worsened significantly from the previous year. The Government stepped up repression in marked contrast to the limited relaxation effected in 1988. During the year the Government cracked down on human rights groups, executed four uniformed officers without a fair trial, and denied internationally recognized human rights monitors permission to attend a trial of three human rights leaders. Efforts by the United Nations Secretary General to implement a U.N. Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) resolution to follow up on reported abuses in Cuba had by year's end produced little response from the Cuban Government. The only positive carryovers from 1988 into 1989 included continued releases of political prisoners, permission for the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to again interview political prisoners, and the slight expansion of the 1988 exceptions granted to the churches.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

FAR General Arnaldo Ochoa, MININT Colonel Antonio De la Guardia, MININT Major Amado Padron, and FAR Captain Jorge Martinez were executed by firing squad on July 13 following a show trial (see Section 1.e.). Although the full story behind the Ochoa/De la Guardia case is still unclear, there are circumstantial indications that political motivation may have played a part in making Ochoa the key figure in the case and in sentencing him and three others to death.

Although not politically motivated, there have been some reports of police officers engaging in unjustified use of lethal force. In one such example, police investigating a petty theft killed a Havana youth, Elisco Canada Coffiguez, in June, and in another Julian Cela Cuellar was reportedly shot to death in Havana on July 8, for allegedly verbally abusing an arresting officer who was breaking up a street fight.

b. Disappearance

There were no credible reports of politically motivated disappearances in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Reliable reports of prisoner abuse and beatings rose in 1989, with a severity in some cases amounting to torture. There was no indication that Cuban authorities undertook investigations or disciplinary actions in response to charges of such abuse. Punishment cells remain in regular use for disciplining inmates, in violation of international norms. Rodolfo Frometa and Angel Donato Martinez, two "nuevos plantados" (new prisoners who refuse prison "reeducation"), reportedly were held incommunicado in punishment cells in Combinado del Este Penitentiary for more than 1 year from 1988 to 1989. In January there were multiple allegations that guards had beaten and placed in isolation cells several prisoners in Combinado del Este during a protest by the so-called lancheros (persons arrested for illegal attempts to leave the country).

Cuban Human Rights Party activist David Moya was severely beaten in a Pinar del Rio prison for organizing protests against prisoner mistreatment, according to the Cuban Human Rights Party and his own reports smuggled out in August. The beating and use of electric prods on 11 Combinado del Este inmates in December 1988 reportedly resulted in two prisoners being treated for cranial fractures. The prisoners were protesting the removal of a political prisoner to a prison for common criminals. In March and August, dozens of Combinado del Este inmates engaged in hunger strikes and smuggled out written denunciations of the conditions of their confinement; these protests reportedly resulted in several severe beatings and frequent confinement in punishment cells.

Several charges of confinement of political prisoners in psychiatric hospitals were reported in 1989. Four dissidents were confined in psychiatric hospitals, ostensibly for evaluation, for periods ranging from a few days to several weeks. None of the four reported mistreatment during their hospital stays. One, Julio Soto Angurel, leader of the Jose Marti Council of Independent Defenders of Human Rights and National Reconciliation, remained at year's end in the Havana Psychiatric Hospital, where he was confined after his arrest on October 8.

Following his release in 1989, Cuban Human Rights Committee member Jesus Leyva Guerra reported that security police detained him in July 1988 and then transferred him to the prison ward of the Gustavo Machin Psychiatric Hospital in Santiago de Cuba. Leyva said he was forced to undergo psychiatric "treatment" and, after he began a hunger strike, was subjected to electroshock six times.

With a sharp drop-off in the number of outside groups permitted to visit Cuban prisons in 1989, it was far more difficult to appraise current conditions. Physical improvements in prison conditions, such as in ventilation and sanitation, that were made in 1988 before visits by international human rights groups, apparently were largely maintained but not expanded during 1989. Local human rights monitors assert that punishment cells in provincial jails featured harsher conditions of confinement.

Political prisoners released in 1989 claimed that, while conditions remained the same for those incarcerated for political offenses, mistreatment of common prisoners increased during the year. There were reports of beatings of prisoners incarcerated for attempting to leave Cuba without government permission. These prisoners, who are treated as common criminals, were protesting the Government's refusal to recognize them as political prisoners. Reports smuggled out of the prisons indicate, however, that political reeducation of prisoners has become essentially voluntary since 1988; therefore, prisoner protests have largely centered on general prison conditions.

Local human rights monitors reported a notable rise in incidents of alleged police brutality by arresting officers, often in situations involving minor offenses. These included the shooting of Edel Guerrero Licea and Hidelberto Figuerado in Palma Soriano at a religious festival in December 1988, the August 16 shooting of Iran Sanchez Hernandez (who was attempting an illegal departure from the island), and the shootings of a Havana youth for "resisting arrest," and a 16-year-old after a traffic infraction. In none of these cases has there been any indication that any police official was investigated or punished for such actions. Two other incidents ended in death (see Section 1.a.).

CUBA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Article 245 of the Cuban Law of Penal Procedure requires police to file formal charges and either to release a detainee or place him at the disposition of a prosecutor within 96 hours. Authorities are also required to provide suspects with a defense attorney within 10 days of arrest. Despite some signs that authorities were more concerned to follow legal forms, Cuban procedural rights related to arrest continue to be widely denied. Article 61 of the Constitution permits denial of all recognized civil liberties in the case of anyone actively opposing the "decision of the Cuban people to build socialism." This article is implicitly invoked by Cuban authorities who, in the past, justified lengthy detentions of dissidents by characterizing them as "counterrevolutionary elements."

Arbitrary arrests and prolonged detentions without trial of dissidents increased in late 1988 and continued through 1989. At least 18 such arrests, followed by prolonged detentions, of dissidents took place in the weeks following the September 1988 UNHRC visit. Since then, a total of approximately 50 dissidents have been subjected to punitive actions ranging from threats, harassment, and beatings to detentions and imprisonment. Cuban authorities used brief detentions ranging from several hours to several days to intimidate dissidents without formally charging them.

For example, seven members of the Free Art Association (APAL) were detained for months before being charged and brought to trial in September 1989. Lazaro Cabrera Puente, Pablo Pupo Sanchez, Juan Garcia Cruz, Gilberto Plasencia, and Ramon Obregon had been detained since October 1988. Carlos Novoa and Jose Mari Becerra had been arrested in January. Amnesty International (AI) reported that Novoa had gone on a 59-day hunger strike beginning in May to demand that he be charged and brought to trial.

Elizardo Sanchez (President of the Cuban Commission for Human Rights and National Reconciliation), Hiram Abi Cobas (head of the Cuban Human Rights Party), and Hubert Jerez (head of the Marti Committee for Human Rights) were arrested on August 6 for "disseminating false information" concerning the trial of General Ochoa (see Section 1.e.). Following their arrests, the human rights leaders were confined in the Villa Marista detention center for about 6 weeks before being transferred to Combinado del Este prison. According to Sanchez, while in Villa Marista they were each held in solitary confinement inside windowless 10 foot by 3 foot isolation cells that were brightly illuminated 24 hours a day for 36 days prior to their November 17 trial.

Orlando Polo, leader of the "Green Path" ecological-pacifist group, was arrested three times in August and September and held without being charged for 1 week in the Villa Marista detention center and for 2 weeks in the Havana Psychiatric Hospital. In Villa Marista, Polo was interrogated about unspecified charges without the benefit of an attorney.

Several more activists continued to be held at year's end without charges. Enrique Acosta Ruiz, Sergio De la Vega Gomez, and Lazaro Rosa Arbolez were arrested in April. Esteban Gonzalez, Manuel Pozo and two other members of the Pro-Amnesty Committee, a group calling for the release of political prisoners, were arrested in September. Cuban Human Rights Party activist Edita Cruz was taken into custody in November. Altogether, over 25 arrested or detained activists were still imprisoned or held without being charged at year's end.

Reliable reports indicated that some prisons were filling up again in 1989 after the Government reportedly released over 8,000 criminal offenders in 1988 under the new penal code. In 1989 the authorities began a massive and sustained campaign to prosecute economic offenders, and this may be adding to the prison population. Reports from inside prisons indicate that the number of offenders incarcerated for attempted illegal departures increased in 1989 although prison sentences for the offense remained moderate by Cuban standards. In 1988, especially in the months leading up to the visit of the UNHRC's Cuba Working Group, many persons arrested for illegal departure attempts from the island were not jailed but were fined and released with a severe warning.

Precise numbers of political prisoners in Cuban jails are difficult to determine because of the release of hundreds of prisoners over the last 2 years, differences in definitions of political prisoners, and the Government's traditional secrecy about the prison population. Current estimates of the number of Cuban political prisoners range from Americas Watch's (AW) January 1989 estimate of "several score additional Cubans to possibly as many as a few hundred" to the Cuban human rights activists's claims of many more. In March 1988, the Government stated that there were 455 persons imprisoned for crimes against state security, a category which now does not include offenses such as illegal departure, contempt, and offenses related to the practice of a religion, such as conscientious objection. Another indication of the prisoner population came from the ICRC, which reported that its delegation in May visited 257 prisoners, including some convicted of illegal departure, in 10 Cuban detention centers including the Havana Psychiatric Hospital.

During the year Cuban authorities continued to release selected political prisoners, including some on the condition that they immediately emigrate to the United States. According to U.S. press reports, the Government notified the U.S. Catholic Conference in November 1988 that it would free 225 political prisoners, including 44 it had previously labeled as too dangerous to release. Cuban authorities subsequently did not release the entire group, although at least 8 of the 44 "dangerous" prisoners, including "plantado historico" Alberto Grau, were freed in 1989. There are three remaining "plantados historicos" (long-term political prisoners who have refused "reeducation") still in prison. Alfredo Mustelier, one of these three who has served 20 years of his 25-year sentence, claims that he should be released under retroactive provisions of the 1988 Penal Code. He undertook two lengthy hunger strikes in 1989 to protest his continued incarceration and was gravely ill in December. The U.N. Secretary General, members of the U.S. Congress, and many nongovernmental organizations have asked President Castro to review the cases of Mustelier and the other two "plantados historicos."

Many human rights activists were arrested on April 3 in order to forestall their planned demonstration at the Soviet Embassy during the visit of President Gorbachev. The demonstrators, who wanted to call for support of "glasnost" within Cuba, received sentences ranging from 3 to 9 months.

CUBA

The Cuban Penal Code retains internal exile as a sanction against convicted offenders, but no instances of forced removal or resettlement were reported in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Cuban law and trial practices do not meet international standards for fair and impartial public trials. The Constitution terms the courts independent, yet it explicitly subordinates them to the National Assembly and the Council of State (Article 122). Judges are elected by the rubberstamp National Assembly and its lower level counterparts. The independence of the judiciary is compromised by the de facto subordination of the courts to the Communist Party: there is no known case in which a Cuban court has successfully ruled against the Government on any political or security matter.

Civil courts exist at three levels--municipal, provincial, and the Supreme Court. All civil courts are presided over by panels composed of a mixture of professionally prepared judges and lay judges. There is also a system of military tribunals which tries certain counterrevolutionary activity cases. Defendants have a general right of appeal at the municipal level and a conditional right at the provincial level. Cases involving maximum prison terms or the death penalty are always open to appeal. The Law of Penal Procedure provides that an appeal must be presented within 5 days.

The revised Penal Code (Law No. 62) implemented in 1988 reduced the number of capital offenses and the length of sentences in some cases. The new code did not, however, significantly modify the previous definition of political offenses, the punishment meted out for them, or due process provisions for accused political offenders. Under provisions of the revised code, defense lawyers may be excluded until an investigation is completed, and attempted illegal departure from Cuba remains punishable by up to 3 years' imprisonment or a fine of up to approximately $1,000.

Political offenses, which prevent virtually any form of free expression, remained unchanged in the revised penal code, which retained the concept of "dangerousness" (Articles 72-89) and vaguely defined it as "the special proclivity of a person to commit crimes, demonstrated by his conduct in manifest contradiction of Socialist norms." If the police determine a person is exhibiting such behavior, the offender can be brought before a court which may apply police surveillance, reeducation, or therapy lasting for from 1 to 4 years. In 1989 as in 1988, the concept of "dangerousness" appears to have been invoked rarely, if at all.

Cuban evidentiary practices do not meet generally recognized international standards. A trial for political offenses ordinarily consists of evidence given by the prosecution's witnesses, who are generally employees of state security organs. In some cases, the only evidence is the defendant's confession, obtained without due process safeguards against self-incrimination or coercion. There are usually no defense witnesses, although testimony on behalf of the defendant from a member of a Committee for the Defense of the Revolution (see Section 1.f.) may be introduced and may contribute to a reduced sentence.

CUBA

Cuban law provides an accused the right to a defense attorney, but the latter's impartiality and independence are compromised by the absence of a private bar association and by ideological controls exerted over members of the state-controlled lawyers' collectives, especially in defending persons accused of crimes against state security. When the legal collectives were reorganized in 1984, some 15 percent of then-active attorneys, including many active in political cases, were denied readmission and thus effectively disbarred. Government-appointed defense attorneys generally are poorly prepared and unsympathetic towards the defendant. In 1988 the visiting New York City Bar Association delegation observed Cuban trials for common crimes and found the counsel ill-prepared and unaggressive. Typically, defendants and lawyers are afforded little time together; in some cases, former political prisoners have asserted, clients see their counsel only one hour before trial. Others are unable to meet at all with their attorneys.

Observers have noted a reluctance among attorneys to defend persons charged with political offenses. Lawyers are discouraged from taking political cases because of persecution suffered by those who do. Domingo Jorge Delgado, for example, was freed in 1988 and allowed to emigrate to the United States in 1989, after serving 8 years in prison following his defense of a group of persons who had attempted to seek political asylum. Former political prisoners have alleged that state security officials apply pressure on all persons involved in the judicial process, and that those officials, not the courts, really decide the fate of the detainee.

Several prominent cases of dissidents illustrate how the Cuban judicial system works in practice:

Samuel Martinez Lara, Secretary General of the Cuban Human Rights Party, was sentenced on April 7 to 9 months in prison. Martinez, David Moya, Roberto Bahamonde, and two other members of the Cuban Human Rights Party were arrested on April 3 for announcing a demonstration, which was to call for "glasnost" in Cuba, outside the Soviet Embassy during Soviet leader Gorbachev's visit. All were held incommunicado until their closed trial 3 days later where, without defense attorneys present, they were convicted of "illegal association." Moya received a sentence of 9 months and Bahamonde a sentence of 3 months in prison. In a June 1989 report, AI criticized the trials of Bahamonde, Martinez, Moya, and six other imprisoned members of the Cuban Human Rights Party, stating that they were punished because of their peaceful political and human rights activities and that procedures in their trials did not conform to international standards for fair trial.

Bahamonde's and Moya's sentences were subsequently extended without any semblance of due process. Two months into his prison sentence on June 9, Bahamonde was sentenced to an additional year for "illegal economic activities." According to a letter smuggled out of prison, Moya was found guilty of "contempt" at a courtroom set up in a prison dining room in September and sentenced to a further year in prison. Martinez was not released upon completion of his sentence on January 4, 1990.

General Ochoa and 14 other top military and security officials received few due process safeguards at their highly publicized trial in June and July. Drug trafficking and other serious charges were leveled against them first in the official press and then in 2 weeks of show trials. The proceedings were influenced by the publicly stated views of President Castro and the presentation before the military tribunal by Minister of Defense Raul Castro, as well as official media comments about the guilt of the accused. Defense lawyers for the accused had little time to prepare an adequate defense, received little court time compared to the prosecutor, and apparently at no time did other than to ask for clemency. The accused were sentenced on July 7, their appeal was quickly rejected on July 9, and the Council of State confirmed the death sentences of Ochoa and three other defendants, which were carried out later the same day. AI, AW, and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) condemned the trial's procedures and its swift aftermath.

In mid-1989, defense lawyers in two prominent cases involving human rights activists described below were given greater pretrial access to their clients than was available in previous years. In neither instance, however, was the outcome of the case notably altered in favor of the defendants as a result of these opportunities for more extensive consultations.

Prior to the trial of seven APAL dissidents in September, some defendants, including Carlos Novoa and Pablo Pupo Sanchez, were released on bail and allowed regular consultations with their attorneys. After a trial heavily laden with political invective, according to eyewitnesses, the seven activists received harsh prison sentences ranging from 9 to 21 months on charges of "continued illegal association," "failure to report a crime," and, in one case, "possession of a firearm." In the case of defendant Juan Enrique Garcia, his attorney had excused himself one day prior to the September trial because the date allegedly conflicted with his vacation.

In November Elizardo Sanchez and two other human rights leaders were tried publicly for "spreading false information" on the Ochoa affair; representatives of AW and AI were not permitted to enter Cuba to attend. Likewise, the Government did not allow two U.S. journalists to appear as witnesses for the defense. Two foreign diplomats were allowed to attend the proceedings. All three defendants were granted the right to defense attorneys, but pretrial consultations were limited. At the trial, the accused were allowed to speak freely in their own defense. Although the prosecutor requested the maximum sentence (4 years) for Sanchez, he was sentenced to 2 years and the other 2 defendants were given 18 months each.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Official intrusion into private and family affairs remains one of the most repressive and pervasive features of Cuban life. Government or Communist Party-directed mass organizations permeate Cuban society. The State has assumed a virtual right of interference, even for those who do not actively oppose the Government and its practices. Beyond promoting ideological conformity, many of these intrusions are ostensibly aimed at "improvement" of the citizenry.

The extensive apparatus of the MININT decides on the legality of all private and public associations, and utilizes an intricate system of informers, block wardens, and block committees (Committees for the Defense of the Revolution - CDR) to monitor and control public opinion. Police searches are at times carried out without warrants, as occurred in the homes of several human rights activists in 1989. Authorities were more careful than in the past to observe the appearance of respect for the rights of those suspected of dissent, but Cuban courts automatically issue warrants in security cases, thus rendering this procedural safeguard meaningless.

The authorities possess a wide range of social controls. For example, the educational system teaches that the State's interests have precedence over all other ties and commitments. Teachers, selected in part for their ideological commitment, espouse Communist Party doctrine and can sanction students whose families question orthodox opinion. Teachers also evaluate the political and ideological character of their students, which is noted in records carried with each student throughout his or her education. Cubans are also pressured to join a variety of mass organizations, including the Union of Young Communists, despite the supposedly voluntary nature of these groups. Outstanding students or workers, according to reliable reports, often find themselves coerced into membership in such mass organizations.

CDR's are neighborhood surveillance/security committees tasked with closely monitoring the daily lives of individual residents. Participation in Cuba's 80,000 CDR's is in practice involuntary in urban areas. The Government in 1988 announced the elimination of one CDR report on the beliefs of citizens, but there is little evidence that this change significantly altered the role of the CDR's as guardians of social conformity. CDR's apparently continue to report suspicious activities, such as contact with foreigners, reception of foreign broadcasting in the home, conspicuous consumption, unauthorized meetings, and criticism of the Government. CDR activity, if anything, increased in 1989 as the Government undertook a massive campaign aimed at corruption and petty economic offenses.

Former political prisoners are often subjected to discriminatory treatment and are relegated to menial, intermittently available work, no matter what their education or experience. Their children may be harassed in schools and sometimes barred from higher or even technical education. There was evidence that this discrimination abated in recent years and that authorities were attempting to prevent the grosser forms of discrimination from being exercised against departing immigrants as well. Human rights activists report frequent incidents of threats and harassment by government officials. Cubans have no right to receive publications from abroad and can expect all correspondence with foreign countries to be carefully monitored.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Cuban authorities continue to place very extensive checks and controls on freedom of expression. The Government does not allow direct criticism of the "Revolution," e.g. the basic policies and Marxist-Leninist orientation of the Government, party or leadership. Laws are enforced against antigovernment "propaganda," antigovernment graffiti, and slander or insults against government officials. Local CDR's monitor and report on expressions of dissent or criticism.

The electronic and print media are owned by the State or party-controlled organizations and operate according to party guidelines. No public forum exists for airing one's views apart from the government-controlled media. In 1989 as in previous years, the Government used the media as a vehicle to indoctrinate the population. Cuban media content reflected government views of events and stories tend to congratulate the Government for internal successes, primarily economic ones. By comparison, Cuban media coverage of Eastern European developments was terse but straightforward.

In 1989, the Government moved to shut down new dissident efforts to publish independent newsletters. Thirteen members of the Cuban Human Rights Party were arrested for printing and distributing several issues of its new bulletin Franqueza (Openness). Manuel Gonzalez, Manuel Gonzalez, Sr., and Iris Perez received prison sentences ranging from 6 months to 1 year for producing Franqueza. Copies of a second, unsigned dissident newsletter, El Lente (The Lens), appeared sporadically during the year.

Cuban censorship of foreign media in 1989 expanded to include reform-minded Soviet publications. In August the Cuban party leadership announced it was removing two Soviet journals, Sputnik and Moscow News, from circulation. The Cuban Communist Party newspaper Granma justified the journals' ban from circulation by citing their "negative consequences" among the Cuban populace. Periodicals from non-Communist countries are not available to the general public, and foreign broadcasts, apart from U.S.-based Radio Marti, are not heard by significant numbers of people.

The Government extended its intimidation to the foreign press on several occasions in 1989. A group of U.S. journalists covering the July 26th celebrations reported being warned that foreign journalists who visit Cuban dissidents or who report about them could jeopardize their stay in Cuba and issuance of future visas. The Reuters correspondent in Havana was expelled from Cuba in July for publishing a report the Government found unacceptable.

Artistic and literary freedom are circumscribed by government control. Party and government officials carefully scrutinize humor and irony in the arts. In 1989 one art exhibition containing pictures which unflatteringly portrayed President Castro was closed. A Vice Minister of Culture barred from public display a painting which depicted Castro speaking to a crowd whose faces were all identical to his.

Academic freedom is severely limited. Education is the exclusive prerogative of the State, and the school system follows Marxist-Leninist precepts as interpreted by government guidelines. Academics can write freely so long as their work does not conflict with any government or party policy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution does not provide for freedom of assembly or association. Any assembly of more than three persons even in a private home is punishable by up to 3 months in prison and a fine. Organizers of "illicit or unrecognized groups" can receive a sentence of up to 9 months (Article 240 of the Penal Code).

There was no known instance in 1989 of authorities approving any public meeting by a group not recognized by the Government. On the contrary, the Government continued its crackdown begun in October 1988 on dissidents seeking to hold meetings or to organize demonstrations. During Soviet leader Gorbachev's visit to Havana in April, at least 21 activists were arrested in connection with a planned demonstration. Four Cuban Human Rights Party members received sentences of from 3 to 9 months for "planning an illegal gathering" (see Section 1.e.).

Article 208 of the Penal Code prohibits "illegal or unrecognized groups." The Ministry of Justice, in consultation with the MININT, determines the legality of all organizations. Apart from "recognized" churches and one or two groups such as the Masonic Order which are carefully monitored by authorities, the small, unrecognized, and thus illegal human rights groups represent the only associations independent of the State and the party. The authorities continued to ignore the applications for legal recognition made by the Cuban Commission for Human Rights and National Reconciliation and the Cuban Human Rights Committee over the past 3 years.

Cuban citizens are expected to join party-controlled mass organizations, such as the CDR's, the Confederation of Cuban Workers, the Federation of Cuban Women, and the Union of Communist Youth. Resisting membership makes persons subject to a range of unofficial sanctions.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government places restrictions on the practice of religion and discriminates against believers, despite the Constitution's recognition of the rights of citizens to profess and practice any religious belief. Religious believers are excluded from membership in the Communist Party and thus from almost all executive and leadership positions, including posts in the Government, the courts, and the teaching profession. Persons who publicly profess their religious beliefs may be subject to informal discrimination in the workplace and through social pressures on their children in school. Practicing Catholics, for instance, have a difficult time getting more desirable jobs or being admitted into certain fields of study.

Fidel Castro and other Cuban officials have publicly admitted that religious discrimination exists, although they claimed it was not authorized. Indeed, there has been a perceived slight relaxation of official attitudes toward religion which contributed to modest increases in both church attendance and baptisms. Catholic Church officials noted in 1989 a growing number of youths willing publicly to profess their faith.

The Government and Communist Party continued to maintain restrictions and controls on the activities of organized churches. Churches and other religious groups must register with the Government and be "recognized." Recognized faiths customarily are permitted to hold religious activities only within specifically designated places of worship, but permission was granted for services in prisons and some health care institutions in 1989. Many Catholic and Protestant churches have closed, and new construction has been restricted since the Revolution. Four Protestant and two Catholic seminaries are allowed to operate, but no other formal religious training schools are permitted. Atheism is taught by youth organizations. Churches have no access to official mass media. The observance of religious holidays is difficult, and most traditional processions are prohibited. Christmas is a normal workday.

Despite these restrictions, relations between the Government and recognized churches have improved since the mid-1980's. In 1989 the Government demonstrated a greater willingness to establish a dialogue with church leaders, and President Castro welcomed the prospect of a future papal visit to Cuba. The Government slightly expanded the ad hoc exceptions it granted in 1988 to recognized churches: admission of foreign clergy to work in Cuba, greater tolerance for religious instruction, freedom for clergy to travel abroad, permission for the importation of increased quantities of Bibles, and freedom to hold conventions. While churches have been granted exceptions, they have not been conceded "rights".

Since April, clergy have been allowed to visit prisoners who have requested their services. The Catholic Church established telex links among its diocesan offices and with church officials overseas as authorized by the Government in 1988. The Seventh-Day Adventist church held a national congress in Cuba, and foreign Adventist officials were permitted to attend in their official capacity. The small Jewish community was again allowed to import religious materials, and kosher food and wine. Cuban authorities, while clamping down on other unauthorized publications in 1989, continued to permit limited circulation of an independent newsletter published by a Catholic layman. The Government allowed access to construction materials needed to rebuild some existing churches, but provincial and local officials have opposed certain restoration projects. In December 1988 in Palma Soriana, a parish priest, with the help of his congregation, succeeded in restoring and reopening a small chapel. Local party officials organized a mob to break up the inaugural service. When the priest managed to defuse the protest by leading the crowds outside the church in the national anthem, he was detained by police for "proselytizing and holding a service in public" and released hours later only after vigorous public protest.

Members of certain faiths have suffered active persecution. Human rights monitors reported several cases of Jehovah's Witnesses arrested for illegal meetings and possession of clandestine publications (i.e., Jehovah's Witnesses tracts) in 1989, including the cases of Ursulo Brito and Samuel Camacho Hernandez (sentenced to 6 months in prison), and of Eloy Ramos Gonzalez (sentenced to 1 year). In April police reportedly infiltrated a Jehovah's Witnesses prayer meeting in Suri and staged a raid on the home of Felipe Bofill where prayers were being offered for Bofill's gravely ill son. Several persons were arrested, tried, and convicted of charges of "illegal meeting and possession of clandestine printing."

Other religious groups also suffer such repression; in a raid in December 1988 reported by the Cuban Human Rights Committee, the home of Baptist pastor Eliejar Samado Cazavus of Granma was ransacked and religious literature confiscated. Samado subsequently lost his job and was forced to rely on small donations from his congregation to support his family.

CUBA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no legal restrictions on domestic travel, but Cuban citizens require permission both to leave and to reenter Cuba. Opportunities for nonofficial foreign travel are severely restricted, limited generally to elderly pensioners, church officials, and special humanitarian cases for serious family illness or death.

Cuban authorities strictly control emigration but in 1989 again permitted several thousand persons, including hundreds of former political prisoners, to leave the country permanently with no right of return. Draft-age males were generally not allowed to depart. During 1989 the Government continued to deny, without any explanation, exit permission to some persons and their immediate families who had already been accepted into immigration and refugee admissions programs of other countries. For example, the Government has repeatedly refused exit permission to Sebastian Arcos Cazabon, the son of human rights leader Sebastian Arcos Bergnes..

It is a crime to leave the country without authorization. Persons who attempt to flee on small boats or inner tubes face sanctions ranging from fines to 3 years' imprisonment. The number of persons convicted of "illegal" departure reportedly rose sharply in 1989 (see Section 1.e.). Discrimination against intending legal emigrants lessened in 1989, although extricating a family from the web of state employment, housing, and education remains a complex and often frustrating process. Once emigration formalities are completed, all family possessions and property go to the State unless immediate relatives are able to take possession.

Cubans traveling as emigrants or refugees to other countries have no right to return for a visit or repatriation. The Government continued to restrict the number of persons of Cuban origin from the United States permitted to visit their families in Cuba to 50 persons per week under a worldwide quota of 5,000 per year. Persons who came to the United States in the Mariel boatlift were routinely denied repatriation and the Cuban Government allowed no more than 10 of them per week to visit Cuba. Entry into Cuba by Cuban Americans was suspended entirely for the last quarter of 1989. The Government reduced to $250 per trip the amount of currency visiting expatriates can bring to family members in Cuba.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Cuban citizens have no legal right to seek to change their government or even to advocate this right. The only political organization allowed in Cuba is the Communist Party. The overlapping party and state hierarchy has remained largely unchanged for 30 years. Members of the highest governing bodies, the Politburo and the Central Committee, are selected by a small group of party leaders. Although direct elections are held to fill municipal offices, the provincial assemblies and the National Assembly are elected indirectly. Only the party and its affiliated mass organizations have the right to distribute political materials or to organize electoral meetings. All candidates must, in effect, be approved by the Communist Party. In March, dissident Roberto Bahamonde challenged the system and ran against the Communist Party candidate for a municipal assembly seat in Havana. Bahamonde lost and was imprisoned on other charges several weeks later (see Sections 1.d. and 1.e.).

In December 1988, 163 European and American intellectuals joined Cuban expatriates in signing an open letter calling for a plebiscite on Fidel Castro's rule, following the October 1988 example of Chile. One month earlier, the Cuban Human Rights Party had advocated a plebiscite on whether to repeal the Constitution and convoke a constituent assembly. Government officials rejected the call for a plebiscite and called the comparison with Chile "absurd."

In 1989 Fidel Castro distanced Cuba from democratizing trends sweeping through the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe, rationalizing his continued unwillingness to allow greater opportunities for Cuban citizens to participate freely in the political system.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Domestic human rights monitors are legally unrecognized and lead a precarious existence dependent upon the vagaries of government policy. The Government continued, in violation of its own statutes, to refuse to recognize the applications for legalization submitted in 1988 and 1989 by several such groups (see Section 2.b.). In its 1988/89 Annual Report, the IACHR called on the Government to recognize human rights associations and their right to engage in their activities freely. The three principal domestic human rights monitoring groups are the Cuban Human Rights Committee (CCPDH), the Cuban Human Rights Party (PPDHC) and the Cuban Commission for Human Rights and National Reconciliation (CCDHRN). There is a host of smaller human rights-related groups, most notably the Free Art Association (APAL) and the Marti Committee for Human Rights, which appeared in 1988. In February 1989, the PPDHC, CCDHRN, and Marti Committee for Human Rights banded together under an umbrella group, the Coordinator of Human Rights Organizations.

The Government's stepped-up crackdown on Cuba's human rights movement was the most significant development in the country's human rights situation in 1989. Official policy changed from increasing limited tolerance through mid-1988 to repression after the September 1988 visit of the UNHRC Cuba Working Group. Since then, the Government has taken or fabricated opportunities to harass, detain, or imprison approximately 50 activists and has, in effect, silenced many of its leading domestic critics. Some of the arrested activists had presented testimony to the UNHRC Cuba Working Group, although their arrests were officially for alleged actions unconnected with their testimony. The UNHRC delegation was assured by Cuban authorities that the witnesses would not suffer reprisals for their testimony. About 25 of those activists arrested or detained, including the leaders of four of the five human rights groups named above, remained imprisoned or held without charge at year's end (see Section 1.d.).

The atmosphere of increased openness leading up to the UNHRC's visit led some human rights activists to attempt to exercise what they viewed as their rights to peaceful assembly and speech. The Government responded with the pattern of arrests, swiftly staged trials, and misdemeanor convictions which began with the October 1988 arrest of six APAL activists and the November 1988 arrest of PPDHC leader Tania Diaz Castro.

In 1989 the Government further clamped down as activists continued to test the limits of its tolerance by circulating petitions and underground publications and, in one case, trying to organize a demonstration. Cuban authorities appeared to follow legal procedures more scrupulously, but imposed harsher punishments. Elizardo Sanchez's 2-year prison term was the harshest sentence meted out to a human rights activists in several years (see Section 1.e. for details on dissident trials). Extralegal harassment continued as well. Several human rights activists were beaten by thugs and at least eight others were arrested during a November 12 mass; incorrect rumors had circulated that prayers would be said at the mass to support hunger striking political prisoner Alfredo Mustelier. By the close of 1989, members of the human rights movement who were not in jail had reduced their public activities because of government repression.

The ICRC was the only monitoring group which visited Cuba in 1989. Cuban authorities permitted the ICRC to make a second annual visit to prisons and to monitor conditions of inmates. The ICRC, whose findings are strictly confidential, did report that its delegation interviewed 257 prisoners in 10 detention centers, including the Havana Psychiatric Hospital. The Government denied permission to representatives from AW and AI to attend the trial of human rights leader Elizardo Sanchez.

Following its September 1988 visit, the UNHRC Cuba Working Group submitted a 400-page report to its parent commission in February 1989. The report detailed extensive human rights abuses by Cuba and noted numerous outstanding questions posed by the Working Group which Cuban authorities had failed to answer. The UNHRC, at its 1989 session, passed a resolution charging the U.N. Secretary General to maintain a dialogue with the Cuban Government in order to follow up on outstanding issues in the Working Group's report. Cuban authorities (who, under international pressure in 1988, had invited the Working Group to visit) made it clear in their 1989 public statements that, notwithstanding the content of the report, they considered international attention to Cuban human rights practices to be a closed chapter.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Cuba is a multiracial society with a large population of persons with mixed racial ancestry. The Constitution expressly forbids discrimination on the basis of race, sex, or national origin, and there were no known incidents of direct racial or sexual discrimination in 1989. The Family Code of 1975 equalized pay scales, eliminated sexual discrimination in promotions, provided generous maternity leave, and gave employed women preferential access to goods and services. Public or official expressions of racial discrimination or prejudice are rare. The official women's organization, the Federation of Cuban Women, is used to mobilize women politically rather than to advocate women's rights exclusively.

There are no official data available on the incidence of violence against women. Neither the Government nor society condone such violence. Cuban law establishes strict penalties for sexual abuse or rape of women, including the death penalty for the rape of minors or serious injury to the victim. The Penal Code also provides lesser sanctions for sexual coercion of women by authorities or guardians. These statutes appear to be enforced with typical severity by the authorities, although sexual crimes are never reported in the press. Anecdotal evidence from human rights groups and other sources indicates that domestic violence such as wife beating is a problem, but a lack of statistical data makes it impossible to gauge its true extent. Due to societal traditions many victims of abuse are reluctant to file a report or to press charges, so it is likely that cases of violence are significantly underreported. Women complain of verbal harassment in public and expected subordination at home.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution gives priority to state or collective needs over individual choices regarding free association or provision of employment; the decision and choices of workers are subordinate to the "demands of the economy and society" (Article 44). Strikes are not permitted under the law. Established Cuban labor organizations are not trade unions in any real sense and do not act as a voice for workers' rights, including the right to strike. Labor is organized under the control of the State and party through one umbrella group, the Confederation of Cuban Workers (CTC). The CTC is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions and its regional organization, the Permanent Congress of Trade Union Unity of Latin America (CPUSTAL). The CTC serves primarily as an instrument of the State to enforce political and labor discipline, to encourage productivity, to hold down labor costs, and to save raw materials. Some CTC member labor organizations have served as debating forums for the consideration of a limited range of labor issues such as worker safety and local working conditions.

The right to form an independent union is prohibited and even discussion of such a step has been subject to punishment. Despite increased repression of many dissident groups in 1989, however, several embryonic labor organizing groups appeared and discussed the need for autonomous representation of workers' interests along the lines of the Solidarity movement in Poland. Two of these groups, the Independent Trade Union Movement and the Free Trade Union, claimed to have gathered membership in workplaces in the capital region. These tiny groups remain very much on the margins, and even the discussion of independent unions is a dangerous form of dissent, often characterized by authorities as a form of "industrial sabotage." In August Havana ironworker Ricardo Figueira Castro, a member of the CCPDH, was arrested and charged with enemy propaganda. Figueira had unsuccessfully sought a position in his factory's official union with the idea of making it more responsive to workers' needs. Nevertheless, he began to represent workers' interests informally with management and to speak out about the need for more independent representation with coworkers. Figueira's arrest soon followed.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) again challenged the trade union monopoly granted to the CTC in violation of Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. The Committee asked the Government to report what steps it is taking to bring its legislation into conformance.

CUBA

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Effective collective bargaining does not exist. The State Committee for Work and Social Security sets wages and salaries for the state sector. There are no known export processing zones in Cuba. Since the CTC is an instrument of the government policy, antiunion discrimination is not a relevant concept except as it applies to the Government's repression of independent union groups like those mentioned above.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution and the Labor Code do not contain prohibitions on forced labor. Workers do not have full freedom to change jobs without official approval. Every worker must present a work identification card in seeking a new job. This card contains information on performance of "voluntary" work, protection of socialist property, political consciousness, failure to meet production goals, and negligence. In practice, any job change remains under the control of the authorities who grade and evaluate employee records that form the basis of the work identity cards.

Special groups of workers on loan from other jobs known as "microbrigades" are employed on special construction projects, often working a 60- to 70-hour week of physical labor. Some human rights monitors allege that workers refusing to "volunteer" for such projects often find themselves victims of discrimination or even risk losing their jobs. "Microbrigade" workers, however, are reportedly rewarded with priority listing for apartments, a very powerful incentive for voluntary work.

Various ILO bodies have found that governmental restrictions on the freedom to choose or change employment are incompatible with ILO Conventions prohibiting forced labor. Most recently, the 1989 report of the ILO Committee of Experts, cited above, found provisions of the new labor code imposing "correctional labor," and compulsory labor for damage due to negligence, to be incompatible with Convention 105 on forced labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum working age is 17; however, the labor code provides for exceptions for those aged 15 and 16 to obtain training or to fill labor shortages. There is no evidence that authorities deviated from these rules in 1989. However, all students above the age of 11 are expected to devote 30 to 45 days of their summer vacations to agricultural work up to a maximum of 8 hours per day.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

During 1989 Cuba's minimum wage remained at $140 per month at the overvalued official exchange rate or about $20 in terms of black-market buying power, plus a "social wage" consisting of free medical care and education, along with subsidized housing and rationed food. Even with the state subsidies, a worker needs to earn substantially more than the minimum wage to support a family. The value of the "social wage" in improving living standards is diminished by the persistent shortages and tight rationing that have become standard features of the Cuban economy. For example, most newly married couples must live with relatives for years before obtaining their own housing and the suppression of free farmers' markets in 1986

CUBA

(following a brief experiment with market incentives) exacerbated shortages of some foods, although caloric intake remains high.

Maximum hours of work are 44 regular hours per week, with shorter workdays for unusually demanding jobs such as underground mining. Overtime is limited by law and practice, although workers are pressured to engage in additional unpaid "voluntary" labor. Workers receive 30 calendar days of vacation regardless of seniority or age. Provisions for worker safety and control of pollution generally appear inadequate. There is a lack of effective control and enforcement mechanisms to ensure worker safety, and industrial accidents are apparently frequent.

DOMINICA

A parliamentary democracy and a member of the Commonwealth of Nations, Dominica has been independent since 1978. Prime Minister Eugenia Charles' Dominica Freedom Party, in office since 1980, was reelected in 1985. The opposition Democratic Labour Party won 43 percent of the popular vote in the 1985 elections. A third party, the Dominica United Workers Party, was formed in 1988.

The police have been the only security force in Dominica since 1981. The Commissioner of Police supervises a small Special Services Unit (SSU), which has been incorporated into the Regional Security System of the Eastern Caribbean States, and oversees a marine unit which functions as a coast guard. The police are controlled by and responsive to the democratically elected Government.

Dominica's economy is based extensively on agriculture. Per capita gross domestic product is $1,480. Although rugged terrain and periodic devastation from hurricanes have tended to hamper development, the economy grew at an impressive rate for the previous 3 years before slowing down in early 1989. Affected by a drop in prices, banana exports fell by approximately 28 percent from the 1988 level. Meanwhile both the construction and tourism sectors contracted significantly. In September Hurricane Hugo struck parts of the island, damaging the banana crop and sections of the country's infrastructure. The Government's promotion of agricultural diversification, and a number of new manufacturing and agricultural ventures (e.g., aloe vera production and a cardboard box factory) should help offset the adverse effects of these developments.

The country's human rights record remained good during 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture or other forms of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. These are prohibited by the Constitution.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile, and the Government respects these constitutional provisions. According to Dominican law, persons arrested or detained must be charged with a crime within 24 hours or be released from custody. This requirement is honored in practice. There were no cases of arbitrary arrest or exile in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Dominican law provides for public trial before an independent, impartial court. Criminal defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty, are allowed legal counsel, and have the right of appeal. Indigents are provided free legal counsel only in capital cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no reports in 1989 of arbitrary government interference in the private lives of individuals. Arbitrary entry, search, and seizure are prohibited by the Constitution; search warrants are required by law.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The right of free expression is provided for by the Constitution and adhered to in practice. The political opposition openly criticizes the Government. Although the one major weekly newspaper is church supported and generally pro-Government, it does include opposition viewpoints. Similarly, while the main radio station is state-owned, Dominicans enjoy access to independent news sources via cable television and radio reception from neighboring islands. Opposition groups sporadically publish their own "journals."

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government respects the constitutionally mandated freedoms of association and assembly and does not hinder opposition groups from holding political meetings or public demonstrations. Such meetings and gatherings were held periodically throughout the year.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Roman Catholicism is the predominant faith in Dominica, and there are various Protestant denominations. There are also small Muslim and Rastafarian communities. There is no discrimination on the basis of religious faith or practice, and outside religious groups are not restricted in their activities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are provided for by law and respected in practice. The Government may revoke passports if subversion is suspected, but has not done so in recent times.

DOMINICA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Although independent only since 1978, Dominica has a much longer tradition of democracy and home rule. Power is exercised by a Cabinet appointed by the Prime Minister. Elections in 1980 and 1985 were free and fair, and were contested by the incumbent Dominica Freedom Party and the opposition Labour Party, which won four of 21 seats in the latter contest. Elections to be held in 1990 will also be contested by a third party, the United Workers Party. Elections are by secret ballot and held every 5 years, or earlier, at the discretion of the Prime Minister.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Dominica has not been accused of any human rights violations by international groups. There are no government restrictions on the formation of local human rights organizations, although none exist at present.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

There are constitutional provisions, respected in practice, against racial or sexual discrimination in Dominica. Religious practice is not restricted nor is it the basis for discrimination. Labor laws specify equal pay for equal work. Officials of the Government's Women's Desk and the Community Welfare Desk state that violence against women, including domestic violence such as wife beating, is not characteristic of Dominican society. Nevertheless, the Government in 1989 concluded a research project on the subject of violence against women. Interviews were conducted with government and church officials, with the public, and with victims of abuse. The survey touched on such issues as which acts are defined as domestic violence, the number of instances of domestic violence, and the laws protecting women against violence. While there are no specific laws dealing with domestic violence, the Government is aware of the problem and is investigating its effect on society.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the legal right to organize, to choose their representatives, and to strike. Approximately 20 percent of the work force is organized. Unions are historically more closely associated with the opposition than with the current governing party. While there were no major strikes in 1989, one union used secondary boycotts effectively against two employers to force negotiation of pending demands. Unions can and do associate with confederations and international bodies.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Antiunion discrimination by employers is prohibited by law, and union rights are enforced by judicial and police authority. Enforcement mechanisms are the responsibility of the Department of Labor, whose inspectors carry out investigations under the supervision of the Commissioner of Labor. Unions have legally defined rights to organize workers and to bargain with employers. Collective bargaining is widespread in the nonagricultural sectors of the economy, including the government service, and there is also recourse to mediation and arbitration by the Government. Labor regulations and practice governing Dominica's three industrial estates and its other export firms located outside the estates do not differ markedly from that prevailing in the rest of the economy. About half of the country's export firms have been organized by trade unions. However, it is not legally compulsory for employers to recognize legally constituted unions as bargaining agents. Moreover, as most of the work force is female and there is no minimum age for industry, wage rates tend to be lower than in the economy generally. Also, the small labor inspection office lacks qualified personnel to carry out its duties under existing labor legislation.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum working age is 14 years; this provision is generally observed in practice.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The minimum wage for agricultural workers is $3.80 per day, which is barely sufficient to provide them a minimally decent standard of living. The minimum salary for civil service workers is $337 per month. There is no minimum wage law for industrial workers. The standard workweek is 40 hours in 5 days. The law provides for a minimum of 2 weeks' paid vacation. The Employment Safety Act, an occupational health and safety law, is considered to be consistent with international standards. The enforcement mechanism consists of inspections by the Department of Labor, which can and does prescribe specific compliance measures, impose fines, and prosecute offenders.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The Dominican Republic is a constitutional democracy with a popularly elected president and a bicameral congress. The Supreme Court heads an independent judiciary whose members are appointed by the Senate. Political parties representing the ideological spectrum from left to right freely and actively participated in the May 1986 national elections, the sixth to be held since 1966. In the elections of 1978 and 1986, the reins of government were peacefully transferred from one ruling party to the opposition. The current President, Joaquin Balaguer, was inaugurated in August 1986 and will serve until August 1990.

The National Police (PN), the National Department of Investigation (DNI), and the military serve as the security services. The PN has general investigative and principal arrest authority. The military has investigative and general arrest authority for armed forces personnel and can arrest suspects apprehended by military patrols. The DNI is the principal national investigative body for national security concerns and generally does not have arrest authority. In 1988 the Government created the National Executive Council for the Control of Drugs to coordinate domestic and international narcotics programs, bringing under a single authority elements of the National Police, military, and DNI. All branches of the security services are responsive to civilian authority.

The Dominican Republic has a mixed economy based primarily on agriculture (approximately 15 percent of the gross domestic product) and services. The Government accounts for nearly 25 percent of the gross domestic product and controls several major industries (sugar, the national airline, electricity, etc.). Historically, sugar has been the principal export, although tourism, free trade zones, and remittances from Dominicans living abroad now generate more foreign exchange. The country continues to face the burdens of a $4-billion external debt, a 45-percent inflation rate (estimate for 1989), a rapidly growing population (2.3 percent annually), and concomitant high levels of unemployment (some 25 percent) and underemployment (20-25 percent). During 1989, discontent over the continued deterioration of basic public services, inflation, and low wage levels generated a series of demonstrations (some of which became violent), serious sectoral strikes (including extended teachers' and public doctors' strikes), and a national general strike in June.

Dominicans generally continued to exercise the broad range of human rights provided by the Constitution. The political environment remained unrestricted, and individuals and political groups freely debated and criticized the Government's policies and programs. The major human rights problem which has continued to generate criticism within the Dominican Republic and abroad was the abuse of human and worker rights of Haitians residing in the Dominican Republic.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known cases of political killings in 1989. Daniel Mirambeaux, an ex-member of an extremist, leftist party who was accused of murdering a New York City policeman during a drug-related crime in October 1988, died on June 30 as a result of a fall from a third story landing in the national police headquarters as he was on his way to be transported back to the United States to stand trial. The official autopsy stated that the death "was highly compatible with homicide," fueling charges that the Dominican Government engineered the death. The four Dominican police officers who had custody of Mirambeaux at the time of his death all testified that Mirambeaux jumped from the landing. The official report and an independent investigation by the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation, (done at the Dominican Government's invitation), both determined the probable cause of death as suicide. The four police officers involved were suspended from active duty for "gross negligence" in allowing Mirambeaux to escape physical custody. They were themselves placed in custody, and a court-martial recommended that they be separated from the police. On December 22, however, President Balaguer announced that, as an act of Christmas clemency, he was ordering their release and reinstatement, explaining that they had already been punished enough for their act of negligence.

In two additional cases, the police have been accused of abuse of prisoners leading to death. In August, Montero Mondesi died of blows allegedly received while in police custody at the National Police Headquarters. The officials in charge were arrested, and the police chief ordered an autopsy and complete investigation. In September, relatives charged that Armando Moya Salazar died in custody after being tortured by the police.

Members of the military were implicated by relatives in the alleged beating and death of Geovanny Cuello Sencion. According to press accounts, Cuello and some friends were picked up by a military patrol following a bar fight he had with an off-duty soldier. The press reported that Cuello was held at a military base and beaten for several days, and he subsequently died on September 16. The military alleges that Cuello and his friends were involved with illegal drugs. The police chief led a high-level investigation into the incident. The military court tried four enlisted men who made up the patrol. In December their case was still under final review. No officers have been brought to trial in the incident.

There were no credible reports of politically motivated disappearances in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture, but several cases of mistreatment of prisoners or detainees by law enforcement officials and military personnel were reported by the press. In its 1989 report covering 1988, Amnesty International (AI) expressed concern over the reported beating of several people in detention following their arrest in mass demonstrations. The Government states that it has investigated reports of alleged police abuses, but any results of such investigations have not been made public.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were no credible reports of arbitrary arrest or exile of citizens for expressing views contrary to or critical of the Government. However, in mid-December 1988, the Government summarily deported Dr. Paul Etienne, a Haitian who worked for a nongovernmental center providing health and social services to Haitian sugar plantation workers. Human rights groups, including AI, observed there was no apparent reason for the expulsion other than his criticisms of the Government's treatment of Haitians.

There have also been frequent assertions that security forces forcibly detain Haitians and require them to cut sugar cane on state-owned plantations (see Section 2.d.)

The Constitution stipulates that suspects may be detained for a maximum of 48 hours for investigation before arraignment, after which they must be charged or released. In 1989 there were procedural complaints that people were being held in prison improperly. In response, the Attorney General began to review prison records in June. She subsequently ordered the release of 56 prisoners being held without timely trial or without legal cause, faulting the District Attorney's office for issuing "irregular" holding orders.

In the last half of 1989, the judiciary, some elements of the executive branch, and various human rights groups complained that prisoners were being improperly held, often after court release orders had been issued in their behalf. Police and prison officials, on their part, complained that courts were releasing dangerous criminals or letting them off with light sentences. After evaluations by the Attorney General and the Santo Domingo District Attorney, over 50 prisoners were subsequently released. In late November, President Balaguer responded to the demands that the Government ensure that court-ordered releases be obeyed by announcing that the executive branch was preparing legislation to reform the habeas corpus law.

Large numbers of people were detained during the year as a result of protest activities. Many hundreds were reportedly detained as a measure to prevent violence on the eve of the June general strike; the strike was peaceful, and those detained were released shortly thereafter. Also in late June, a number of teachers were arrested during a confrontation between striking Dominican teachers' association members and police; the teachers were released within a few days.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are no known political prisoners. The Constitution provides for a public trial. No special court for political or national security cases exists, and civilians may not be tried by a military court. Members of the armed forces are tried by military courts, except under specific circumstances and only after review by a military board. The appeals procedure, which includes appellate courts and the Supreme Court, is widely utilized. Court-appointed lawyers normally are provided at public expense to indigents only in criminal cases; they are seldom provided in criminal misdemeanor cases in which their provision is at the court's discretion. Prosecuting attorneys are appointed by the executive branch.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Judges at all levels are appointed and approved by the Senate. They are nominally independent of the executive branch and are subject to removal or transfer by a majority vote in the Senate. Their terms of office correspond roughly to that of the President and other elected officials. The newly elected Senate can either designate their replacements or reconfirm them.

Judges earn a relatively low salary, and there have been allegations that the fairness and timeliness of some trials have been subject to influence and manipulation. There is widespread public belief that a number of judges and prosecutors accept bribes. To increase the professionalism of the judiciary, the Government, in cooperation with the U.S. Department of Justice, began in 1988 and continued in 1989 a program which provides judges and court attorneys with professional training in the legal aspects of criminal investigation.

The slowness of the judicial system, a problem for many years, continues to come under criticism. In an effort to attack the backlog of cases in the courts, the Supreme Court, with technical assistance from the U.S. Government, has computerized the Dominican central files and court docket. Although the right to judicial determination of the legality of detention exists, preventive detention of those awaiting trial is legal and commonly employed, and many of those accused remain in prison for lengthy periods.

Ex-president Salvador Jorge Blanco (of the opposition Dominican Revolutionary Party) returned to the Dominican Republic after an absence of 18 months in November 1988 and remains involved in a lengthy trial on charges of corruption during his presidency (1982-86). He maintains that his prosecution is politically motivated.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no credible reports of arbitrary governmental interference with the private lives of persons or families. Constitutional safeguards against invasion of the home are generally observed. A residence may not be searched except in the presence of a prosecutor or an assistant prosecutor, excluding cases of "hot pursuit" or instances where there is probable cause to believe that a crime is actually being committed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These liberties are provided for by law and are respected in practice. Dominicans of all political persuasions enjoy freedom of speech and regularly exercise it. The numerous privately owned radio and television stations air all political points of view. Dominican newspapers are privately owned and freely reflect independent and opposition points of view. There is no government censorship on political grounds.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are provided for by the Constitution and are respected in practice. Outdoor public marches and meetings require government permits, which are routinely granted.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Indoor gatherings of political parties, labor unions, and other associations are unrestricted.

Professional organizations of lawyers, doctors, and others function freely and can maintain relations with counterpart international bodies of diverse political philosophies. Although formed as professional associations, many of these organizations take on roles similar to those of labor unions, including protest activities and strikes.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Discrimination on religious grounds is prohibited by the Constitution. There are no religious requirements to hold public office, no restrictions on the practice of religious faiths, and no social discrimination based on religion. Approximately 95 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, and the Church's preeminent position is recognized in the Concordat between the Dominican Republic and the Holy See. There have been no credible reports of government interference with the free practice of religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no unusual legal restrictions on travel within or outside the country for citizens. However, the status and treatment of Haitians living in the Dominican Republic and of persons of Haitian descent have generated criticism by the press and private groups, both in the Dominican Republic and abroad. The Haitian community of perhaps 1,000,000 is composed mainly of illegal immigrants seeking improved economic conditions. Over the years, many have remained after the end of seasonal agricultural contracts and others have slipped over the border. In February 1989, Haiti created the Commission for Haitians Overseas to try to induce these Haitians to return.

In early January, a truck carrying some 73 Haitians overturned killing 47 Haitians. Several survivors told the press that they had been captured at the border, kept in military barracks for several days, and then put on the truck guarded by Dominican soldiers destined for a sugar plantation. This incident focused national and international attention on the situation of Haitians in the Dominican Republic. More attention arose when the 1989 International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) again faulted the Dominican Government for its failure to address problems pointed out in a 1983 ILO study of Haitians in the Dominican Republic. In addition, the ILO General Assembly made specific criticisms of the Government for failure to protect worker rights of Haitians working in the Dominican Republic.

A May 1989 report issued by the private U.S. human rights group, Americas Watch (AW), charged that the Government and the state-owned sugar corporation (CEA) did not allow the free travel of Haitian seasonal agricultural workers during the sugar harvest, restricting them to the sugar plantations which had their contract and not permitting them to return to Haiti. It has also charged that security forces paid recruiters to lure Haitians into the Dominican Republic who were then forcibly taken to the state-owned sugar company plantations. The Dominican Government denied these charges (see Section 6.c.).

For the most part, the Government does not deport illegal Haitian immigrants, although it may do so under Dominican immigration law. The Government claimed that this policy is motivated by humanitarian considerations, noting the problems the new Haitian Government would have in reassimilating hundreds of thousands of its poorer citizens. As a result of ILO and other criticism of Dominican Government treatment of Haitian residents, and calls for the Government to legalize undocumented persons of Haitian descent born in and living in the Dominican Republic, many economic and political leaders are publicly calling for the enforcement of immigration laws and the deportation of large numbers of Haitians.

Persons seeking political refuge (virtually all are Haitian) are not repatriated if the Government determines that they have a legitimate fear of persecution. Both Haitian ex-President Henri Namphy and ex-Port-au-Prince Mayor Franck Romain were among Haitians from fallen governments who fled to the Dominican Republic and safety in 1988 and remained through 1989. A group of Haitian military officers who led an aborted coup attempt in April were allowed into the Dominican Republic in transit to the United States. Six members of the Basque separatist organization "ETA" received political asylum in the Dominican Republic in April. Despite subsequent requests from Spain, the Dominican Government stated that it would not extradite or return the six men.

The Constitution requires that all foreigners abstain from political activities while in the Dominican Republic. During 1989, the Avril Government in Haiti repeatedly complained that the Dominican Republic was being used by Haitian dissidents, especially those from the Duvalier regime, as a safehaven for antigovernment activity. However, the Dominican Government has insisted that it will enforce its prohibition, especially in asylum cases, of political activity by foreigners.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Dominican Republic is a functioning multiparty democracy in which governments are freely elected by the citizenry every 4 years by secret ballot. Opposition groups of the left, right, and center operate openly and participated in the 1986 elections in which nearly three-quarters of the registered electorate voted, selecting national, provincial, and municipal office holders. All major parties and a large number of smaller parties are involved in open and free campaigning for the next general election, scheduled for May 1990.

Although the bicameral Congress is similar in structure and representation to that of the United States, it exerts limited power in practice. The President uses the veto, broad discretion to act by decree, and his influence as the head of his party (which currently has an overwhelming majority in the Senate and a near majority in the Chamber of Deputies) to exercise principal influence in enacting laws and regulations. However, in its enactment of bills, the Congress does provide an open forum for the free exchange of views and debate. On rare occasions, the Congress successfully challenges the President.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The access of international human rights organizations is unrestricted. During 1989, AW visited the Dominican Republic twice to study the issue of Haitian seasonal workers. AW representatives freely met with a wide variety of people, including a number of government officials, and traveled throughout the country.

Private organizations which freely report and comment on human rights include the Dominican Human Rights Committee, the Dominican Union for the Defense of Human Rights, and the National Committee of Human and Labor Rights. The major labor confederations (which represent the principal regional and international labor organizations) also have offices and internal organizations which work with and for worker rights and on the Haitian agricultural workers' issue. There have been no credible reports that the Government has restricted entry to, or activities within, the Dominican Republic of these organizations.

The Dominican Republic participates actively in international and regional human rights bodies and supports efforts to promote human rights in international forums.

Discrimination based on sex and race is prohibited by law. Divorce is easily obtainable by either spouse, and women can hold property in their own names apart from their husbands. Nonetheless, women traditionally have not shared equal social and economic status or opportunity with men.

There is no officially sanctioned violence against women, although such violence, including domestic violence such as wife beating, does occur. However, a lack of statistical data makes it difficult to determine its actual extent. Human rights and women's rights groups do not consider violence against women to be one of their major concerns, and government policy generally reflects this attitude. During 1989, the Government did take several positive steps to protect women. For example, during the summer the police mounted an effective campaign to combat kidnap-for-rape crimes in Santo Domingo.

The Dominican populace is predominantly nonwhite (73 percent mixed and 11 percent black). For historical reasons and because of sharp cultural differences, there is a strain of prejudice against Haitians in Dominican society. This often translates into discrimination against those with darker skin (i.e., Haitian appearing) (see Section 2.d.). Dark-skinned Dominicans, including some of Haitian descent, have been successful in a variety of fields, including elected political office. Still, persons of Haitian descent ("Dominico-Haitianos") traditionally fill the lowest economic and social niches, in part because of concern about possible illegal status, a lack of skills, and problems with the language and culture. AW has reported that due to prejudicial attitudes, children of such persons often cannot obtain documents to prove their citizenship and therefore are unable to attend school. There is no evidence that children of Dominican citizens of Haitian descent have been unable to obtain such documentation or attend school.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides for the freedom to organize labor unions, and also for the rights of labor to strike and the private sector to lock out. However, unions operate under the handicap of a dated labor code (1951) that gives unions few rights vis-a-vis management and gives no effective protection for organizers or union officials. The labor code specifies in detail the steps required to constitute a legal union, federation, or confederation, and labor objects that the Government can use the failure to comply with every minute detail to withhold official recognition, as AW reports it has done with the Union of Cane-Cutters of Barahona, which applied in February 1988 to the Ministry of Labor and has not yet been recognized.

The labor code defines the right to strike but also denies the right to strike to workers in public services and prohibits general strikes. Nevertheless, professional organizations representing public service workers have not been deterred from strikes--including major work stoppages in 1989 by doctors, nurses, teachers, agronomists, and judges, as well as participation by many public workers in the June 1989 general strike. Although these strikes were illegal under the labor code, the Government negotiated with the striking parties. The ILO's COE in 1989 noted several deficiencies in the Dominican labor code, including the prohibition of sympathy strikes and political strikes.

Organized labor in the Dominican Republic represents about 12 percent of the work force and is divided among 8 competing and highly politicized confederations and a small number of independent unions. The confederations exercise only a limited degree of control or coordination over their affiliates and receive only minimal financial support from their members. An umbrella group to coordinate organized labor was formed in July 1989 as a result of the general strike, to negotiate on a sector-wide basis with the private sector on a variety of labor issues.

Labor groups represent the political/ideological spectrum, and several are associated with regional and international labor organizations. According to knowledgeable estimates based on the membership of Dominican organized labor, 32 percent were affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, 16 percent with the World Confederation of Labor, and 25 percent with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). An additional 22 percent were affiliated with the Communist regional trade union organization (CPUSTAL), apart from the WFTU. There have been no credible reports of the Government interfering in or restricting association with international labor organizations or activities.

Many of the labor groups are affiliated with political parties and frequently pursue partisan political objectives as much as workers' economic interests, but are independent of government control. The ailing economy and high unemployment and underemployment have hampered the growth of organized labor.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The labor code clearly stipulates that workers cannot be dismissed because of their trade union membership or activities. Still, there are complaints that these protections are ignored and that labor leaders are being discriminated against. Criticism is often directed at Article 69 of the code which essentially permits an employer to dismiss a worker without cause. The ILO's COE noted in 1989 that the Government still needed to strengthen measures protecting workers against antiunion discrimination.

Although the labor movement is growing and collective bargaining is increasing, both continue to be severely limited by the competition and fragmentation of labor and labor's scarce financial and manpower resources in difficult economic times. One of the fastest growing economic sectors is the industrial free trade zones which began in the late 1960's and now employ about 112,000 workers (5.5 percent of available jobs), representing the third largest source of employment after the Government and the sugar industry. The free trade zone labor force, over 70 percent female, is generally nonunionized. Although the labor code applies to free trade zones, in both 1988 and 1989 there were allegations that workers identified in applications for union recognition were dismissed from free trade zone companies shortly after the presentation of documents to the Secretariat of Labor. Labor union officials also charged that the Secretariat of Labor failed to act on formal applications for recognition of unions in the free trade zones within the required 30-day period.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law. There was no contract between the Governments of Haiti and the Dominican Republic to bring in Haitian cane cutters for the 1989 harvest. AW reported that in 1989, as in the past, Haitian laborers in the sugar cane fields, especially those in the country illegally, were subject to abusive living and working conditions and in some cases were forced to work against their will. AW charged that the Government (which controls a major part of the sugar industry through the parastatal corporation CEA) used military and police to round up Haitians and then compelled them to sign a sugar cane cutter contract or be deported. Some human rights groups report that they have documented cases of Dominicans of Haitian descent and Haitians residing legally in the country being subjected to this treatment. The issue has been under review for a number of years by ILO supervisory bodies. In the 1989 annual meeting, the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations expressed detailed concern about the situation of Haitians on the CEA plantations, and the ILO Conference adopted a "special paragraph" in its annual report critical of the Dominican Republic for violating ILO standards on forced labor.

In response to the AW report alleging that persons of Haitian origin were coerced to cut sugar cane against their will, President Balaguer said that the charges were purely political in nature. The Acting Foreign Secretary admitted that individual abuses may occur, but he affirmed that this in no way reflected Dominican Government policy. The CEA denied the charges, and the CEA director said that CEA does not and will not tolerate abuses towards Haitian workers.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Dominican labor code prohibits employment of youths under 14 years of age, and restricts the nighttime employment of youths aged 14 to 18. The labor code also provides that employees under age 18 work no more than 8 hours a day, and specifies that those 18 years and younger may not be employed in dangerous or unhealthy jobs. In practice, many of the restrictions in the labor code are ignored. Young people, including minors younger than 14 years of age, engage in a variety of work which technically violates the labor regulations. There are many youths in the informal economy, selling newspapers, washing car windows, shining shoes, or begging in the streets. The Dominican Government denied that it encouraged or deliberately permitted the illegal employment of youths. During the year, the Secretariat of Labor investigated the employment of youths in Santo Domingo and Santiago areas and enforced the law in cases where companies were found with underage workers or teens without proper permission. Some young workers obtained work permits and continued their employment. Those who were unable to obtain permits were released. Some companies were subjected to small fines for violating the law. The AW report charged that Haitian youths were being recruited and used to harvest sugar cane for CEA. The Episcopal Black Bishops' Conference, held in Santo Domingo in April, made a similar charge (see Section 6.c.).

The labor code establishes that all workers are entitled to 24 hours of rest after 6 days of work; in practice, a typical workweek is Monday through Friday plus half a day on Saturday. However, for manual and unskilled labor, longer hours are not unusual. Safety and health conditions at places of work do not always meet legal standards. The existing social security system does not apply to all workers and is underfunded; as a result benefits are low, payments often delayed, and medical care is limited and available only in the major cities.

Conditions among agricultural workers are in general much worse, with little rest and long hours during harvest and planting seasons. Some observers alleged that Haitian workers on CEA plantations are not allowed to eat or rest during the day at harvest time and are required to work significantly longer than the legal 48-hour week. The Government has responded that Haitians live under the same conditions as Dominicans doing equivalent work and has denied that it condones or permits mistreatment of workers. The CEA management has affirmed that it would punish any manager found mistreating workers.

In 1988 the Government, in response to terms worked out in church-sponsored talks including the government, labor, and business sectors to maintain real wages in the face of high inflation, raised the basic minimum monthly wage from $55 to $80. Some smaller businesses and agricultural workers were exempt from the new pay scale. As a result of the June general strike, the minimum wage for the public sector was raised in August 1989 from $64 to $80 a month. The general strike also led to negotiations between organized labor and business leaders to raise the private sector minimum wage. Business leaders unilaterally granted a raise from $80 to $104 a month in August, while negotiations continued. In October the Government's National Salary Committee officially raised the national private sector minimum wage to $104, the voluntary level offered by the private sector. However, after a threat of a national labor strike by seven of the eight national labor confederations, the Government and labor negotiated an additional raise of $7 to $111.

According to labor leaders and many private sector businessmen, the vast majority of workers receive only the minimum wage. The current $111 a month is not sufficient, even with high government subsidies on essential goods and services, to maintain a small family at a minimally acceptable standard of living. A report published in mid-1989 by a local economic study center concluded that real salaries had declined by 50 percent since 1970. A June 1989 study by a local retail association found that feeding a family of five at a subsistence level (assuming one meal a day, with inexpensive canned tuna as the only animal protein) would cost $137 a month.

ECUADOR

Ecuador is a constitutional republic with a president and 71-member unicameral Congress chosen in free elections. Members of the Supreme Court, chosen by Congress, preside over an independent judiciary. In 1989 Ecuador celebrated the 10th anniversary of its return to democracy after 7 years of military rule. Fourteen registered political parties, a free press, and numerous and active labor unions characterize an open and lively political system. President Rodrigo Borja of the Democratic Left party completed the first year of his 4-year term in August. Although the Popular Democracy (a Christian democratic party) withdrew its members from the executive branch coalition in July, it continues to cooperate with the President's party in the legislature, as does the small Communist party, the Broad Front of the Left (FADI). Congressional elections are currently scheduled for June 1990.

The President controls the police through the Ministry of Government. In 1989 there were few charges of police abuse of citizens for political reasons, although Ecuadorian human rights activists charge that lower level police officials sometimes resort to force during investigations of common crime.

A small group of violent leftwing terrorists, Alfaro Vive Carajo (AVC), that maintains links with the Colombian M-19 group, continues to operate in Ecuador. A few AVC members are in jail, having been sentenced for participation in violent crimes. Other AVC members were released from prison after completing their sentences. The Borja Administration and the AVC signed an accord in March 1989 in which the AVC agreed to integrate itself into legitimate political activity.

Ecuador has a basically free enterprise economic system although the Government controls petroleum production and export. Petroleum, agricultural products, and fish account for the bulk of exports. High foreign debt, unfavorable terms of trade for key export items, and extensive rural poverty, especially among highblood Indians, burdened the economy in 1989.

Most human rights were well respected by the Government in 1989. Problem areas included police or military mistreatment of suspects during criminal investigations, brutal prison conditions, lengthy detentions without charge, and faulty judicial procedures.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known political killings in Ecuador in 1989. Some human rights observers believe the killing by unknown assailants on September 6 of journalist Francisco "Pancho" Jaime, who published a satiric magazine in Guayaquil lampooning top politicians in Ecuador, was politically motivated. Others discount this, believing it was likely a personal matter. No arrests have been made in the case. One person was shot and killed during a January 9 demonstration in Quito, but it remains unclear who did the shooting. There were no cases of excessive use of force by police resulting in extrajudicial killings in 1989 as there were in previous years.

ECUADOR

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of disappearance attributable to government forces in 1989. Four of the cases still unresolved at the end of 1988 remain unresolved. The 1985 disappearance of Consuelo Benavides Cevallos led to a multiparty congressional investigation which concluded in 1989 that Benavides was killed within a week of her disappearance, and that the naval forces stationed in Esmeraldas Province probably were responsible for the disappearance and killing. The Supreme Court decided in 1989 not to hear the case brought by the Benavides family and recommended that a lower court hear the family's suit. That case was in progress in Esmeraldas at year's end.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture and other such forms of intimidation or punishment are prohibited by law, there are persistent credible reports that excessive force is used by lower level police officials, particularly against youthful suspects during investigations of common crimes. There have been no instances in recent years of police officials being tried and punished for such conduct.

Prison conditions continue to be so brutal as themselves to constitute cruel and inhuman treatment. Beatings for disciplinary purposes are common. Use of solitary confinement in an arbitrary manner as a disciplinary measure also continues, although the Director of Prisons indicated to human right activists his intention to end the practice.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention without charge. The criminal code provides for a judicial determination of the legality of detention and requires that arrested persons must be charged within 48 hours of arrest. In practice, some suspects are held substantially longer than 48 hours before being charged. Five members of the AVC, who were being held without charge in connection with a 1985 murder case, were released in October; they had been imprisoned since 1985. Preventive detention is limited to 48 hours by law. In 1989 there were no cases of arrest for crimes which could be construed as political. Forced exile is not practiced.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Congress elects the Supreme Court and has the power to impeach judges, to set the budget of the judicial branch, and to ratify the Supreme Court's judicial review decisions. From time to time, the Supreme Court investigates allegations of judicial inefficiency or improprieties and may remove judges of lower courts. In November the Congress enacted a law granting authority to remove lower court judges to provincial courts.

The autonomous Constitutional Guarantees Tribunal (TGC) is composed of representatives named by the President, the Congress, the judiciary, municipalities, business, and labor. The TGC is empowered by the Constitution to investigate breaches of constitutional or human rights. The TGC submits its findings to Congress but has no statutory power to enforce sanctions. Military courts may try only those cases involving infractions of military regulations or acts against military installations.

As in most civil law systems there is no trial by jury; judges play a central role in deciding guilt or innocence. In theory, defendants have the right to counsel as soon as arrested, although in practice this can take time and depends on defendants' economic resources. They can call witnesses on their own behalf, cross-examine all witnesses, refrain from testifying against themselves, and appeal to higher courts. Although a public defender system is mandated by the Constitution, the quality, reliability, and availability of the defenders are inconsistent.

Due to both inefficiency and corruption, detainees often face extended periods of pretrial detention after being charged and tried. Time spent awaiting trial and sentencing counts toward completion of the final sentence, but some long-term detainees have been found innocent, and, because of incompetent defense, many prisoners never see their final sentences reduced concomitantly. The poor and other disadvantaged groups who cannot afford to hire private lawyers usually face the longest periods of pretrial detention.

According to some human rights activists and political figures, corruption charges against Abdala Bucaram (President Rodrigo Borja's opponent in the 1988 presidential campaign and mayor of Guayaquil in the mid-1980's) as well as the ongoing suit against the son-in-law of former President Febres-Cordero are politically motivated, and demonstrate that the Ecuadorian legal system is open to political manipulation.

There were no political prisoners in 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Police are required to have a warrant to enter a private home or business except in cases of hot pursuit. The police generally respect the sanctity of private homes and correspondence, although there have been cases of illegal entry in past years. Police surveillance is permitted and used in practice in criminal investigations. No specific cases of illegal surveillance or entry were reported in 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and communication and this is respected in practice. Most of the major media organs--television, print and radio--are in private hands, although the Government owns one radio network. The Government occasionally requires television and radio to broadcast government programs featuring the President and requires newspapers to carry a minimum amount of news prepared by the National Secretariat of Social Communication.

The media are lively and open, and represent the spectrum of political opinion from conservative to Communist. There are two major dailies in the capital, three in the principal commercial center, Guayaquil, and more than 20 additional papers published daily throughout the country. There are also numerous newsmagazines published in Ecuador. There are four national television networks and over 400 radio stations, as well as programming from the United States available in Ecuador by cable, all of which operate freely, without censorship.

There is no evidence of government interference with academic freedom.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the rights of free assembly and association for peaceful purposes, rights which are generally respected in practice. Public rallies require prior approval (which is generally granted unless public order or safety are threatened) from local government agencies.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it relates to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Citizens are free to practice the religion of their choice. There is no official state religion, although the population is nominally over 90 percent Roman Catholic. There are active Protestant and Jewish communities in the major cities. The Constitution prohibits discrimination against persons for religious reasons, although members of the clergy of any religious faith are barred from election to the Congress, the presidency, or vice presidency. Foreign-based religious orders are active in Ecuador and generally have cooperative relations with the Government.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides all citizens the right to travel freely throughout the country, choose their place of residence, and depart from and reenter Ecuador freely. These rights are respected in practice. Persons from other countries have readily found asylum in Ecuador. Some human rights activists and lawyers report that Ecuadorian immigration authorities have occasionally not respected the right of foreigners in deportation proceedings. No cases of forced resettlement were reported in 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Following 7 years of military rule, free and open democratic elections for president took place in 1979, 1984, and 1988. Congressional elections take place every 2 years, with the next scheduled for June 1990. There are currently 14 political parties legally registered in Ecuador, including 2 Communist parties--the Soviet-oriented FADI and the more extreme Popular Democratic Movement (MPD) (more sympathetic to the Chinese Communist Party), both of which are represented in Congress. In total, 11 of the 14 registered parties are currently represented in the legislature. Voting is mandatory for literate citizens over 18 years of age, and voluntary for the illiterate. Active duty members of the military service, according to the Constitution, may not vote. All citizens, regardless of sex, religion, socioeconomic status, or ethnic origin, have the right to form and join political parties.

ECUADOR

Only legally registered political parties can present candidates for election, and a candidate has to be a member of a legally registered party to stand for election.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In 1989 there were no reports of lack of cooperation by the administration of President Rodrigo Borja with either domestic or international human rights groups. There were complaints that lower level security officials occasionally did not cooperate in reviews of specific human rights cases. However, human rights observers agree that at the political level government officials are normally cooperative and often try to resolve problems which occur in the first instance at lower levels.

The organizations most active in monitoring human rights in Ecuador during 1989 were the Ecuadorian Ecumenical Commission on Human Rights, the Latin American Human Rights Association (ALDHU, headquartered in Quito), and the Ecuadorian Congressional Commission on Human Rights.

Although the Constitution specifically outlaws discrimination for racial, religious, linguistic, gender, political, or social reasons, in practice such discrimination does occur. There is no overt or legally sanctioned discrimination against these groups, but historically the urban poor have been and remain predominantly black, Indian, or of mixed ethnic background. The vast majority of the Indian population is rural and poor. Indigenous groups complained that government programs encouraging economic development and migration to sparsely populated areas traditionally inhabited by various Indian tribes are destroying indigenous cultural and economic life. The Government promotes colonization in the Oriente, which has the effect of negating the land rights of the indigenous people of the region. This colonization process reflects a desire on the part of some in the Government to fortify the frontier with Peru. Other government agencies are attempting to establish mechanisms to ensure that the rights of the Indian population are protected, but to date these efforts have been only minimally successful, if at all.

Even though some changes in law in 1987 and 1989 granted additional rights to women in the areas of property, divorce, and inheritance, women still suffer discrimination under civil law. No recent data on women in the Ecuadorian work force are available but women's rights activists agree that women's wage rates are lower than men's even in the same occupation.

Violence against women probably occurs with greater frequency than is reported in the media or in official data. Wife beating is believed to be common but is rarely reported. Wife beating is not prohibited by law. Human rights groups believe that in this male-dominated traditional society, women are either afraid or ashamed to report rapes when they occur. In addition, until recently, Ecuadorian men had the legal right to beat a female relative caught in an "illicit" sexual act. In 1989 there were no official government programs designed to address the problem of violence against women.

ECUADOR

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers by law enjoy the right of association in forming and belonging to trade unions, as well as the right to strike. The only limitation on these rights is the prohibition against unionization for the military, police, and those government employees (the vast majority) who are covered by the Ecuadorian Administrative Code. (Public employees covered by the Ecuadorian Work Code do have the right to form unions and to strike).

Approximately 12 to 15 percent of the labor force is unionized. There are four large labor centrals or confederations, and numerous unaffiliated unions, some of which are quite effective, such as the National Drivers' Federation. Unions are free of government control and are free to join international labor organizations. The Confederation of Free Trade Union Organizations is affiliated to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

In a rare instance, the Government took into custody the president of the National Drivers Federation in an attempt to break a June strike, but the union leader was only held for 48 hours and the strike took place anyway.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) reiterated its observation that several of the provisions of Ecuador's labor code are incompatible with ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. Among them: prohibitions on public employees forming trade unions; the requirement that members of works councils' executive committees be Ecuadorian; dissolution of a works council when union membership falls below 25%; prohibition of unions participating in political or religious activities; and the penalty of imprisonment for instigators of collective work stoppages. The Government's failure to bring its legislation into compliance with Convention 87 and Convention 105 on forced labor (see below) was the subject of a "special paragraph" in the report of the Committee on Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CACR) to the 1989 International Labor Conference.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

All private employers with more than 15 employees who belong to a union or employees' association are obliged by the Labor Code to negotiate collectively when the union so requests. This broad right does not extend to most public sector employees, nor to management in certain entities with social or public objectives, "nor to employees of entities financed by municipal or central government taxes, tariffs, or subsidies." The Labor Code prohibits discrimination against unions, and requires that employers provide space for union activities if the union requests. However, the report of the ILO's COE, cited above, noted Ecuadorian law does not provide protection against antiunion activity at the time of recruitment.

The Labor Code provides for resolution of labor conflicts through an Arbitration and Conciliation Board which consists of the labor inspector of the Ministry of Labor, two representatives named by the workers, and two named by the employer. Participation in this arbitration process is voluntary, and strikes and lockouts are permitted even while arbitration is under way.

The ICFTU executive board in May 1989 resolved to ask the ICFTU general secretary to lodge a complaint with the ILO against the Government of Ecuador for its actions in connection with a strike against the National Brewers Company because these actions "contribute to flagrant disregard for recognized international labor standards." Some observers within Ecuador's labor movement, however, are not in agreement that the employer is guilty of "flagrant disregard."

The labor law is enforced uniformly throughout the country; there are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Compulsory labor is prohibited under the Constitution as well as the Labor Code. In 1989 there were no reports of forced labor. The ILO's COE called on the Government to repeal Decree 105, which provides punishment, including compulsory labor, for anyone who participates in a work stoppage.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Persons of less than 14 years of age are prohibited by law from working, except in special circumstances such as apprenticeships. Those between ages 14 and 18 are required to have parental or guardian permission to work. In practice, in rural areas and in the active informal economy which is particularly evident in major cities, many children under the age of 14 work in family-owned businesses, as shoeshiners, street peddlers, or on family-owned farms. Rudimentary enforcement mechanisms exist but are totally inadequate.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Labor Code provides for a 40-hour workweek, a 15-day annual vacation, a minimum wage, and employer-provided benefits. The minimum wage was recently raised to approximately $47 per month. This minimum wage is not sufficient to provide a decent standard of living for a worker and his family. Many must supplement the minimum wage with income from other sources. Employers are responsible for maintaining safe and clean working conditions. The Social Security Institute is responsible for enforcement, which is generally adequate.

EL SALVADOR

El Salvador has a freely elected democratic government, with an executive branch headed by a president, a unicameral legislative assembly, and an independent, but politically appointed, judiciary. On June 1, for the first time in Salvadoran history, civilian control of the government passed from one political party to another following free and fair elections. Alfredo Cristiani of the Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA) party assumed the Presidency from the incumbent, Jose Napoleon Duarte of the Christian Democrats (PDC).

The Armed Forces of El Salvador (ESAF) total 56,000, including some 11,500 members of the police forces. There are three national police entities, usually referred to as the security forces: the National Police, the National Guard, and the Treasury Police. The security forces are considered part of the armed forces. The National Police, National Guard, and Treasury Police report to the Vice Minister of Defense for Public Security.

El Salvador has a mixed economy, and private property is generally respected. The country's economy is predominantly agricultural. Coffee accounts for 65 percent of foreign exchange earnings. The economy has experienced 6 years of modest growth, despite losses of nearly $2 billion caused by an armed insurgency. The Farabundo Marti Front for National Liberation (FMLN) follows a strategy of seeking to disrupt the operations of the economy: it holds traffic bans which disrupt normal commercial activity; it extorts "war taxes" to raise income; and it has increasingly resorted to sabotage of economic targets. The group's stated goal is to worsen economic conditions in order to turn the population against the elected government. The FMLN's November 1989 offensive, during which attacks were focused on San Salvador and other urban areas, caused nearly $20 million worth of damage to economic enterprises and infrastructure.

The FMLN has been engaged in an armed insurgency since 1980, dedicated to the violent overthrow of governments now regularly established through democratic processes. The FMLN has an estimated 6,000 full-time combatants backed by a network of front groups, part-time militia, and urban commando cells. During much of 1989 the FMLN pursued a public policy of attempting to make the country "ungovernable" through increased urban bombings and assassinations of intellectuals, newspaper columnists, civilian employees of the military, former FMLN members, mayors, and government ministers and their families. The FMLN sought to thwart the democratic elections in March by threatening the lives of those who administered the election process and those who transported voters to the polling places, and rejected a government cease-fire during the election period. On the political front, the FMLN offered in January and in September two proposals to negotiate an end to the conflict. For the first time the FMLN dropped demands for power sharing and acknowledged the validity of elections as a means to power; it specifically called for postponement of the March elections. FMLN insistence on an unconstitutional delay in the elections and its refusal to accept the Government's cease-fire proposal made agreement on a proposal impossible. In September the FMLN made a new proposal; shortly thereafter the Government and the FMLN agreed to permanent monthly meetings in an attempt to reach an end to the conflict and the FMLN's incorporation into political life. Meetings were held in September and in October. On November 11, the FMLN launched a nationwide offensive which left over 3,000 guerrillas, soldiers, and civilians dead and thousands more wounded. Nevertheless, the government delegation went to Caracas for the scheduled November 20 negotiating session, but the FMLN did not show up.

As the insurgency gathered strength in the early 1980's, members of the security forces repeatedly violated the human rights of their fellow citizens and were unquestionably involved in widespread death squad activities. Although abuses continue, successful investigation and prosecution efforts now mean that military personnel, including officers, cannot count themselves immune to prosecution. In March 1989 the military turned over two officers, three noncommissioned officers, and six soldiers to civilian authorities for prosecution resulting from the September 1988 massacre of 10 civilians in San Sebastian. In May an active duty officer in the armed forces was found guilty and sentenced for the 1987 murder of three men. In January 1990, Colonel Guillermo Alfredo Benavides Moreno, Commandant of the Military Academy and Overall Commander of units providing security to the Academy area, along with two lieutenants, a sub-lieutenant, and five other soldiers, was held in custody and charged with the slayings of six Jesuit priests, a housekeeper, and her daughter on the campus of the University of Central America on November 16.

Statistics kept by the American Embassy, aggregated for only the first 8 months of the year, do not show an increase in civilian political killings. Nevertheless, rightwing vigilantism continued to be a serious human rights concern. While intense investigation of some notable cases has produced information useful to the prosecution, in many cases it was unclear who the perpetrators were--rightwing vigilantes, the security forces, the FMLN, or common criminals taking advantage of the violent environment that has characterized the country in recent years.

The judicial process continued to be hindered by archaic procedures, inadequate facilities, intimidation of judges, and corruption. The FMLN's assassination of the Attorney General in April was an additional blow. Unfortunately, there was little progress in the prosecution of some key human rights cases during 1989. Although the military leadership showed somewhat greater cooperation in investigations of reported human rights abuses by members of the military, this attitude was not reflected in the lower ranks of the ESAF, where cooperation with civilian investigators is, at best, erratic or problematic.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The assassinations of the Jesuits, the Attorney General, and the Minister of the Presidency were among the numerous political and extrajudicial killings occurring during the year. Discerning a trend or pattern in the level of such violence is always difficult, the more so in 1989 with a guerrilla offensive beginning in November. The collection and classification of information on politically motivated killings is inexact, and general numbers can only indicate trends in violence over time in comparison with past reports using a consistent methodology. Common criminal murders, for example, can easily be disguised as political killings by perpetrators wishing to confound investigators; at the same time, a political motive in other murders may go undetected, causing them to be classified as common crimes.

The November FMLN offensive precluded a satisfactory count of political killings through the end of the year. Through August, the number of deaths reported in the Salvadoran press which may have been politically motivated averaged 17 per month; this compares with a monthly average of 19 in 1988, 23 in 1987, 22 in 1986, 28 in 1985, 64 in 1984, 140 in 1983, 219 in 1982, 444 in 1981, and 750 in 1980. Given the isolation of some rural areas, it is likely that the press does not report the full number of civilian deaths.

Of the 138 apparently politically motivated killings of noncombatants during the first 8 months of the year, 64 appear clearly to have been perpetrated by the FMLN, with another 16 probably attributed to them; 14 killings were attributed to military personnel; and in 2 cases there was insufficient evidence to designate the likely assailants. Included among the 138 victims were 42 civilians reportedly killed in combat action between the FMLN and the El Salvador military.

In statistics maintained by the U.S. Embassy on unexplained murders in which a political motive, though not apparent could not be excluded, these deaths decreased from an average of 21 per month during 1988 to an average of 16 per month during the first 8 months of 1989. A breakdown of these statistics showed that in the period after the March election the monthly average was 13, compared to 21 in January through March.

There continued to be reports of noncombat killings attributed to the military and police. On July 24 the ESAF announced the deaths of two young men, Hector Miranda Marroquin and Lucio Parada, who were in the custody of the Atlacatl Battalion beyond the legally allowed 72-hour detention period. The military high command ordered an investigation into the deaths and two soldiers were charged with the murders; the first is in custody and the other fled to avoid arrest. The second suspect charged, in a statement given when he was outside of the country, that his actions were directed by a death squad which operated out of the Armed Forces' First Brigade. The First Brigade denied the charges, and the case remained under investigation at year's end.

On August 22, a member of the Atlacatl Battalion killed a 17-year-old high school student in an apparent accident. The ESAF apologized to the family and charged the soldier responsible. In another case in August, members of the military detachment in Sonsonate killed one student and wounded seven. The Chief of the Joint Staff apologized to the parents and promised to bring the guilty soldiers (who claimed to believe that the students were FMLN members setting up a roadblock) to justice. Although an investigation was under way, by year's end no soldiers had been detained.

On November 16, 1989, six Jesuits, their housekeeper, and her daughter were murdered on the Central American University campus (UCA). The victims were Father Ignacio Ellacuria, the UCA's Rector; Father Segundo Montes, Director of the UCA's Human Rights Institute; Father Ignacio Martin Baro; Father

Amando Lopez; Father Joaquin Lopez y Lopez; Father Juan Ramon Moreno Pardo; and Mrs. Elba Julia Ramos and her daughter, Celina Ramos. The Government initiated a thoroughgoing investigation employing the forensic expertise of the U.S.-supported Special Investigative Unit. President Cristiani offered a $250,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of those involved and asked for assistance from the United States, Great Britain, Spain, and Canada in the investigation. Autopsies were conducted and a full range of ballistics tests were run on the recovered bullets and shells. Testimony was taken from military personnel and civilians who were polygraphed to evaluate the veracity of their information. At the beginning of 1990, nine soldiers of the Atlacatl Battalion, including a colonel and two lieutenants, were in legal custody for the killings. President Cristiani expressed the determination of the Government to take the case beyond investigation to prosecution and conviction of the wrongdoers.

On election day, three journalists died in unrelated incidents. Dutch cameraman Corneil Lagreuw died while filming a firefight between the military and the guerrillas. He was struck by stray bullets. Lagreuw's film shows him to be directly behind a guerrilla position. During the subsequent attempt by fellow journalists to get him to emergency medical care, a military helicopter repeatedly fired at the vehicle he was being transported in, hitting no one but impeding the vehicle's progress. The ESAF acknowledged its actions but explained that the pilots thought the vehicle was transporting fleeing combatants. Another journalist was killed by Air Force soldiers manning a roadblock near the Ilopango air base. The soldiers in this case have been charged with murder and were awaiting trial at year's end. A third journalist died in the eastern city of San Miguel; apparently his vehicle ran a roadblock before dawn on election day. The Minister of Defense and the Chief of the Joint Staff initiated a thorough review of the military's procedures for dealing with the press in the field and issued new guidance to the military on these procedures.

A special military honor board headed by the Minister of Defense in March found evidence that 11 ESAF members, including two officers, were culpable in the September 1988 killings of 10 civilians at San Sebastian. The soldiers and officers were turned over to civilian authorities for prosecution. At year's end, the investigative phase of the prosecution was nearly complete, and the ESAF members remained in detention awaiting trial.

In 1989 various groups charged that formal paramilitary death squads were operating again. Not since 1984, however, have there been any publicly acknowledged death squad killings by ultra-rightwing groups, as there were in earlier years. While some human rights groups continue to attribute certain political killings to "death squads," many of these deaths are likely the result of individual acts of rightwing vigilantism rather than of organized paramilitary death squads as existed before 1984. One case drew special attention and grave concern. On April 5 Maria Cristina Gomez, a school teacher and member of the National Teacher's Union (ANDES), was kidnaped by unidentified persons in a Jeep Cherokee wagon as she was leaving her school in Ilopango. Later that day, her body was discovered near a cemetery. An autopsy showed she had been severely tortured and raped before being shot four times. Her murder bore many of the characteristics of the death squad killings of the early 1980's. Members of her union charged the Air Force (which had security responsibilities in the area) with responsibility, which it denied. By year's end there had been no progress in identifying her assailants or the motive for her abduction and death.

Ten persons were killed and 30 wounded in the October 31 bombing of the labor union FENASTRAS's headquarters. The Secretary General of the union, Febe Elizabeth Velasquez, was among the dead (see Section 2.b.).

Killings by the FMLN, especially of prominent figures, escalated during the last 9 months of the year. The April 9 assassination of Attorney General Roberto Garcia Alvarao dealt a severe blow to the legal system, as the Attorney General is the chief prosecutor of human rights cases in the country. By year's end, there had been no progress made in the investigation of his murder. The June 9 assassination of the Minister of the Presidency, Jose Antonio Rodriguez Porth, raised additional concern in the Government and country. He and his butler, both unarmed, were killed in the driveway of his private residence. The home of then Vice President-elect Francisco Merino was bombed on April 14. The FMLN took responsibility for the April bombing and the killing of the Attorney General, and is widely believed to be responsible for the murder of Rodriguez Porth. The FMLN took credit for or is believed to be responsible for the June 26 killing of National Fire Chief Roberto Armando Rivera, the October 10 killings of the wife and son of a conservative newspaper editor, the October 17 murder of the 21-year-old daughter of an army colonel, and the November 28 assassination of Francisco "Chachi" Guerrero, the immediate past president of the Supreme Court of Justice and a former foreign minister.

During the year, the FMLN threatened to kill 214 of the 262 mayors in El Salvador. As part of its preelection campaign of intimidation, the FMLN killed 1 governor and 10 mayors, and forced the resignation of more than 90 other mayors. On March 15 Francisco Peccorini, a 75-year-old American citizen and former Jesuit priest, was murdered by the FMLN because of his criticism of guerrilla infiltration of the National University. Miguel Castellanos, a former guerrilla who renounced violence in 1985, was assassinated by the FMLN in February. Edgar Chacon, a conservative political columnist, was killed on June 30. Guerillmo Payes, a member of Chacon's conservative research institution, was also assassinated in July. Carlos Ernesto Mendoza, the editor of a journal critical of the FMLN, lost his arm but survived an April bomb attack. The FMLN may also have assassinated the five Salvadoran journalists who died at the National Information Center during the November offensive.

In other killings attributed to the FMLN, many victims were rural residents who refused to collaborate with the guerrillas or were suspected of being government informers. On May 22, the FMLN killed eight civilians by blowing up a van near Tacachico. There are also credible reports of civilians being taken from buses and killed by guerrillas. In addition the FMLN's use of car-bombs and homemade mortars in urban areas caused at least three civilian deaths.

b. Disappearance

The Constitution and government policy forbids unacknowledged detention by the security or military services. However, there continue to be credible charges of persons who disappeared after having been taken away by members of the army or security forces. In relatively few cases are "disappeared" persons never accounted for; most of the time their detention is eventually acknowledged or family members find them in some other way.

On August 19, Sara Cristina Chan Chan and Juan Francisco Massi disappeared from in front of a factory near the Ilopango Air Force base and have not been seen or heard from since. Family members say that many witnesses identified members of the Air Force as having abducted the two. The Air Force denies ever having detained them.

On June 3, Marta Guzman disappeared after leaving the offices of the National Union of Displaced Earthquake Victims. She was a leader in the organization. There were no witnesses to her disappearance. She has never reappeared, nor has her body been discovered. Members of her organization believe that the armed forces may have been involved.

A series of disappearances were reported in July and August in the department of Santa Ana. Four persons connected with the National University campus in Santa Ana disappeared in that period. Cecilia del Carmen Rodriguez, a professor, was abducted on July 11 by unknown armed individuals; she was freed on August 29. David Antonio Guevara Toledo, a student, was kidnaped on August 6 and reappeared on August 31. Jose Adolfo Lima and Santiago Martinez Centeno, also students at the University in Santa Ana, disappeared on August 11. They reappeared on August 31. Lima and Martinez claimed they had been tortured and threatened with death. All accused the army's Second Brigade, based in Santa Ana, of kidnaping and holding them against their will. The commanding officer denied responsibility for their disappearances. Their kidnapers have not been apprehended, nor was there any evidence of an active investigation in the case as of the year's end.

According to press reports, a total of 56 civilians disappeared between January and August, but this figure includes nonpolitical disappearances such as lost or runaway children aged 10 or over. Persons who desert their families, emigrate, or join guerrilla ranks may account for some of the disappearances. In addition, many persons reported missing by family members often were found later to have been legally arrested and appropriately reported to human rights organizations, particularly to the Government's Human Rights Commission (CDH). During the same period, the press reported that 153 persons were abducted by the guerrillas, and 17 others by unknown assailants.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were many charges and reports of abuse by the security services, with most asserting both physical and psychological torture. Alleged abuses include deprivation of food and sleep, threats against the detainee or his family, prolonged interrogation while blindfolded, being forced to stand for long periods of time, forced exercise, and blows to the ears. Almost all prisoners arrested for membership in the FMLN claim to have been forced to sign confessions without being permitted to read them. Instances of severe beatings, rape, choking, use of a hood to asphyxiate, injection with unidentified drugs, and electric shock were also reported.

While there are confirmed cases of torture and mistreatment of prisoners by members of the security services, it is not believed that there is a government policy that permits or condones torture or mistreatment of prisoners. When a complaint of mistreatment appears credible, the CDH reports the incident to the commander of the unit responsible and to the Ministry of Defense. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) also reports its findings, based on interviews with prisoners and ex-prisoners or on information from other confidential sources, to the President and Minister of Defense. The absence of a military justice system means that those offenders whom the military will not publicly identify are seldom, if ever, subject to the civilian courts. Notably, in March a lieutenant was convicted for the August 1987 killing of three men in Santa Ana, and in September he was sentenced to 30 years in jail. Charges against two enlisted men implicated in the case had been dismissed in 1988.

On June 12 the Treasury Police arrested Jose Tomas Mazariego, a labor activist. He was released on June 15 before the legal 72-hour detention period expired. He immediately alleged that he had been tortured by the police while in custody, claiming that acid was poured on his knees and ankles. A CDH doctor who examined him when he was released determined that he had not been tortured with acid, though his knees did reveal lacerations that may have been caused by repeated bruising or scraping.

In recent years, there have been few allegations of mistreatment of prisoners in El Salvador's prisons, which are administered and staffed by Justice Ministry personnel. No verifiable instances of torture occurred in the penitentiaries in 1989. Guerrilla prisoners, a total of 89 at the end of September, are distributed throughout the prison system and are treated as common criminals.

Human rights instruction is a formal and regular part of police recruit training and officers' classes. The CDH, the ICRC, and Catholic clergy give regularly scheduled courses on human rights for police, military, and civil defense personnel.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The criminal code prohibits terrorism, insurgency, and other actions against the stability of the State, but persons arrested for those offenses are afforded the same legal protection as common criminals. Judges and nonjudicial authorities, most often security force officers, are empowered to issue arrest warrants, which must be in writing. The Constitution requires that all persons detained by the police be turned over to the courts within 72 hours or be freed. This guarantee has been applicable since the state of emergency was ended in 1987. Following the initiation of the November FMLN offensive, however, the National Assembly enacted a state of siege which authorizes the extension from 72 hours to 15 days the period of allowable detention before an initial judicial determination is made. Arrests without apparent sufficient cause do occur, but incommunicado detention beyond the permitted period is not common and, when it has occurred, it has usually been the result of a detention in the field by an operating military unit.

EL SALVADOR

Holding political views opposed to those of the Government is not justification for arrest unless the suspect advocates violence. The courts have held that membership in a front organization controlled by the guerrillas is not in itself sufficient reason for holding an arrestee, although membership in one of the guerrilla groups is.

The Salvadoran security and armed forces are required to register detainees and have them examined by a doctor or nurse upon entry into police facilities. In insurgency-related arrests, they are required to notify promptly the family of the detainee, Tutela Legal, CDH, and the ICRC. The registration, notification, and arraignment procedures, together with the official prohibition on mistreatment of prisoners, continued to be generally enforced in an effort to eliminate mistreatment by government authorities.

From January to August 1989, the security forces detained 3,113 persons, including 168 foreigners, on suspicion of subversive offenses. Of that number, close to two-thirds were subsequently released by the police and never formally charged; 578 were consigned to the courts; and the remainder were hospitalized, deported, sent to the juvenile facility, or had their cases disposed of in another manner.

In the days following the start of the FMLN November offensive, the ESAF searched the facilities of several independent organizations, including churches and other humanitarian organizations. Twenty-five incidents involving the facilities of church groups occurred during the first 2 weeks of the offensive, when ESAF units were investigating leads relating to arms caches or other indications of support for the FMLN. Several dozen church workers, mostly Catholics, Lutherans, and Episcopalians, were arrested during this period. The overwhelming majority of religious institutions and facilities were not affected. Responding to domestic and international concerns that the searches and arrests were being carried out in an arbitrary manner, President Cristiani ordered the ESAF to prohibit field units from searching the offices of any religious, political, labor, or other humanitarian group without the specific authorization of the military high command. After that order in late November, one church facility was searched.

During the arraignment proceedings, the judge may order the accused further detained for up to 72 hours (or 15 days under the state of emergency) to determine if the evidence warrants holding the accused for trial. This time limit is normally, but not without exception, adhered to in practice. The judge is then legally constrained to a time limit of 120 days for investigating serious crimes, and 45 days for lesser offenses, before bringing the accused to trial or dismissing the case. In practice, however, these limitations are rarely followed, primarily due to the backlog of cases. All persons held in the prison system, however, are incarcerated by judicial order, if not by sentence.

As a recourse against illegal detention, anyone can, from the time it appears a court will issue an arrest warrant until the trial is completed and a sentence is carried out, request that an appeals court or the Supreme Court review the legal basis for the detention. Such an appeal freezes action on the case until the higher court has rendered its decision.

EL SALVADOR

The Government does not recognize the FMLN as a belligerent power and so does not accord prisoner-of-war status to captured guerrillas; captured guerrillas are turned over to the civilian court system for criminal prosecution. In the case of a group of war-wounded and handicapped FMLN ex-combatants who occupied the National Cathedral and later the Mexican Embassy, the Salvadoran Government allowed them to leave the country to take advantage of offers of free medical care by passing an amnesty in the National Assembly. Forty-six of them departed for Cuba in October.

There are no provisions in the law for exile. Many leaders of the FMLN claim to be in exile, but it is self-imposed. Some of them could, however, be subject to arrest in El Salvador for participation in guerrilla operations if they were to return. Revolutionary Democratic Front (FDR a formal political ally of the FMLN) leader Reuben Zamora, who returned in 1988 from such an exile, left again in late 1989, alleging that the Government's vigorous counter-offensive against the FMLN placed him in jeopardy. He had earlier in the year been an active campaigner for his party in the March presidential election. Mr. Zamora returned to El Salvador in early 1990.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution stipulates that the judiciary, the Attorney General's office, and the Solicitor General's office (public defenders) are independent of the rest of the Government and each other. The Legislative Assembly chooses the Supreme Court justices for 5-year terms, the Attorney General for a 3-year term, and the Solicitor General for a 3-year term. The Constitution establishes the regular court system and provides for a special system should the Legislative Assembly enact a state of exception. The Assembly enacted legislation to invoke an indefinite state of exception on November 13, following the initiation of the FMLN offensive; under its terms, security forces are allowed to detain FMLN suspects for 15 days for interrogation before consigning them to the courts. The state of exception remained in effect as of year's end.

The Constitution provides that a person accused of a crime may have a lawyer present upon being arraigned, but the right is seldom used, probably because few arrestees can afford to hire a private attorney. Court-appointed attorneys are not generally available to a defendant until the investigative phase is over and the judge determines there is sufficient evidence to enter the final, or plenary, stage of the trial. The defendant has a right to be present in court and to confront the witnesses that testify against him. All trial records of adults are open to the public unless the judge rules that the case be kept confidential. An appeal process exists and is used regularly.

Most major crimes in El Salvador are tried publicly before a five-person jury. Absences of attorneys, the destruction of many court buildings in the October 1986 earthquake, and a practically nonfunctioning jury identification and notification system hinder the ability of the judicial system to process cases expeditiously. Corruption and intimidation by political extremists are also factors. As a result, only 10 percent of the 2,058 prison inmates in September were serving sentences; the rest were awaiting adjudication of their cases. Bail is available for some minor offenses, but is seldom used. Prisoners are usually incarcerated for 6 to 18 months from the time they are charged until they are brought to trial, and even longer waits are common.

Historically, civilian judicial authority has not extended to the military officer corps. Many low-ranking members of the military and police have been discharged and turned over to the civilian courts for trial on criminal charges, but, traditionally, officers of the armed and security forces have been treated differently from other citizens before the law. Judges are frequently reluctant to bring charges against them, and colleagues often fail to cooperate in the prosecution of crimes imputed to a fellow officer. This pattern began to change in 1989 with efforts to prosecute a major and a lieutenant accused of the 1988 San Sebastian killings and the conviction and sentencing of Lieutenant Rivas in the murders in Santa Ana (Section 1.a.).

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government generally does not interfere arbitrarily in the personal lives of citizens, although the Constitution allows it the right to intervene when it believes national security is threatened. Both the Government and the guerrillas use networks of informants. According to the Constitution, before entering a private dwelling the security forces must have the inhabitant's consent, a judicial warrant, or reasonable belief that a crime is being or will be committed. In practice, the security forces often use forced entry to carry out arrests and investigations. Government forces often intercept mail deliveries in the conflictive zones. Wiretapping of telephone communications by the Government, the FMLN, private individuals, and political parties is widespread. The Government was accused in late November of indiscriminately entering the premises of religious and humanitarian organizations, conducting mass arrests, and seizing property found on the premises. Government officials asserted that military forces were acting on intelligence reports, indicating that either such premises or some of the individuals therein were acting on behalf of the FMLN.

The guerrillas arbitrarily interfere with the lives of inhabitants in the conflictive zones, expropriating food and medical supplies, intercepting mail, and often forcing villagers to attend indoctrination sessions. They engage in forced recruitment either to fill their ranks or to obtain laborers and porters. FMLN committees exercise a high degree of control over the villages set up by refugees who return from camps in Honduras, an extension of their control inside those camps. The people usually comply with the FMLN demands, because the guerrillas regularly back up their threats by killing those who fail to cooperate.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

There were new claims in 1989 of improper Air Force bombings near civilian populations that caused civilian deaths. Following President Duarte's 1984 guidelines, the Air Force claims to refrain from attacking guerrilla concentrations and installations when civilians are nearby. However, there are credible charges from people in the countryside which contradict this claim, especially in Chalatenango, Cabanas, and Morazan departments, where there have been military ground operations which received close air support from the Air Force. There were no reported civilian casualties as a result of this activity in rural areas during 1989.

During the November FMLN offensive, the guerrillas took positions in the working class neighborhoods north and east of San Salvador, using innocent civilians as shields against Army and Air Force counterattacks. The FMLN set up fortified positions in civilian housing complexes and used private homes as command headquarters or sniper posts. In many instances, confirmed by diplomatic officials and the international media, the guerrillas did not allow the civilian residents to evacuate these areas. This tactic was designed to provide a shield and maximize the number of civilian casualties in order to blame the ESAF for those casualties.

The Embassy estimates, based on death reports and visits to hospital and emergency organizations, that there were between 200 and 400 civilian deaths in the capital during the fighting and between 1,500 and 3,000 civilians wounded. Most of the wounded received minor injuries and only 600 to 700 required hospitalization. Most casualties were the result of heavy street fighting and the use of infantry weapons such as small arms, machine guns, grenades, and mortars; few casualties seem to have been caused by aerial bombardment.

Charges of indiscriminate bombing by the Air Force during the FMLN urban offensive were not borne out. An Americas Watch (AW) report noted that in three San Salvador neighborhoods visited "the civilians had the impression that helicopter strafing and bombing were aimed principally at guerrilla emplacements." The ESAF followed its existing Rules of Engagement (ROE) regarding close air support during the offensive. The ROE allows for air support in populated areas only when the mission is to "retard or dissuade" terrorist activities. According to Embassy reports and eyewitness civilian accounts, the Air Force made efforts to target helicopter strafing, rocketing, and bombings at guerrilla emplacements, which resulted in few civilian casualties. However, despite initial ESAF denials, the ESAF did drop several bombs on guerrilla positions in San Salvador and San Miguel. Both 500 and 250 pound bombs were employed. These attacks caused some civilian casualties.

The guerrillas' use of unmarked, indiscriminately placed landmines and booby traps is a major cause of death and maiming among peasants. Planted along farm roads and paths, around guerrilla-downed electric poles, under railroad tracks, near water sources, in farmlands, and on coffee plantations, these mines killed 52 civilians in 1988 and 36 in the first 8 months of 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are no governmental restrictions on freedom of speech and the press. El Salvador has a vigorous local press which regularly prints strongly antigovernment commentary. In the aftermath of the assassination of the Minister of the Presidency, a series of strict antiterrorist law reforms were proposed in the National Assembly, some of which might have impinged on freedom of speech and the press. After reviewing the proposed law, President Cristiani returned the bill to the National Assembly for redrafting and reaffirmed his Government's commitment to freedom of expression and the press. In November, following the initiation of the FMLN offensive, the Assembly passed the bill. President Cristiani again refused to sign the bill and returned it to the Assembly, noting his concern about the constitutionality of specific provisions of the legislation. He indicated to the Assembly that it should draft a bill which could be accepted by the broadest possible group in the Assembly and the nation.

EL SALVADOR

San Salvador, a city of 1 million, has five daily papers, five television stations, and numerous radio stations. There are also two cable television systems that broadcast news programs from overseas. Television journalism in El Salvador is flourishing. Press agencies have reported that in El Salvador a wider range of opinion is permitted and heard than in many other Western democratic countries. Interviews feature a full range of political figures representing all political viewpoints, including politicians, labor leaders, human rights activists, private sector representatives, and government officials. Of the leading daily newspapers, three are conservative and the other two are more centrist in their views. One of the latter, while editorially conservative, presents a full range of views from conservative to far left, including unedited articles from the FMLN press agencies SALPRESS and NOTISAL, press releases from both liberal and pro-FMLN organizations, and a weekly supplement from the Jesuit-operated University of Central America. Furthermore, the views of the left are expressed in a variety of journals, newsletters, periodicals, bulletins, and paid advertisements in the daily press. A 1981 decree forbidding publication of anonymous paid advertisements or communiques remains in effect, but recent examples of such propaganda show this law to be essentially unenforced.

Television stations sell broadcast time to political and labor organizations of all political viewpoints. These are uncensored and are often broadcast live. During the 1989 election campaign, the Government was targeted with bitter media attacks by the opposition without interference. Commercial radio stations use news and propaganda reports recorded from the clandestine guerrilla radio stations or supplied by the guerrillas on cassettes. The Government owns two television channels with identical programming and one radio station. The Armed Forces operate a radio station.

Academic freedom is protected by the Constitution and respected by the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Any association not formed for criminal purposes is legal and permitted in El Salvador. Political, professional, religious, labor, and social organizations operate without legal restriction. The Interior Ministry questioned the legal basis of a number of leftist groups in June, but did not pursue the issue. Groups from the left and the right criticize the Government and hold marches and demonstrations without interference from the Government. Those labor, displaced persons, and human rights organizations which have been credibly identified as FMLN fronts frequently stage marches. During the preelection period the Democratic Convergence (CD) party (see Section 3) charged the military with intimidation at its rallies. Some CD members were arrested in rural departments but were subsequently released.

EL SALVADOR

In 1989 there were several large, violent demonstrations during which protestors burned cars and buses and looted stores. The response of the police was measured, and, though many demonstrators were frequently detained following confrontations with the authorities, no deaths connected with security control of demonstrations were reported during this year. The police did not interfere with nonviolent demonstrations.

Following the killing of the wife and son of a conservative newspaper editor on October 10, the killing of Colonel Casanova's daughter October 17, and the October 30 mortar attack on Army headquarters, the offices of the leftist FENASTRAS union were bombed by unknown assailants on October 31. Ten were killed in the blast, including FENASTRAS secretary general Febe Elizabeth Velasquez, and 30 wounded. FENASTRAS, UNTS, and the FMLN all blamed the Armed Forces and the Government for the bombing. Some members of the military and the ruling ARENA party accused the FMLN or FENASTRAS of rigging the incident in order to promote antigovernment agitation.

President Cristiani called for an investigatory commission to look into the crime, but FENASTRAS initially refused to permit the Special Investigative Unit (SIU) to conduct a physical examination of the site or the bodies. An FBI explosives incidents expert was made available and along with SIU personnel visited the site on November 8 after it had been cleaned up and much evidence destroyed.

The day of the FENASTRAS bombing, offices of the Committee of Mothers of Political Prisoners, Disappeared and Assassinated of El Salvador (CO-MADRES) in northern San Salvador were bombed, resulting in injuries to three persons, including a U.S. citizen. CO-MADRES blamed the military but there was no evidence to establish culpability.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for by the Constitution and is respected in practice. Although the country is predominantly Roman Catholic, an estimated 20 percent of the population subscribe to other faiths. Arrests of church members and employees, both Catholic and Protestant, are unrelated to religious beliefs. Such arrests usually were related to essentially secular activities, involving humanitarian relief work for the poor and others dispossessed by the war; authorities have voiced suspicions that such work often provides a cover for guerrilla recruitment or provision of support for the insurgency.

During the first two weeks of the November FMLN offensive, the ESAF searched the facilities of at least 25 church groups which it had reason to believe were sympathizing with or supporting the FMLN. (See Section 1.d.)

The Catholic Church is one of the most influential institutions in the country. The Archbishop's Sunday homily is broadcast live from the Metropolitan Cathedral on one of the Government's television stations and on radio. Catholic Church publications disseminate the Church's position on human rights and the war. Catholic Church statements have become increasingly critical of the leftist insurgency, but the Church does not hesitate to criticize the Government as well.

Some foreign missionaries and clerics encountered difficulty in applying for residence status and/or extending their visas, and concern was expressed that immigration officials were discriminating against them by reviewing their immigration status. It is believed that these incidents resulted from politically motivated harassment by lower level officials, but there was no evidence that any of the cases arose from official objections to individual religious beliefs or practices.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution establishes the right of free movement. However, Article 97 specifically states that foreigners may not involve themselves in the internal political affairs of the country, and this article is used by the Government to deny entry to or deport foreigners who might violate that section of the law. Local military commanders require that foreigners receive permission before entering conflictive zones; they often restrict entry when military operations are under way in those areas. Some internal movements by Salvadorans are similarly restricted. The country is mired in a 10-year-old conflict with some well-defined geographic areas of military operations in which travel is restricted during periods of combat. The state of exception that was in effect for most of the decade ended in 1987, although a state of siege was enacted in November in response to the FMLN offensive. However, other than the restrictions on travel within conflictive zones noted above, there are no limits on constitutional freedom of movement.

In 1985 there were an estimated 525,000 persons displaced within El Salvador by the conflict. Today approximately 140,000 persons are still in need of Government resettlement assistance. There may be another 7,000 who are not registered with the Government and receive assistance from private relief organizations. An additional 55,000 are refugees in other Central American countries and in Mexico, and more than 550,000 are estimated to be illegal immigrants in the United States.

An increasing number of refugees are returning from abroad. The Government is actively involved in discussions with members of refugee camps in Honduras to facilitate their return to their homes in El Salvador. Through September 1989 the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) repatriated some 300 persons in 1989. Approximately 1,180 refugees from the Mesa Grande camp in Honduras were repatriated to El Salvador in October under the auspices of the Governments of El Salvador and Honduras and the UNHCR. About 1,700 refugees from the Colomoncagua camp in Honduras walked back to El Salvador in two large groups during November and December without authorization from the UNHCR or the concerned Governments. None of these entities were prepared to assist or receive the refugees, who entered El Salvador without protection, documentation, or guarantees of future help.

In some cases local military commanders have blocked the shipment of food, medicines, and other materials to the communities where the refugees now reside, claiming that supplies were being diverted to the guerrillas. For the most part, however, there is no government harassment of persons returning to El Salvador from abroad. The Government imposes no control on emigration and cooperates with international organizations that arrange Salvadoran emigration to other countries.

The Government, with assistance from the UNHCR and the ICRC, has registered some 400 Nicaraguan refugees, although officials estimate as many as 3,000 are residing in the far southeastern part of the country. Registered refugees are free to travel within El Salvador.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution provides for rights and procedures by which its citizens can change their government by peaceful means. There have been six national elections since 1982. In the most recent, on March 19, 1989, six political parties participated in the presidential elections in which the governing PDC lost the presidency to the ARENA, marking the first democratic transfer of control of the Government from the ruling party to the opposition. Although a leftist party allied to the FMLN participated in the elections, receiving less than 4 percent of the vote, the FMLN itself refused to participate in the electoral process and through attacks and threats sought to disrupt the elections. The elections were contested by a wide range of parties that represented views across the entire political spectrum, and marked the return to the political arena of Guillermo Ungo as the presidential candidate for the Democratic Convergence (CD), a coalition of three leftist parties allied to the FMLN guerrillas. The CD united Reuben Zamora's Social Christian Movement Party (MPSC), Ungo's National Revolutionary Movement (MNR), and Reni Roldan's Social Democratic Party (PSD). The CD's participation was a milestone in recent Salvadoran history because it demonstrated that political toleration in the country existed to the point where the self-proclaimed allies of the FMLN could freely compete in national elections.

Voting is by secret ballot. In preparation for the March elections, the Central Elections Council (CCE) distributed 1,850,000 computerized voter identification cards (carnets) as a safeguard against fraud; 55.6 percent of those with carnets voted.

The Constitution allows all political parties that do not advocate armed opposition to the democratic system to participate in the electoral process. It establishes a citizen's right to membership in any legally recognized party. In practice, even parties still linked to the FMLN were permitted to participate. The Nationalist Democratic Union (UDN)--the political front for the Communist Party of El Salvador (PCES)--did not participate despite its status as a legal political party.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government continued to be receptive to official groups interested in human rights. High-ranking government officials and military officers regularly meet with visiting legislators from different countries, human rights organizations, church and labor groups, and others. AW and the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights maintain a joint office in San Salvador. The ICRC has an agreement with the Government that permits it to work in the conflictive areas to assist noncombatants, to visit prisoners and detainees accused of guerrilla activity, and to make confidential reports to the Government on human rights issues. Tutela Legal and the CDH also have access to the prisons. The UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights in El Salvador made his ninth annual visit to the country in October.

Domestic human rights organizations active in El Salvador include the CDH and the Catholic Archbishop's Human Rights and Legal Aid Office, Tutela Legal. The CDH receives testimony about human rights violations, conducts investigations, visits arrested persons, and reports to the local commanding officer and the Ministry of Defense when it discovers a case of abuse. Its doctors examine detainees to determine the validity of complaints of torture. The CDH keeps a register of persons injured by landmines and is working in conjunction with international assistance organizations on a project to register civilian amputees and provide them with prosthetic devices. The CDH also maintains a roster showing the status of those detained by security forces.

Tutela Legal's staff often conducts its own investigations, visiting persons detained by the security forces, carrying out some on-site investigations, and receiving testimony about human rights violations. Tutela files its findings on human rights cases with government authorities. Though its marshaling of data is usually comprehensive, Tutela has on occasion asserted that, based on circumstantial evidence only, the perpetrators of certain killings are death squads linked to the Government. Such assertions are typically made when the body of a victim is found in an area or zone to which access has been under the control of the security forces. Tutela Legal, while not providing figures, expressed concern about what it termed an increase in human rights abuses by the military.

Guerrilla defectors and captured documents provide evidence to show that the FMLN controls several groups that are ostensibly independent human rights organizations. These include the Human Rights Commission of El Salvador (nongovernmental) (CDHES), the Federation of Committees of Mothers and Families (FECMAFAM), the Committee of Mothers of Political Prisoners, Disappeared and Assassinated of El Salvador (CO-MADRES), and the Christian Committee for the Displaced (CRIPDES). Notwithstanding this link, they operate without government interference and regularly publicize their views in the local media. These groups consistently report only on alleged abuses by government forces and do not investigate, acknowledge, or even record human rights abuses committed by the FMLN. Although some individual members of these groups were arrested during 1989 and charged with guerrilla membership or activities, all were subsequently released by the security services or the courts. The Lutheran Church, the National Association of Indigenous Persons (ANIS), many labor unions, universities, and other nongovernmental organizations also have human rights and legal assistance offices.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

El Salvador is ethnically homogeneous, though a small segment of the population claims to have descended solely from the region's indigenous Indians. There is no official discrimination against these Indians. There does not appear to be any discrimination in housing, jobs, and education. The Government neither permits nor condones de jure or de facto discrimination. Under the Constitution, women enjoy the same legal rights as men, and are represented in all three branches of government, in business, and in the professions.

Violence against women, including domestic violence such as wife beating, is undoubtedly widespread, but the lack of adequate reliable statistics makes it impossible to gauge its true extent. Charges of rape are frequent and there is no specific governmental policy to address the problem. In September seven female labor activists alleged they were raped while in the custody of the National Police. Only one of the seven filed a formal complaint and submitted to a physical examination; the examination substantiated the allegation. Both the National Police and the Special Investigative Unit were investigating the case in October.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Article 47 of the Constitution prohibits the Government from using nationality, sex, race, creed, or political philosophy to prevent workers or employers from organizing themselves into unions or associations. This provision was intended to provide the legal framework for secondary legislation, including a revised labor code. Legislative action on such a code has been stymied, however, because of a lack of consensus between the government, the private sector, and labor. Several separate proposals for revising the code have been drafted since 1985, but none of these have been formally submitted to the Legislative Assembly. The Cristiani Administration has indicated interest in reform of labor laws, but has not yet developed any firm proposals nor taken a position on any of the proposals previously prepared. A confusing and sometimes conflicting set of laws dating from 1963 which govern labor relations remains in place. While existing statutes provide protections which are enforceable under the Constitution, their inconsistencies often result in cumbersome procedures and significant delays.

Legally, only private sector workers have the right to form unions and to strike. Employees of the nine autonomous public institutions may form unions but are barred from striking. Finally, existing law bars agricultural workers and employees of government ministries and departments from forming unions or striking (although in practice, public sector strikes do occur). These employees are instead represented by associations whose function, in practice, is similar to that of unions.

There are approximately 150 currently active trade unions, employee associations, and peasant organizations, with a combined membership of just over 400,000--roughly 20 percent of the work force. These organizations freely elect their officers in accordance with their individual constitutions and bylaws. Leaders of worker organizations appear regularly on television, publicize their views in the country's major newspapers, and conduct seminars on various issues without government interference. Unions have also been able to organize or participate in public demonstrations without government interference as long as the demonstrations remained peaceful. On several occasions during the year, demonstrations sponsored by pro-FMLN labor organizations became violent, resulting in the intervention of security forces to restore order, and occasionally resulting in several demonstrators being detained.

While the law allows the recognition of a union to be withdrawn "for cause," since 1980 this has occurred in only one instance. The Government acted in the case of the union of workers for the Rio Lempa Hydroelectric Project (STECCEL) after the union, working in concert with the FMLN, cut off electricity to most parts of El Salvador, causing several deaths and significant economic damage.

Twice since 1986 the Salvadoran Supreme Court has reaffirmed constitutional safeguards protecting trade unions, worker associations, peasant organizations and their leaders from arbitrary and capricious behavior by management and/or the Government. In March 1986, the Court ruled unconstitutional a July 1985 decision by the Labor Ministry which had stripped 11 leaders of the Sewer and Waterworks Union (SETA) of their positions because they had disobeyed a labor judge's order to end a strike. The court held that union leaders cannot be deprived of their leadership status because such status derives from union elections. In August 1987, the Supreme Court similarly overturned an order of the Ministry of Interior which had divested leaders of the ANIS of their positions. The Court voided the Ministry's order, reinstated the leaders, and ruled that the Minister of Interior was liable for civil damages for having exceeded his authority.

The right to strike for the private sector is provided for by law and is freely exercised in practice, despite cumbersome, time-consuming legal procedures. As unions routinely fail to fulfill these requirements, almost all strikes are declared illegal. In several instances workers have occupied factory premises as part of a strike or work stoppage. In cases where such activity is part of an illegal strike, security forces have intervened to remove workers and protect factory premises.

There were 19 private-sector strikes during the period January 1-September 30, 1989, affecting approximately 3,000 workers. The Ministry of Labor intervened as provided for by law in an effort to resolve the disputes, even in cases involving illegal strikes. The absence of specific laws granting workers in autonomous government institutions or public employees the right to strike has not deterred such strike activity.

In 1989 the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) of the International Labor Organization (ILO) considered four cases based on complaints filed by several international and Salvadoran labor organization alleging violations of ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association by the Government. The complaints, some of which date back to 1981, allege, inter alia, that: the Government was implicated in the murder, harassment, intimidation, and disappearance of trade unionists, and the destruction of trade union property; and that certain public employees were denied the right to organize and bargain, and were not protected from antiunion discrimination. The Government, in its various responses to the complaints, has contended, among other things, that the complaints were part of a pattern of propaganda and provocation designed to discredit the Government and frequently resulted from subversive acts perpetrated by the guerrillas and unions allied with them. The CFA has repeatedly deplored the violence that has prevailed in the country which, according to the Committee, has prevented the full exercise of the rights guaranteed by the Convention. The Committee considered it unacceptable that the Government had not provided detailed and complete answers when the lives and freedom of trade union leaders were at stake, and urged the Government to bring detainees to trial without delay and to initiate independent judicial inquiry into the murder and disappearances of numerous trade unionists named in the complaints. El Salvador has not ratified ILO Convention 87 or Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining.

FMLN-linked labor organizations regularly use ostensibly peaceful dissent to provoke government actions, then level charges of worker rights violations when the Government responds to street violence and occupations. For example, in September the FMLN-linked FENASTRAS union demonstrated in San Salvador, burning several buses and automobiles, and causing thousands of dollars in damage to other private property. The subsequent arrests of 60 demonstrators were characterized as a violation of worker rights. The same tactic is applied when members of these organizations are detained by government authorities for suspected involvement in terrorist activities. While security forces detained numerous union members during 1989, these detentions seldom resulted from legitimate union activities. The FMLN also seeks to disrupt and subvert democratic labor groups that refuse to collaborate with it.

Labor unions are not restricted from affiliation with international organizations, and Salvadoran unions freely affiliate with such groups, including the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the World Confederation of Labor, and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right of collective bargaining is granted in Article 39 of the Constitution, and Article 269 of the labor code. Under the labor code, only private sector workers can exercise this right, but the Constitution is interpreted broadly to provide all workers the right to bargain collectively.

Private sector unions use the mechanism of collective bargaining extensively. Approximately 28 collective bargaining agreements covering private sector employees were certified by the Ministry of Labor between January 1 and September 30, 1989. According to Ministry statistics, these contracts covered approximately 44,000 workers. Nearly 60 percent of the collective bargaining agreements certified since June 1984 were contracts for unions affiliated to antigovernment labor organizations. A similar collective bargaining practice is also followed, albeit in a more informal manner, between public employees and the Government.

The Director General's office (DGT) of the Ministry of Labor is responsible for overseeing the implementation of collective bargaining agreements and acting as conciliator in labor-related disputes in the private sector and autonomous government institutions. According to the Ministry, during the period January 1 through September 30, 1989, the DGT participated directly in 41 labor-management conflicts. Approximately 35 were resolved through its participation.

EL SALVADOR

Article 47 of the Constitution states that union officials at the time of their election, throughout their term and for one year following their term shall not be fired, suspended for disciplinary reasons, removed or debased in their work conditions except for legal cause. This provision is generally observed in practice.

The relationship between the business community and the labor movement improved somewhat during the last years of the Duarte regime, but a large reservoir of distrust still remains. Labor leaders perceive the Cristiani Government as being antilabor, but in the first few months of the regime the labor code continued to be enforced as in the past. As before, however, businessmen frequently take measures to prevent unions from being formed. Union leaders have also complained about lengthy and complex procedures required to register new unions.

El Salvador has one export processing zone. There are no differences in labor regulations in this area and those which prevail in general. However, there are no labor unions represented in any of the firms in this zone, and the firms discourage labor organizing by preventing organizers from entering the zone and intimidating workers who attempt to organize.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor except in cases of public calamity and other instances specified by law.

The ILO's Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions has for a number of years noted with concern the provisions in the penal code that allow the imposition of sentences involving compulsory labor and has made suggestions on how to improve existing legislation and practice. Reform of the penal code is being considered by the Legislative Assembly. The FMLN continues to force civilians, including minors, to serve as porters, spotters, and couriers for the guerrilla army. Reports from family members of those impressed indicate that the FMLN increased its use of this practice before and during the November offensive.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Constitution prohibits the employment of children under the age of 14. The labor code states that exceptions can be made only in cases where it can be demonstrated that such employment is absolutely indispensable to the sustenance of the minor and his family. This is most often the case with children of peasant families who traditionally work with their families during planting and harvesting seasons.

The Constitution also prohibits the employment of persons under 18 and all women in occupations considered hazardous. The law is enforced through inspections undertaken by the Ministry of Labor. There are credible reports that in at least some cases these inspections have revealed violations which have been corrected.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Government's National Minimum Wage Council recommends increases in the minimum wages for commercial, industrial, service, and agro-industrial employees. Over the past several years, wages have not kept pace with inflation. From 1983 to 1988 real wages in the private sector have declined by an estimated 40 percent. Commercial as well as industrial and service workers in San Salvador were paid $2.80 daily, while their counterparts in other areas of the country received $2.65. Agro-industrial workers employed in the cotton and sugar industries received $1.71 daily, while those employed in the coffee industry earned $2.65. Wage rates for most categories of workers are higher than the legal minimums, especially in the private sector. For the most part, minimum wages are inadequate to meet the Ministry of Economy's standard of basic necessity.

EL SALVADOR

The law limits the workday for minors between 14 and 18 years of age to a maximum of 6 hours, while for adults it is 8 hours. Premium pay is mandated for longer hours.

The Constitution and the labor code spell out the rights of workers to a healthy and safe working environment. These statutes require employers, including the Government, to take steps to ensure that employees are not placed at risk in their workplaces. Despite extremely limited budgetary resources, the Ministry of Labor attempts to enforce the applicable regulations. According to Ministry figures, the Inspector General's office conducted approximately 12,500 inspections and reinspections between January 1 and September 30, 1989. Most of these occurred in commercial, industrial and service establishments. Nearly 183,000 employees were covered by these inspections and reinspections. The Inspector General's corps cited employers for almost 350 infractions and assessed fines totalling $1,250. Employers were also ordered to pay approximately $1,300 to employees as compensation for unjust dismissal.

GRENADA

A member of the Commonwealth of Nations, Grenada's parliamentary form of government, with a Governor General as titular Head of State, was suspended in 1979 by the Marxist People's Revolutionary Government (PRG) and then restored in October 1983. Free and fair elections in December 1984 brought the New National Party (NNP) into power with 14 seats in the 15-member lower house of Parliament. Prime Minister Herbert Blaize later broke with the NNP and formed The National Party (TNP) with the support of six Members of Parliament. With a majority of elected Members of Parliament no longer supporting the Government, the Prime Minister prorogued Parliament on August 23, rather than face a potential vote of no confidence. Under the Constitution, the Prime Minister has until March 27, 1990, to hold new elections.

Political and civil rights are provided for by the Constitution and respected in practice, although the Emergency Powers Act of 1987 gives the Government authority to suspend most civil rights should the Governor General declare a state of national emergency. Although provisions of the Act have never been applied, opposition politicians objected strenuously to it, citing existing government authority to deal with national emergencies.

Security in Grenada is the responsibility of the 600-strong Royal Grenada Police Force (RGPF), which includes a 75-man paramilitary Special Services Unit (SSU) and a 30-man coast guard unit. It is controlled by and responsive to the civilian government.

Grenadians enjoy substantial freedom to pursue economic goals in a free market environment. Major improvements in infrastructure have accompanied economic growth, which has averaged 5 percent annually in real terms over the past several years. Economic development in agriculture, construction, tourism, transportation, and communications has been aided by a return of Grenadian capital and substantial economic assistance following restoration of democratic government in 1983.

Grenada's overall human rights record remained good during 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances or abductions.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution specifically prohibits torture, and there were no reported incidents of torture in Grenada in 1989. Some of the prisoners convicted of the 1983 murder of Prime Minister Maurice Bishop, whose cases are still under appeal, made allegations of beatings by prison officials, but these have not been substantiated. The Government authorized the formation of a prison visitation committee in 1989 to visit the prison periodically, but the program had not been implemented by year's end.

GRENADA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

According to law, police have the right to detain persons on suspicion without a warrant, but formal charges must be brought within 48 hours. This time limit is adhered to in practice. If the detainee is not charged within this time, he must be released. In 1989 no one was detained for political reasons.

The law provides for a judicial determination of the legality of detention within 15 days after arrest on a criminal charge. Formal arraignment or release of the arrestee must be determined within 60 days. These procedures were generally followed.

There is a functioning system of bail, although those charged with capital offenses are not eligible. Persons charged with treason can only be accorded bail upon recommendation of the Governor General.

No Grenadian citizen was exiled in 1989. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to fair public trial is provided for by law and is observed in practice. Those arrested and charged are brought before an independent judiciary and are allowed access to a lawyer of their choice. For capital crimes, the courts appoint lawyers when the accused cannot pay for his defense. In other cases, the defendant is assigned counsel if the case reaches the appellate stage. Following a determination by a judicial hearing that there is sufficient evidence to substantiate a criminal charge, the defendant is remanded for trial. Due to the backlog of cases caused by a lack of judges and facilities, a significant amount of time can pass before those charged are brought to trial.

The Government has taken particular care to afford a fair public trial, including an appeal process which has been under way for 2 years, in the cases of the 17 former PRG and army officials convicted of the murders of Maurice Bishop and 10 others on October 19, 1983. Fourteen defendants have been sentenced to death and three to long prison terms. This appeals process continues before a panel of Caribbean jurists, although it was temporarily delayed by the death of the president of the court in December 1988. The Grenada Government continues to bear the cost of both the prosecution and the defense in the appeal.

There are no persons imprisoned without due process. There are no political prisoners, the 17 PRG and revolutionary army officials having been convicted of capital crimes.

GRENADA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is no arbitrary interference in private life. Warrants for searching homes are normally required by law except in cases of hot pursuit. In practice, warrants are obtained in the majority of cases before a search is conducted. There were no reports of arbitrary monitoring of telephones or correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is provided for by the Constitution and freely exercised. There are five weekly newspapers and several papers which are published irregularly. Most are affiliated with political parties, but the two most widely circulated newspapers are independent. Flyers are occasionally distributed by remnants of the PRG's Revolutionary Military Council and the New Jewel Movement. Newspapers are frequently critical of the Government.

Grenada has one government-operated radio station. There are no regulations regarding equal access to radio broadcasts by opposition political parties. In practice, the official opposition party was given occasional air time, but made sporadic, informal complaints that the time given was inadequate. In 1988 a license granted to a private FM radio station by the Government a few months earlier was revoked and the station closed. After an inconclusive court case on charges of operating without a license, the owners resumed broadcasting, only to be closed down again. In October, the Government announced that it had issued a license for a new privately owned FM radio station, which was scheduled to begin broadcasting by year's end. Its programming was not expected to deal with political matters.

Grenada currently has a fledgling television broadcasting system which was purchased from its American owners in September 1989 by a public corporation controlled by the Government. Under its previous owners, the programming featured regular political interview/talk shows which were open to all the political parties in Grenada, as well as to public commentary. It was unclear at year's end if the policy of free access by opposition political parties to television will continue under the government-controlled public corporation.

In 1989 the Government, as it did in 1988, banned the importation of a number of Marxist-oriented publications destined for the Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement (MBPM), in connection with the anniversary of the coup which overthrew the elected government of Sir Eric Gairy in 1974. The Government noted that the Constitution allows limitations on freedom of speech and the press when deemed necessary to protect the public interest. On April 11, the Government issued a formal order prohibiting permanently the importation of 86 specific publications into Grenada on the basis that they were contrary to the public interest.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Grenadians enjoy the right to assemble for any peaceful purpose, including the public protest of policies or actions of the Government. Supporters of political parties meet frequently and hold public rallies. There are no controls on private or public associations, and permits are not required for public meetings.

Citing a refusal to endorse a celebration of the destruction of democracy, the Government refused to permit foreign visitors to remain in Grenada in March 1989 to attend events planned by the MBPM.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

All groups enjoy freedom of religion. The Roman Catholic and Anglican faiths predominate, but there are many Presbyterian and Methodist as well as evangelical church members. In addition, there is a small Baha'i community and an Islamic center which serves the Muslim community. Complete religious freedom extends to the Rastafarians, who were harassed under the PRG regime. Clergy, including missionaries, travel and proselytize freely. No apparent advantages or disadvantages are conferred by adherence to a particular faith, although Christian prayers and hymns form part of many governmental and political meetings. Representatives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints travel and proselytize in Grenada.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of movement within Grenada and, in principle, the right to enter and leave is guaranteed to all Grenadian citizens, except in special circumstances as outlined and limited by the Act to Restrict the Freedom of Movement of Certain Persons, passed in 1986. The law allows the minister responsible for national security to restrict travel out of Grenada of any person whose aims, tendencies, or objectives include the overthrow of the democratic and parliamentary system of government. Anyone so restricted may appeal after 3 months to an independent and impartial tribunal, presided over by an accredited lawyer chosen by the Chief Justice. The law was enacted after the Grenadian Appeals Court upheld a government action withholding the passport of a former member of the PRG who sought to leave the country in 1985. The Government subsequently reversed its decision in this case late in 1988; the individual's passport was returned, and he has been permitted to travel abroad and return.

No one was forcibly repatriated to Grenada in 1989. There were no official applications to Grenadian authorities for refugee status, although the Baha'i community includes Iranians who left their homeland to escape persecution. Work permits are granted to them, and they are allowed to practice their religion freely. The Government has allowed students and others to return to Grenada from Cuba and other Communist countries.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution provides for this right through free and fair elections to be held at least every 5 years. Formed by the union of three parties to contest the December 1984 elections, the ruling NNP won 14 of the 15 parliamentary seats in an election in which 85 percent of the voters participated. The NNP's majority was reduced after the resignation of two members in 1986, and further defections in 1987 left the NNP with only a 9 to 6 majority. After being ousted as party leader of the NNP in a January 1989 convention, Prime Minister Blaize broke with the NNP in August and established a new party, The National Party (TNP). The dismissal and/or resignations of remaining NNP members of the Cabinet then left the Prime Minister's TNP with a 6 to 9 minority in Parliament. Rather than face a potential vote of no confidence, the Prime Minister, in accordance with constitutional provisions, advised the acting Governor General to prorogue Parliament indefinitely on August 23. Constitutionally, the Parliament ended its maximum 5-year term on December 27, 1989, and elections must be held no later than March 27, 1990. It was not certain whether or not Parliament would be reconvened in the interim.

Local government elections promised by the NNP in the 1984 campaign remain a topic of public debate but have yet to be held. The political system is not dominated by any particular ethnic group, nor are there any restrictions which limit participation of any elements of the Grenadian population.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has welcomed visits of several human rights organizations in the past, including Amnesty International. In September the Government hosted and participated in a seminar on the Judiciary and Human Rights in the Commonwealth Caribbean sponsored by the International Commission of Jurists in association with the Caribbean Justice Improvement Project.

The Caribbean Institute for the Promotion of Human Rights (CARICARE) is active in Grenada. It has called on the Government to recognize and accept the jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court of Justice, but there was no action on this issue in 1989.

There is no evidence of official discrimination in health care, employment, or education. There have been some reported incidents of unofficial job discrimination against Guyanese and other foreign-born residents. Women frequently earn less than men performing the same work; wage differences are less marked for more highly paid jobs.

Grenadian women's rights activists contend that violence against women in Grenada is common, and that most cases of spouse abuse go unreported to police authorities. To address this problem, one women's group instituted in December 1989 a telephone crisis hot-line so that victims of rape or spouse abuse have a mechanism for requesting support and assistance. The Grenadian police confirm that most cases of alleged abuse are not reported and those that are are settled out of court. Grenadian law stipulates a sentence of 15 years' imprisonment for a conviction of rape. Sentences for assault against a spouse vary according to the severity of the incident.

GRENADA

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers are free to organize independent labor unions. Local Labor Ministry officials estimate that approximately 25 percent of the total work force is unionized, although this figure may be low. Workers in the public and private sectors can and do strike legally if they give advance notification. The threat of strike action by three public sector unions in September 1989 contributed to a wage settlement highly favorable to the workers. Union leaders play a significant role in the political process, and one labor leader serves in the Grenada Senate at the nomination of the governing party. In 1989 all unions were free of government control, and none was given government support. Grenadian unions are affiliated with the Caribbean Congress of Labor. The Grenada Trade Union Council still maintains contacts with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions, although at a very low level of activity.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers are free to participate in collective bargaining. Legislation compels employers to recognize a union which represents the majority of workers in a particular business. Grenadian law prohibits antiunion discrimination by employers against union members and organizers. If a complaint of discrimination arises, mechanisms exist for trying to resolve it. After all avenues for resolving a complaint have been exhausted between union representatives and employers, both sides may agree to ask for the assistance of the Labor Commissioner. If the Labor Commissioner is unable to find a resolution to the impasse, the Minister of Labor can appoint an arbitration tribunal if both parties agree to abide by its ruling.

There are no areas in which union organization and collective bargaining are discouraged or impeded by the Government, including the export processing zone. In August workers at Abbott Labs Grenada, located in the export processing zone, voted not to form a union by a three to one margin in an election considered to have been free and fair.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution specifically prohibits forced labor, and no such incidents were reported in 1989.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The statutory minimum age for employment of children (16 years) is enforced in the formal sector by periodic checks made by inspectors from the Ministry of Labor. Enforcement in the informal sector (i.e., family farms and small family businesses) is less effective.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no effective regulation of work hours or occupational safety standards, although the normal workweek rarely exceeds 40 hours. A legal minimum wage has been fixed for the agricultural sector only. However, it is very limited in its scope, and for the majority of agricultural workers, as in other sectors, the minimum wage is determined by union/employer negotiations. The Government's own wage rate and vacation allowances are comparable to those in the rest of the Eastern Caribbean. Wages from full-time jobs normally provide the basis for at least a minimally decent living standard.

GUATEMALA

The Constitution of Guatemala, which took effect in January 1986, provides for a president and a 100-member unicameral congress, both elected by universal adult suffrage, as well as an independent judiciary, and a Human Rights Ombudsman. The Christian Democratic Party formed a civilian Government following free and fair elections in 1985.

The military has the primary responsibility for national security, and has been engaged in fighting against the nearly 30-year old guerrilla insurgency. In addition, the mobile military police (PMA), which number about 1,000 members, also plays a role in protecting key installations. The military continues to have a reputation for human rights violations, though its record has improved over the past 5 years. The PMA reports to the Minister of Defense, an active duty general. The National Police (some 11,000 members) and the Treasury Police (about 2,000) report to the Minister of Interior (Gobernacion). The two civilian forces are generally not well regarded and historically have been weak and corrupt organizations with poor human rights records.

Real economic growth continued in 1989, albeit at a slightly slower rate than in 1988 due to a less than expected rate of investment and a fall in the rate of growth of coffee export earnings. Although the Government has been able to sustain the economic recovery begun in 1987, the increased growth has been insufficient to impact on the country's major problems of poverty, poor health and social services, high rates of illiteracy and infant mortality, and inadequate infrastructure.

Violence in Guatemala decreased in the first 2 years of the new civilian Government's tenure in comparison with the levels of the early 1980's. In 1989, however, the country saw a resurgence of violence and terrorism, much of it politically inspired. A coup attempt in May 1989 by disaffected military and ex-military personnel sought, among other things, to oust reformist Defense Minister General Gramajo. Departing from past practice, the Government moved to prosecute the plotters. In November, seven were found guilty. Five were sentenced to 10 years, two to 2 years in prison. With foreign aid, the Government made efforts to continue to professionalize the police and the judiciary in order to increase their ability to investigate and prosecute crimes. However, the Government, hampered by a weak criminal justice system, was unable to check the determined efforts of antidemocratic elements and criminals to create an environment of chaos and a lack of effective government control. There continued to be credible reports of security forces personnel and political extremists engaging in extrajudicial killings, disappearances, and other serious abuses. Few, if any, of the perpetrators of such actions were apprehended, tried, and convicted. Throughout the year, the Communist guerrillas increased their campaign of violence, which included destruction of public and private property, robbery, forced recruitment and labor, murder, and indiscriminate use of land mines. Drug-related crime and corruption also rose in 1989, and evidence grew of guerrilla involvement in the cultivation and trafficking of opium. Terrorists launched a series of bombings in the latter half of the year directed at television and electrical transmission towers, the telephone company, retail stores, political party headquarters, and the offices of two human rights groups. A series of kidnappings and brutal murders took place in August and September, including those of a group of evening students at the University of San Carlos in Guatemala City.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Police statistics showed about 2,000 murders countrywide, nearly the same as in 1988. Critics charge that these figures understate killings in those areas with minimal police presence or where residents refused to report incidents. While most killings appeared to result from personal vendettas or other criminal activities, an unknown but probably relatively small number were politically motivated. It is impossible, however, to determine the exact number.

There is no evidence that extrajudicial killings were part of the Government's counterinsurgency or anticrime actions, or that top government officials ordered or condoned them. However, as stated publicly by the Defense and the Interior Ministers at the height of the wave of violence which swept the country over the summer, persons in the security forces as well as extremist political groups engaged in extrajudicial killings. Authorities failed to investigate effectively and bring to trial the perpetrators of these crimes. Particularly troubling was the failure, with few exceptions, to detain or prosecute those perpetrators who were likely to have been connected with the security forces. In this regard, the Washington-based International Human Rights Law Group asserted in a July report that the police were unwilling to investigate a case aggressively when the military was thought to be involved. There is reason to believe that some military officials take steps to shield lower ranking personnel involved in these killings. These serious abuses continued despite efforts to improve those forces' overall human rights performance, including strengthening the army's Office of Inspector-General, providing human rights and other professional training for army and police officers, and creating a functioning Office of Professional Responsibility in the police.

The media reported frequent discoveries of bodies, often with signs of torture or post-mortem mutilation. While many were not identified, a number were persons who had arrest and conviction records, leading some to conclude that vigilante groups were involved in some killings in which the perpetrators likely had access to police, court, and prison data. There were credible reports that, during the summer, an average of four bodies of teenaged males were found daily in Guatemala City, bound and shot once in the back of the head. In late May and early June in Jocotillo, Villa Canales, armed men killed six persons in two incidents; at least some of the victims were said to have had criminal records and one apparently had deserted the army. Though no arrests resulted, vigilantes, including members of the security forces, were generally thought to be responsible for many killings of this nature.

In August gunmen killed prominent left-of-center Christian Democrat leader and journalist Danilo Barillas. Although the police investigation was unsuccessful in establishing a motive or perpetrator, popular suspicions focused variously on enemies within his party, on leftwing extremists out to disrupt the electoral process, and even on drug traffickers.

In September the bodies of five San Carlos University students were found. They were some of the San Carlos students who had disappeared earlier (see Section 1.b.).

While conclusive evidence was lacking, political extremists appeared to be responsible for the shooting in the capital on September 28 of student activist Villeda Lara and his brother, a labor leader. Both men survived the attempted assassination.

On July 2, Jose Rolando Pantaleon, a former member of the Coca Cola union, was killed. The case remained open at year's end. During the early 1980's a number of Coca Cola union leaders were killed. Pantaleon was not a well-known figure within the union, and it is not clear that his death was labor-related or why he was singled out.

An INDE (electrical) union director, Jose Leon Segura, was killed as he waited for a bus on September 27. The union was in the midst of a campaign to obtain the ratification of a collective bargaining agreement. Segura apparently believed he was in danger and had tried to obtain documents to leave the country. No leads had been developed in the case by year's end.

Guerrillas were involved in extrajudicial killings in rural areas. Reliable reports indicate uniformed guerrillas murdered relatives of army personnel in the area between Patulul, Suchitepequez, and Pochuta, Chimaltenango in April. Guerrillas killed a deputy mayor in San Marcos department, the Huehuetenango deputy military zone commander, and, in Quiche, two repatriated refugees: Mateo Juan Baltazar, an alternate delegate to the National Dialogue (set up under the National Reconciliation Commission established under the Esquipulas II accords), and his brother.

Uniformed, machinegun-bearing guerrillas of the Revolutionary Organization of the People in Arms (ORPA) temporarily seized the town of Acatenango, Chimaltenango where, according to the press and an eyewitness, they publicly murdered an already disarmed policeman. Uniformed guerrillas also briefly took San Miguel Duenas, near Antigua, held a forced meeting of the inhabitants, and killed a small child when his parents tried to run a roadblock in their vehicle.

Army personnel in rural areas were credibly reported to have engaged in extrajudicial killings of persons suspected of guerrilla sympathies or drug smuggling, particularly in San Marcos and the marijuana-growing area of Peten.

While no killing as large as the unsolved 1988 El Aguacate massacre occurred during the year, in May a group of armed men killed five persons, including a military commissioner and his son, in Sanquin, Chimaltenango, not far from El Aguacate. The military commissioner is a local civilian employee of the army who acts as a liaison with military units in the area. Survivors said the killers had on previous occasions stolen supplies from Sanquin. One foreign human rights group cited witnesses who alleged the men had "uniforms typical" of the treasury police, a characteristic not uncommon, however, of insurgent groups in the area. Neither the arms, the area, nor the method of operation are those used by the treasury police. The case remained unsolved at year's end.

GUATEMALA

Another multiple killing took place in September, which also involved a military commissioner as a victim, and occurred near Iztapa, Escuintla. Armed men attacked the commissioner's home, killing six visitors. Initial suspicion fell on guerrillas in the Escuintla area, but the case remained unsolved.

Although several members of the security forces faced trial for common crimes, including armed assault and murder, the Government was either unable or unwilling to apprehend or prosecute those involved in extrajudicial killings. One exception was the resolution of the 1987 murders of two university graduates in Quetzaltenango. Rejecting an appeal of a 1988 conviction, in August 1989 a court reaffirmed 30-year sentences for the former Quetzaltenango police chief and five of his men who were convicted of the crime.

Disappearances, many of which ended in death, proved to be the most controversial human rights issue in Guatemala in 1989. Despite promises of action by government officials, including the President, authorities did not solve numerous apparently politically motivated disappearances, fueling concerns about the State's ability to maintain public safety. Human rights groups charged there were hundreds of disappearances, either occurring since the current Government took power or remaining unsolved from previous years. Amnesty International (AI) listed over 220 unresolved disappearances from January 1986 to June 1989. The Government provided a report discussing 83 of those cases, in which some were accounted for by initial reports deemed false, others by emigration, and a few by discovery of dead victims. In others, victims were released by their captors, and some cases remained inconclusive. Some local human rights observers characterized the report as evincing a somewhat more positive official attitude towards disappearances; they credited AI and the Guatemalan Congressional Human Rights Commission for inducing the Government to prepare a response, even if incomplete. The Human Rights Ombudsman reported 203 disappearances in 1988, of which 55 ended in death. The Ombudsman claimed that of the cases listed by AI as disappeared, 114 were resolved, most by the reappearance of the claimed victim alive and well. In late September, the Supreme Court of Justice agreed to begin passing daily lists of police arrests and writs of habeas corpus to the Congressional Human Rights Commission, a practice which could facilitate a search for missing persons.

On March 15 Lucia Guadalupe Avila De Estrada, a leader of a group of workers who attempted to form a union at the Bonin Laboratories, was briefly kidnaped but later released. Her abductors told her that she and her family would be killed if she remained active in the prounion group. She resigned from her job. The Government attempted to obtain an arrest warrant for security guards at the laboratory who were suspected of being involved in her kidnaping, but the courts found that they did not have sufficient evidence.

In April and May, six members of the Rurujel Junam Council of Ethnic Communities (CERJ), a largely indigenous group opposed to obligatory service in civil defense patrols, disappeared in three incidents. Two were found to have been drafted into the army. The four still missing reportedly were taken on two different days in early April in a conflictive area of Suchitepequez Department by armed men with blackened faces. A witness to one incident reported that the kidnapers wore olive green uniforms; he assumed they were soldiers. The National Police and the Human Rights Ombudsman looked into the events but reached no conclusions. The President's Advisory Commission on Human Rights concluded that someone might have thought the four were guerrillas and extrajudicially executed them. The army denied responsibility.

The Department of San Marcos, a zone of considerable conflict and opium cultivation, averaged about three disappearances a month in 1989. Most of these occurred in ways and places making it impossible for investigators to establish basic facts. Some of those missing might have been killed in combat, taken in drug-related incidents, kidnaped, or forcibly recruited by guerrillas. Although the army denies responsibility, involvement by military personnel in at least some of these cases seems certain. One such case was the July 6 disappearance of Preciliano Rafael Velasquez in San Rafael de la Cuesta. According to available information, armed men in a truck with Salvadoran license plates apparently took Velasquez to the San Marcos military zone command for questioning about a guerrilla presence on the estate he managed. Two earlier kidnappings similar to Velasquez's were those of Eulalio Ambrosio (June 16) and Joaquin Lopez (June 5 or 6). In both of these, witnesses saw armed men seize the victims. His son claimed to have seen Ambrosio, General Secretary for San Marcos of the Social Democratic Party (PSD), being taken to the military zone command. Velasquez and Ambrosio remain missing; Lopez's body was found 2 weeks after he disappeared. In another case, the military commissioner, Aquilino Lopez Escobar, was reported taken from his home in El Tumbador, San Marcos, September 19 by men in olive green uniforms. Lopez's brother, who apparently witnessed the event, in this case blamed the guerrillas.

Aurelio Lorenzo Xicay, a member of the Mutual Support Group (GAM), was found dead on July 25, 2 days after his disappearance in the capital. Human rights groups accused security forces of involvement in this unsolved crime. Another reported kidnapping of a GAM member was that of Maria Rumualda Camey. Armed men took Rumualda from her Escuintla home on August 14; her fate remains unknown. Human rights groups charged security services with her kidnapping. In late September, 10 of Rumualda's relatives, including her husband and children, left for Spain.

The disappearances of 10 San Carlos University evening students between August 21 and September 10 drew much attention. The reported victims were either currently or previously active in the University Students' Association (AEU). Several of the victims apparently participated in support of the massive teachers' strike which took place earlier in the summer, following which a self-described anti-Communist group began a campaign of terror and death threats against university students and professors (see Section 2.a.). On September 10, the bodies of four of the students, bearing signs of torture, were found near the University's Guatemala City campus. On September 19, the body of a fifth, discovered 4 days earlier, was identified in a town 40 miles outside the capital. The other five remained missing. Popular suspicion fell primarily on rightwing extremists and the security forces. Many local observers concluded that the security forces, or persons within them, conducted a "counterinsurgency" operation aimed at preventing a rebirth of guerrilla movements at San Carlos. An October report by Americas Watch (AW) termed the government response to the killings "inadequate," and declared that the manner and pattern of the incidents "strongly suggest" either involvement or acquiescence of the security forces. Official efforts to solve the crimes yielded no results by year's end. Following these events, several other students went abroad. In December, another student, Marco Tulio Montenegro, was found murdered 2 days after having been expelled from the University Students' Association.

Some disappearances had less grim endings. One student, Lemus Godoy, listed initially by GAM and AEU as missing, personally denied the reports. A GAM member, Miguel Morales, allegedly kidnaped August 23, appeared unharmed 2 days later; his captors reportedly apologized for "making a mistake." In September two students reported that they had been kidnaped and held briefly, during which time they received death threats. The son-in-law of Christian Democrat presidential hopeful Rene de Leon also was seized, beaten, and abandoned hours later--bruised but alive.

While the Government claimed that it did not have the resources or capability to investigate disappearances, it quickly rescued a young upper-income student kidnaped in October (in what was apparently a criminal incident for ransom) and captured some of the alleged kidnapers, demonstrating that it could, on occasion, mobilize itself to effective action.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Credible, verifiable reports of inhuman or cruel treatment of detainees in official custody remained rare. The police leadership engaged in ongoing efforts to curtail such abuses, apparently with some success. The Human Rights Ombudsman charged, however, that prison conditions themselves constituted cruel and inhuman treatment, and bore at least partial responsibility for the March uprising at Pavon prison near Guatemala city. The prison director, in a statement to Congress, admitted conditions at Pavon were difficult, citing severe overcrowding, lack of medical care, bad nutrition, and unsanitary conditions.

Reports of brutality by the military were more frequent, but generally uncorroborated. Some alleged victims reported that they had suffered degrading treatment by civil defense patrols or military commissioners.

Another report of alleged torture under investigation is the case of Sister Diana Ortiz, an American Ursuline Sister. She disappeared on November 2 from the Posada Belem religious retreat in Antigua, located about 40 kilometers outside Guatemala City, and reappeared on the morning of November 3 in the capital. She declined to discuss what had happened to either Guatemalan or U.S. Embassy officials prior to her departure from Guatemala for the U.S. on November 5. In a statement later submitted by the Ursuline Order on behalf of Sister Ortiz, she stated that she was kidnaped by several men, taken to an undisclosed location, beaten, sexually abused and burned with cigarettes. The Government of Guatemala opened an investigation of the case and requested additional information on the incident from Sister Ortiz. As of year's end, Sister

Ortiz had not acceded to the request. The perpetrators have not been identified.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Allegations of arbitrary arrest or detention by police (as distinct from the security forces) are infrequent in Guatemala. Under the Constitution, a person cannot be held for more than 6 hours without being brought before a judge and formally charged with a crime.

An arrest warrant is required from the criminal court when an accused is not apprehended in the actual commission of a crime. The law also limits to 20 days the time a person may be held for investigation, after which he must be charged or released. Additionally, the law incorporates a constitutional protection against illegal detention and requires the personal appearance of any person who is illegally detained or whose freedom is threatened in any way. Other protections include a system of bail and access to lawyers. Involuntary exile is not used as a punishment.

There were no known instances during 1989 in which critics of the Government were formally arrested for political reasons. The Human Rights Ombudsman charged that there were "secret" jails, off-limits to the Ombudsman and other investigators, that did not respond to writs of habeas corpus. Military and police officials denied this. There were credible reports, however, that the security forces have "safehouses" where they conduct illegal interrogations of persons not formally arrested and where they sometimes torture and/or kill detainees. Relatives of suspected rightist terrorist Mario Roberto Martinez Pena charged that police arrested Martinez at 3 p.m. September 15 but did not bring him before a judge until 11:30 p.m. and that neither they nor his attorney knew Martinez's whereabouts during that time. The police replied that they obeyed all legal norms. The suspect and a colleague were released in November when a judge found insufficient evidence to bring them to trial.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for a court of constitutionality, a supreme court, a court of appeals, and several other courts of special jurisdiction. Military courts have jurisdiction only over military personnel. Civilian trials are public; defendants have the right to be present and represented by an attorney. Law students often provide state-funded legal services to indigent defendants. The Court of Appeals automatically reviews convictions. The judiciary in 1989 continued to work to increase its capacity to deal with cases of both ordinary and political violence. "Model" courts were established in urban and rural areas as a pilot project. New techniques and procedures, including prioritization of cases, bilingual capacity in indigenous areas, and other innovations are being developed to try to overcome the historic problems of corruption, favoritism, understaffing and lack of training that have hindered the effective administration of justice.

In June Eleodoro Sal Siquinajay admitted, in an army-sponsored press conference, that he belonged to the ORPA unit responsible for the 1988 El Aguacate massacre and to kidnaping and killing a missing resident of El Aguacate. Persons who saw Sal after the press conference, however, reported that he had recanted his statement and charged army pressure was behind the confession. Some observers expressed concern that the press conference violated Sal's rights: he had not come before a judge within 6 hours and had been forced to incriminate himself. On September 26, Sal was found not guilty of kidnaping and murder; he received 2 years in prison and a fine of $18 for theft and illegal possession of a handgun.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of home, correspondence, and private documents. This provision seemed to be generally respected. Critics charged, however, that Civil Defense Patrols were a form of forced membership in an organization. The evidence on the patrols, however, was mixed. In most areas that still had the patrols, participation appeared to be voluntary; in the conflictive areas of Quiche and Huehuetenango, however, the degree of voluntarism was open to serious question. While the military has denied allegations that it threatens or persecutes rural villagers or groups that actively campaign against the patrols, a number of such activists have disappeared or been subject to other abuses.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

A nearly 30-year-old guerrilla conflict continued throughout 1989. Some human rights groups charged the Government with indiscriminate use of aircraft and artillery by the military against civilian populations; allegations of "carpet" bombing, strafing, and heavy artillery barrages, however, were not generally credible given Guatemala's small air force and limited artillery resources. While little information exists on treatment given captured guerrillas, there are unconfirmed reports that they have suffered physical abuse and even death at the hands of their military captors. Similar reports indicate that guerrillas also engaged in such practices with captured soldiers.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of expression, and there were no government-sponsored efforts to restrict it. Vocal critics of the Government received widespread media attention throughout 1989. The three major newspapers maintained strongly antigovernment editorial policies throughout the year; one openly supported a rival party. Press releases and advertisements by guerrilla groups and other opposition groups were frequently run by the press with no government retaliation. Foreign films, books, television programs (most via cable), magazines, and newspapers were available. The Government did not interfere either with foreign radio broadcasts or the activity of foreign journalists, even those critical of the Government and the military.

In August a customs official seized 12 books mailed to CERJ leader Amilcar Mendez. Mendez petitioned the Human Rights Ombudsman who ruled in his favor; the books were given to Mendez with apologies from the customs service.

GUATEMALA

In spite of official respect for freedom of expression and press, reported threats and acts of violence against the media increased significantly in 1989. The transmission tower of a television station was bombed in July, killing a technician. The explosion occurred the night the station was to broadcast a widely publicized exclusive interview with Nicaraguan President Ortega. The interview never aired. A car belonging to the coowner of the largest radio network was bombed outside his home, also in July. Elements of the security forces acting on their own were widely believed responsible for both actions, but the perpetrators have not been apprehended. The magazine Por Que ceased publication after the publisher and other staff members were threatened; some left Guatemala. The magazine had strong ties to Danilo Barillas, the Christian Democrat politician who was murdered in August (see Section 1.a.). Other journalists also reported receiving death threats and some reportedly left Guatemala. Despite the closing of Por Que, the number of publications and media outlets grew in 1989, continuing a trend established with the return of elected government.

While journalists continued to exercise self-censorship on topics such as the insurgency and political violence, they criticized the military more openly than ever in the past. The navy's mishandling of a boat accident in January, in which over 100 persons died, drew vigorous press scrutiny and criticism. This attention--despite some apparent initial efforts to cover up the incident--pushed the Government into admitting official malfeasance. The media responded strongly to public criticism leveled against them by the Minister of Defense. The same reaction greeted President Cerezo's address to the nation in which he sharply criticized specific media organizations. The furor abated only when President Cerezo visited those organizations and firmly restated his support for a free and independent press.

Students and some faculty members of San Carlos University in Guatemala City were subjected to threats, kidnappings, and murder in a wave of violence in August and September (see Section 1.b.). The victims were accused by a group calling itself the "Secret Anti-Communist Army of San Carlos University" of having links to guerrilla organizations. The intimidation temporarily shut down night classes on the campus and effectively dissolved various student associations.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the rights of peaceful assembly and political association. Parades, rallies, and demonstrations were held frequently during 1989. By law, organizations must obtain legal association status from the Government, a cumbersome procedure. Labor, religious, student, human rights, and charitable organizations operated legally, including those with foreign ties. The lack of legal association status did not prevent numerous other organizations from operating openly.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion. Religious freedom is provided for in law and realized in practice. While 70 percent of the population is nominally Catholic, many Indians mix traditional and Catholic beliefs. A large number of other religious denominations have an active presence; 25 percent of Guatemalans adhered to Protestant denominations, many with ties abroad. Generally, foreign priests and missionaries worked without interference. Guatemala has small Mormon, Jewish, Baha'i, Buddhist, and Islamic communities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not restrict foreign travel; critics traveled freely. The Government does not revoke citizenship for political reasons. The return of one exile group, the United Representatives of the Guatemalan Opposition, however, amid considerable press and television attention, resulted in their allegedly receiving death threats. The group went abroad again after a car bomb was discovered and defused near their residence.

Freedom of movement within Guatemala was generally unhindered except in some conflictive areas. In guerrilla-controlled villages of northern Quiche (known as Popular Communities in Resistance, the Guerrilla Army of the Poor (EGP) maintained tight control over travel. Threats and violence, including the use of land mines, severely restricted movement into or out of these areas. The army also restricted movement in some conflictive areas.

Guatemala remained a refuge for thousands of Central Americans. Over 30,000 Nicaraguans and unknown numbers of Salvadorans were reported to be in Guatemala. Guatemalan refugees returning from Mexico numbered around 900 through September, a rate half that of the previous year. Some refugees returned once again to Mexico, primarily for economic reasons. The Mexican Government, however, denied press reports of a mass migration back to Mexico by Guatemalan refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Guatemalans have the right to change their government by democratic means. There is universal suffrage. The voting age is 18 and voting is by secret ballot. Vinicio Cerezo of the Christian Democratic party (DCG) won free and fair elections in November 1985 and became President in January 1986. While slightly more than half of the 100 congressional deputies were DCG, 10 other parties, ranging from far right to moderate left, also are represented in the legislature. Congressional debates were lively and well-covered by the media; on occasion the Congress asserted itself, most notably by exercising its constitutional right to deny the President authorization to travel abroad, holding "no confidence" votes against government ministers, and rejecting the Government's 1990 budget. New national elections are due in 1990, and political party activity was intense during 1989. Some 20 parties will seek to participate in the 1990 elections.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government did not hinder international human rights organizations working in Guatemala. Senior officials met representatives of such groups, including AW and AI, to discuss the human rights situation in Guatemala.

The constitutionally created office of the Human Rights Ombudsman was active during 1989; pronouncements by that office, including those highly critical of government performance in handling the investigation of the November 1988 El Aguacate massacre and of authorities' efforts to solve disappearances, were widely disseminated by the media.

The Congressional Commission on Human Rights, also mandated by the Constitution, increased its activity despite meager resources. The Commission pressed for reappointment of a U.N. Human Rights Rapporteur (Guatemala has been subject in the past to UNHRC scrutiny) and was successful in obtaining from the Government requested lists of arrested persons. The President's Advisory Commission on Human Rights, apparently concerned primarily with defending abroad the Government's human rights record, achieved little during the year in advancing the cause of human rights.

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) opened an office in Guatemala in January 1988, but by the end of 1989 it had not yet reached agreement with the Government on carrying out its full range of humanitarian activities. It did conduct a limited program, including an educational program for the Army.

Despite official tolerance, some foreign and local human rights organizations and personnel suffered violent attacks from assailants assumed to have links to the security forces or rightwing groups. The office of one small local group, the Commission for the Investigation, Study and Promotion of Human Rights (CIEPRODH), was shot at in January. Explosions damaged the offices of the GAM and the Peace Brigades International in August. In December three Peace Brigadists, including a United States citizen, were stabbed by unknown assailants. Throughout the year GAM members reported receiving threats and were targets of violence, including kidnaping and murder. The leader of CERJ alleged receiving numerous threats and charged that unknown persons tried to run his car off the road. In late December, the offices of the ICRC were damaged by a grenade blast.

Several nongovernmental human rights groups published reports in 1989 on conditions in Guatemala; the reports were based primarily on field work and interviews conducted openly in the country. One group, although highly critical, thanked the Government for allowing its "observation of the National Police in a manner and degree unknown under previous military regimes."

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

About half the population is culturally indigenous, the other half ladino. While possessing equal legal rights, indigenous people generally continued to be outside the national economy, culture, and language. The brunt of the fighting in the guerrilla conflict fell on indigenous people: young rural men were much more likely to be drafted into the army or forcibly recruited into guerrilla bands than their urban Westernized counterparts. Both sides fielded largely Indian forces led principally by ladino officers; most combat occurred in indigenous areas. The majority of victims of disappearances and extrajudicial killings were indigenous persons. On the positive side, some progress, particularly in nontraditional agriculture and bilingual education, was made to provide Indians a somewhat higher standard of living in the future. A few Indians held public office, including as congressmen and mayors; some are serving as Army officers.

Women are increasingly active in the country work force, but discrimination on the basis of sex in the workplace continued. Jobs were often advertised on the basis of sex, and women typically received lower wages for the same or similar job. There are no organizations devoted to women's issues and, with the exception of Mrs. Cerezo, there are no prominent persons involved with the issue.

Violence against women, including domestic violence such as wife beating, is common but does not receive much attention from the Government, public, or press. Such abuse, including criminal sexual violence, often goes unreported by victims and is not considered a high priority for law enforcement. Police are reluctant to intervene in what is frequently considered a domestic affair. Few cases of rape are brought before the courts.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the legal right to join a union of their choosing. Procedures for obtaining legal status for trade unions are those adopted in the wake of the 1954 coup and are cumbersome. In 1988, 66 unions obtained legal status and a similar number will have done so in 1989. The newly formed unions were mostly in the public sector, which was guaranteed the right to organize by the Constitution. Despite the increase, only about 8 percent of the country's work force is unionized.

The law allows several unions in the same company; some union leaders complained that parallel unions undermined their members' interests. There were allegations that the Government favored unions with ties to the governing Christian Democratic party (in the case of the port workers in Santo Tomas de Castilla, there was evidence that this accusation was accurate).

There is an active Solidarismo movement in the country. While leaders of the movement claim that it is a legitimate form of worker organization, the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO), and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and other international trade union organizations contend that Solidarismo is an employer-inspired alternative to independent trade unions. The Ministry of Labor has thus far refused to register Solidarismo organizations as unions.

The Constitution provides for the right to strike, but procedures for a legal strike remain cumbersome. Most strikes simply occur without legal permission. In practice, the Ministry of Labor makes no effort to obtain a judicial determination of their legality. A notable exception was the 66-day teachers strike which was formally declared illegal. In the end, teachers agreed to return to work but accepted a settlement which cost them half a month's pay. They were the first public sector employees to lose money through an unlawful strike.

Unions may form federations and confederations and join international bodies. The Confederation of Labor Unity is affiliated with the ICFTU and its Latin American Regional Labor Organization. The Latin American Confederation of Labor also had a local affiliate, the General Confederation of Guatemalan Workers. While no labor unions openly acknowledge ties with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), some in the Guatemalan Confederation for Labor Unity receive aid from the WFTU, Cuba, or Nicaragua.

Labor leaders are often identified by human rights groups as the victims of threats, disappearances, and murder (see Sections 1.a. and 1.b.). Many were lower level labor activists, and there is not a clear explanation why they have suffered most of the violence. Local factors such as a plant manager's antiunion sentiment were responsible for some of these abuses. The kidnaping of Lucia Guadalupe Avila de Estrada (Section 1.b.) was linked to her union activities. The Labor Ministry and the Labor Courts do not normally involve themselves in cases of threats, disappearances or murders.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) recognized the establishment of a tripartite commission to update the labor law and reiterated its request that the Government bring provisions of its Labor Code into conformity with Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, in particular those provisions which currently place unions under strict government supervision; impede unions' participation in politics and sanction those that do participate; and prohibit strikes by agricultural workers and otherwise unduly restrict the right to strike. At its November 1989 meeting, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association urgently appealed to the Government to submit information regarding a new complaint against the Government alleging violation of Convention 87.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

According to the Labor Ministry, there were 70 to 80 collective bargaining agreements in force in 1989, and they covered only a fraction of the organized work force. Many public sector unions were negotiating their first contract. The greatest obstacle to organizing was discriminatory antiunion actions by employers and others. Workers who sought to form unions were sometimes fired; others quit and went abroad as a result of threats. It was common for courts to issue injunctions to force companies to obtain judicial authorization before firing employees. Companies which ignored the law faced only the token punishment of small fines.

The law allows workers to appeal discriminatory firings and provides for separation pay for those who lose their jobs. In practice, however, the labor courts remained overburdened and legal remedies were slow. The courts have often not been able to reinstate dismissed employees.

Guatemalan labor laws are based on constitutional provisions, and there are no areas of the country that are outside their jurisdiction. A new law authorizing the creation of export processing zones specifies that all labor codes apply in them. In its 1989 report, cited above, the COE noted that the Constitution grants freedom of association and collective bargaining to all workers in the public and private sectors and expressed its satisfaction with a decree setting forth procedures for the exercise of the rights to organize, bargain collectively, and strike in the public sector.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced labor and it does not generally exist. Some local and foreign human rights groups charged, however, that coercion was used in some areas to ensure a suitable number of "volunteers" for the civil defense patrols. There have also been isolated cases of alleged compulsory labor outside of the routine activities of the civil patrols but no pattern to these instances has been established.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Constitution prohibits the employment of children under the age of 14 years. In the industrial sector, where government labor codes were enforced, child labor did not appear to be common. In the informal sector, this regulation, as well as others, was not effectively enforced. In 1989 it was common to see children employed as street vendors, begging for money, or watching and washing cars. In rural areas, entire families worked. Migrant laborers, particularly those from the indigenous highlands, often bring their families with them and spend several months away from their homes, interfering with the children's education.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Constitution provides for a 44-hour workweek. While occupational safety and health regulations existed, they were not always enforced effectively. The minimum wage for farm labor was $2 per day, though there were a number of higher minimum wages by employment sector in urban areas. Ministry of Labor data show that 85 percent of Guatemalan families did not have enough income to meet basic needs and that 72 percent lived in extreme poverty. Minimum wages were raised in 1988 for the first time this decade; no raise took place in 1989.

GUYANA

The Cooperative Republic of Guyana, a member of the Commonwealth of Nations, is a small, multiracial developing nation located on the South American continent; culturally and politically it is considered a part of the Caribbean. A unicameral Parliament is chosen by direct election in a multiparty political system. The head of the majority party in Parliament serves as Executive President. Under the 1980 Constitution, parliamentary, regional, and municipal elections are held at least every 5 years. The People's National Congress (PNC), currently led by President Hugh Desmond Hoyte, has dominated political life since the 1964 elections. The opposition parties boycotted the November 1989 municipal elections, alleging that they would not be free and fair due to ruling party control of the electoral machinery.

Guyanese society and political life are influenced by differences between the ethnic Afro-Guyanese and Indo-Guyanese. Urban Afro-Guyanese dominate the ruling PNC, the Guyana Police Force (GPF), the Guyana Defence Force (GDF), and other security forces; Indo-Guyanese predominate in the agricultural and business sectors.

The Guyana Police Force has primary responsibility for maintaining law and order throughout Guyana. In addition, the Customs and Excise Department, and various branches of the Special Constabulary, have arrest authority within certain well-defined limits. The Police and Constabulary, the GDF, the Guyana National Service, the Guyana People's Militia, Guyana Prisons Service, and the Customs and Excise Department, are directly responsible to the civilian Government.

Public corporations control two of Guyana's major export industries, sugar and bauxite, which employ about 17 percent of the work force. The third principal export industry, rice, is primarily in private hands. Despite the Government's efforts to enhance the role of the private sector and encourage private foreign and domestic investment, the economy continued to be plagued by external debt, sluggish growth, and a deteriorating infrastructure. On March 31 the Government began an economic recovery program with the assistance of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The program included an immediate 70-percent devaluation of the Guyana dollar, which drastically reduced real income and sparked public protests.

Human rights concerns in Guyana continue to center on police abuse of persons arrested, limitations on press freedom, and questionable electoral practices. Although the improved atmosphere noted since the 1985 change of PNC leadership following the death of Linden Forbes Burnham has continued, several unions which exercised the traditionally recognized right to strike in 1989 suffered reprisal from public sector employers, and the authorities showed little tolerance for a new labor umbrella organization which challenged government policies.

GUYANA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No politically motivated or governmentally instigated extrajudicial killings are known to have occurred. Summary executions do not take place.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances, clandestine detentions, or abductions.

c. Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

While torture is prohibited by the Constitution, the Guyana Human Rights Association (GHRA) has expressed its concern over "the use of violence by the police and its apparent acceptance by society at large." It has also stated its belief that "those responsible for excessive violence constitute a small element within the force as a whole." Police regulations require internal investigation of all charges of abuse, and in the past some police officers have been disciplined or fined. In 1989 no police officers were disciplined or fined as a result of police investigations of brutality, although some were reportedly punished for corruption. The Director of Public Prosecutions did not prosecute any police on charges of brutality during 1989. On June 9, the legislature passed the Police Complaints Authority Bill which provides for the establishment of an independent Police Complaints Authority consisting of one person qualified to be a puisne (inferior) judge of the high court and two assistants. Although the Authority itself will have no investigative powers, it will supervise police investigations of specified cases of misconduct or serious crimes alleged to have been committed by members of the police force, and will make annual reports to the legislature.

Civil and criminal suits may be brought against police officers by private citizens, but critics charge that police discourage complainants from bringing suit. One case, in which it is alleged that a prisoner died while in police custody in 1986, was in court at year's end.

The GHRA noted in 1989 its concern with reports of inadequate nutrition for prisoners in the nation's penal system.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that no person may be deprived of personal liberty except as authorized by law, and also calls for judicial determination of the legality of detention. Some opposition politicians allege that the arrests of party and union activists during the May 1989 sugar strike was a politically motivated act of intimidation. The Government states that the arrests were part of an investigation into cases of arson. Most arrestees were released without charge.

In an ongoing treason case, three People's Progressive Party (PPP) activists state that they were held incommunicado from their alleged arrest on April 28 until a writ of habeas corpus was filed on May 3. On August 14, however, the magistrate presiding over the case accepted the statement of the police that the three were not in fact arrested until May 3.

On December 6 the National Assembly voted to repeal the National Security Act, which permits the detention without charges for up to 3 months of persons who are deemed (by officials at the ministerial level) likely to act "in any manner prejudicial to public safety or public order or the defense of Guyana. At year's end, actual repeal was in the legislative process and the Act remained in force. No one has ever been detained under these provisions of the Act.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Under Guyana's British common law system, the Constitution provides that anyone charged with a criminal offense has the right to a hearing by a court of law, and this right is respected in practice. Guyana has a functioning bail system, and defendants are granted fair public trials. Defendants are represented by counsel appointed by the court when necessary. Timely charges are presented, and appeal can be made to higher courts. There are no political prisoners or special courts for political security cases. A pending treason case against three men is being heard in the regular court. Some opposition figures have expressed concern over the courts' rulings in certain cases involving government interests, such as in libel suits brought by government officials. Opposition lawyers complain that the judiciary is prone to grant lengthy postponements in trials affecting the Government or law enforcement officials; however, postponements are routinely granted to both the defense and the prosecution. Delays in judicial proceedings are most often caused by shortages of trained court administrative personnel.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government generally respects the right to privacy. Some opposition politicians have alleged incidents of government surveillance, particularly at meetings and rallies. The National Security Act, which the National Assembly voted to repeal in December (Section 1.d.), permits police of the rank of inspector and above to conduct searches for narcotics and arms without a search warrant but with probable cause. Narcotics laws also permit searches for narcotics without warrants but with probable cause. The laws requiring judicially issued warrants for all other searches were respected.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The constitutional provision for freedom of speech is respected, and Guyanese can, and do, criticize their Government and its policies.

Guyana's public television station, Guyana Television (GTV-10), broadcasts a 1-hour program on Sundays. It also provides a nightly 15-minute news program, which generally presents the Government's point of view but does include coverage of opposition views and events, to the country's two private television stations. The two private stations normally broadcast satellite transmissions from the United States, including uncensored network news, but do not produce their own local news broadcasts. The country's only radio station, the government-owned Guyana Broadcasting Corporation (GBC), is selective in reporting the views and activities of opposition parties. Some of the GBC's radio interview and commentary programs allow public criticism of the Government, but, in general, they reflect government policies. The GBC radio station refused, for example, to allow the Anglican Bishop's "Charge to the Synod" to be broadcast on the April 9 "Church Calling" radio program on the grounds that it was not devotional. The GBC similarly refused to broadcast a July 9 Catholic Church program concerning the 1979 murder of Father Bernard Arke. Although there is interest in establishing private radio stations, the Government has yet to implement a licensing procedure allowing for their operation. Foreign and regional radio stations can be heard on medium and shortwave bands.

In the past the Government, through ownership of the country's only daily newspaper and radio station, issuance of import licenses for newsprint and printing presses, and control of most hard currency, maintained varying degrees of control over the media. This control, however, has been easing since 1987. The independent Stabroek News currently publishes twice a week. Newsprint availability remained a problem, but the shortage affected government as well as independent publications. The Guyana Press Association, reactivated in 1988, continued to function in 1989.

Individual members of the Government have sometimes brought libel suits against publishers, which critics claim is to discourage press criticism of the Government. A lawsuit filed in 1988 by individual police officers against the GHRA over its "Brief on Police Violence" is still being heard in the courts. No such libel suits were filed in 1989.

In 1989 the government-owned daily newspaper, the Guyana Chronicle, reduced its previously expanded coverage of news and commentaries that differ from government views, and became more clearly reflective of government positions. Independent periodicals remained free to criticize the Government and its policies. Information on government activities is carefully controlled, although in 1989 government officials were increasingly available to the press through press conferences. The April 1988 Public Corporations Act, which provides for the fining and imprisonment of employees of public corporations who disclose unauthorized information about government activities and operations, continued to be viewed by the media as a restraint. To date, no one has been charged under the law. Guyanese can receive printed materials from abroad without restrictions, but scarce foreign exchange limits their availability. Certain regional newspapers and international news magazines, which often contain criticism of the Government, are, however, regularly available.

The Government's record on academic freedom continued to be good. Several opposition activists in the GHRA and the Marxist Working People's Alliance (WPA) teach at the public University of Guyana, and opposition parties have also organized groups there.

GUYANA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Public Order Act requires police permits for mass political meetings but allows the police commissioner, at his discretion and without explanation, to refuse permission for a public meeting. In 1989 opposition parties organized numerous rallies and marches, particularly in April, to protest the establishment of the Government's economic reform program. Opposition figures complained, however, that permission to hold rallies and use amplified sound systems was at times arbitrarily denied. Although all requests to hold marches in April during the period of protests against the Government's economic program were denied, several marches took place without incident, while marchers in others were arrested for taking part in illegal processions. Unruly protestors were occasionally arrested but usually released within hours or the next day. The Government imposes no restrictions on private associations, which are not required to be registered and which may maintain relations with international bodies as they wish.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for freedom of thought and religion. There is no favored or official state religion. All religions in Guyana are allowed to select their places of worship and are free to maintain links with coreligionists in other countries. Christian, Hindu, Muslims, and Baha'i communities in Guyana practice their religions without restrictions. There are no restrictions on travel for religious purposes, nor on training of clergy, religious publishing, conversion, religious education, or charitable activities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within Guyana is provided for in the Constitution. Travel to certain Amerindian areas requires government permission, a regulation dating from colonial times designed to protect the indigenous peoples from exploitation. The GHRA, opposition politicians, and some clergy contend that permits are sometimes denied to missionaries and non-PNC politicians, and that the regulations are being used to maintain PNC influence among the Amerindians. Guyanese are free to travel abroad, emigrate, and to return. Guyana is neither a refugee receiving nor generating country. There are no forced resettlements or displaced persons, and citizenship is not denied on political grounds.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Guyanese are free to express their political views and to join or support a variety of political parties, but electoral practices call into question whether citizens in practice have the ability to change the Government. All citizens 18 years of age or older are eligible to participate in the political process and to vote. National and regional elections, by secret ballot, are held at least every 5 years. The leader of the winning party serves as President and forms a Cabinet. Constitutionally, the next national elections must be held by early 1991.

Opposition parties vigorously criticize the Government and are free to field candidates for election. Since 1964, however, the People's National Congress (PNC), a predominantly Afro-Guyanese party, has dominated political life through questionable electoral practices. Opposition parties regularly charge the ruling party with fraud. Following the 1985 elections, opposition parties, including the Communist People's Progressive Party (PPP), joined in the Patriotic Coalition for Democracy (PCD). The PCD seeks such reforms in Guyana's election laws as the counting of ballots at the polling places rather than at central counting places. President Hoyte stated in September that he opposed the counting of ballots at polling places on grounds that voters in "ethnic enclaves" could easily be subjected to intimidation. The PCD boycotted the November 1989 municipal elections, stating that current electoral laws were insufficient to guarantee that they would be free and fair. The unopposed PNC slates were declared elected. Thirty-six prominent individuals from a broad cross-section of Guyanese society signed an open letter on electoral reform in August, calling for the creation of an acceptable elections commission as well as election monitoring by local and international observers.

The Integrity Commission, appointed by the Government in 1986 to investigate the need for a code of ethics for public officials, also called for electoral reform, including greater dialogue with opposition parties. In 1989 the PCD requested a meeting with President Hoyte, who agreed to meet a single spokesman to represent the six parties. By year's end the PCD had not agreed on a spokesman. The President did meet during the year with the leader of the recently formed United Republican Party, which is not a member of the PCD.

Political parties are organized generally along ethnic lines, a situation that predates independence. President Hoyte has appointed a number of Indo-Guyanese to ministerial and other government positions and attracted still others to the PNC.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government regards outside criticism of its human rights practices as interference in its internal affairs. The GHRA, the most active local human rights group, functions without government interference. The GHRA is a nongovernmental organization formed in 1979 with support from trade unions, professional organizations, and churches, and it issues periodic press releases and publishes an annual report on human rights in Guyana. It also gathers information from members, victims of abuse, trade unionists, clergy, other interested parties, official documents, and newspapers. A British prisons expert who visited Guyana in 1989 was received by government officials, but was not permitted to examine prisons. The Government contended that its refusal was due to insufficient advance notice.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Constitution provides for fundamental rights to all persons in Guyana. Guyanese society and political life continue to be influenced by ethnic differences between Afro-Guyanese and Indo-Guyanese. Guyana has a small ethnic Amerindian population, composed of nine tribal groups, living in scattered reservations throughout the country. Relative to most Guyanese, their standard of living is low. The GHRA has alleged that Amerindians are subjected to government control of their leaders and land titles, as well as limitations on access to their reservations by clergy and other outsiders.

The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex and provides women the right to equal pay for equal work. There are no discriminatory family laws or restrictions on women's right to own property. There are no organizations that focus primarily on women's rights. Violence against women, including domestic violence such as wife beating, is considered by many to be a significant problem. However, victims of such abuse oftentimes are reluctant to report it to the authorities or to press charges, and underreporting of incidents of such violence makes it impossible to estimate its true extent. The Government does not condone this practice, but other than providing victims with access to the courts for redress has not recommended additional legislation or other remedial action.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of association is provided for in the Constitution, which specifically enumerates a person's right "to form or belong to trade unions." Approximately 88,000 of Guyana's estimated 240,000 workers are organized. Unions are free to choose their own officials. There have been allegations that the Government has attempted to influence the outcome of some union elections, but in general elections are vigorously contested. The views of trade unions and trade unionists are widely publicized in both the government-controlled and independent media. Workers in Guyana have a generally recognized right to strike, but this right is not codified. The sugar and bauxite industries experienced highly disruptive 6-week strikes protesting the March 31 budget, which launched the difficult IMF-monitored economic recovery program, including a 70-percent currency devaluation. The strike ended when workers in both industries returned to their jobs without a formal wage settlement agreement after the Government pledged to seek ways to ameliorate the situation. Public employees providing essential services are forbidden to strike, but a procedure exists for the review of grievances by a tribunal appointed by the Minister of Labor.

Political parties, particularly the ruling PNC, wield significant influence in a number of unions, and political figures often have dual roles as trade union leaders. All 18 actively participating unions in the Trades Union Congress (TUC), the major umbrella labor organization, are either strongly influenced by or affiliated with the PNC. Guyana's largest union, the Guyana Agricultural and General Workers Union (GAWU), is affiliated with the opposition PPP.

Six unions belong to the dissident Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Guyana (FITUG), which was originally formed when these unions plus one other (which later returned to the TUC) walked out of the September 1988 TUC conference in protest against heavy-handed electioneering tactics by PNC activist delegates. FITUG, whose members have not formally severed their ties with the TUC, has renewed a longstanding call for reform of the TUC to redistribute internal power and safeguard the independence of the organization from political influence.

FITUG suffered some consequences because it played the major role in protesting against the budget. The Government continued its efforts begun in 1988 to bring the FITUG unions back into the TUC, and several unions which struck during the labor unrest in the first half of 1989 suffered reprisals from public sector employers. In February, the leadership of Guyana's two bauxite unions was temporarily "derecognized" and collection of the union's checkoff dues (as required under the unions' collective agreement) was discontinued by their public sector employer following a FITUG-inspired 1-day protest strike against government policies. A number of teachers who participated in this protest strike were dismissed or transferred to remote sections of the country, and in one instance it was reported that picketing teachers and students were attacked by PNC-connected thugs. In response to a 1-day protest strike in April by a FITUG affiliate, four state corporations dismissed nearly 300 workers and ceased deduction of that union's checkoff dues. Collection of checkoff dues was reinstituted by mid-year for all affected unions, including one whose checkoff dues had been discontinued in late 1988. All but a few of the terminated workers were rehired in their previous positions, and some but not all of the teachers had their dismissals or transfers rescinded.

The trade union movement has only limited influence beyond issues directly related to industrial relations. Unionists and their property are not specifically protected by law. Under the Trades Union Act, property of trade unions is vested in the unions' trustees for the use and benefit of the union and its members.

Unions freely maintain relations with recognized Caribbean and international trade union and professional groups. All three of the global trade union internationals have affiliates in Guyana.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Public and private sector employees possess and utilize the right to organize and to bargain collectively. In 1987, the most recent year for which figures are available from the Ministry of Labor, 18 collective bargaining agreements were concluded. Although an amendment to the Labor Act gave centralized bargaining power to the TUC in negotiations with the public sector, this law was overturned on procedural grounds in 1987, and the collective bargaining provisions have not been resubmitted to Parliament.

The Chief Labor Officer and his staff at the Ministry of Labor provide consultation services. Disputes are frequently settled through consultation and dialogue without resorting to strikes or other industrial action. During the sugar and bauxite strikes, however, this process did little to help resolve the dispute. There were no known cases of antiunion discrimination. There are no special areas or industries where collective bargaining is impeded or discouraged; labor laws and regulations are applied uniformly throughout the country.

GUYANA

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and it does not exist in Guyana.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Minimum age laws are set out in the Factories Act and the Employment of Women, Young Persons, and Children Act. Under the law, no person under 14 years of age shall be employed in any industrial undertaking, and no person under 16 shall be employed at night, except under regulated circumstances. Government policy, however, is stricter: no one under 18 can be employed outside the family. In addition, the terms "industry" and "factory" as used in the law have been interpreted by the Ministry of Labor to encompass nearly all workplaces except offices and retail shops. According to the law, children under age 14 may be employed only in enterprises in which members of the same family are employed. The Ministry of Labor monitors compliance with minimum age laws.

There are significant numbers of children in Guyana under the age of 14 who engage in street vending and there have been no apparent efforts by the Government to limit this activity.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Hours of employment are set under the Factories Act and vary by industry and sector. Most workers work an 8-hour day and a 40-hour week. The Ministry of Labor monitors compliance with laws on maximum hours. Occupational health and safety standards are also treated under the Factories Act. The Occupational Health and Safety Division of the Ministry of Labor conducts factory inspections and investigates charges of substandard workplaces and conditions. The Ministry of Labor report for 1987 states, however, that this division was hampered by understaffing and inadequate funding.

Despite a 20-percent increase in the minimum wage for public employees, the 70-percent devaluation of the Guyanese currency on March 31, and the subsequent inflation, caused the public sector minimum daily wage to decline from the equivalent of $2.49 at the official exchange rate to $.90 per day. The widely used black market rate for U.S. dollars is approximately 40 percent more than the official rate. In September the Government implemented a further 20-percent increase, which brought the public sector minimum wage to the equivalent of $1.09 per day. This figure is considered inadequate to support workers and their families, primarily because continuing inflation and the recent devaluation have far outpaced wage increases. There is no legally established private sector minimum wage, but private employees' salaries are in almost all cases higher than those of public workers.

HAITI

Haiti was ruled in 1989 by a military Government headed by Lt. Gen. Prosper Avril. Noncommissioned officers and soldiers of the Presidential Guard asked Avril to serve as transitional Head of State in September 1988 after they deposed General Henri Namphy, whose flagrant human rights violations had been widely condemned. Although the Government has its power base in the Army, all but one of the cabinet ministers appointed by Avril are civilians. Haiti had no legislative body in 1989. An independent electoral council began work in April to prepare for local, parliamentary, and presidential elections. Local elections were scheduled to begin in April 1990.

The Haitian Army constitutes the state security apparatus. In urban areas, army units serve as police. In rural areas, Section Chiefs, who are approved by the Army but are responsible to the Ministry of Interior, serve as the rough equivalent of local sheriffs. There were credible reports that the army units serving as urban police were involved in a number of human rights violations during 1989; even more abuses took place in rural areas where Section Chiefs were often held responsible. Armed bands, some possibly linked to remnants of the Tonton Macoute militia (the security apparatus of the former Duvalier dictatorship), committed a number of murders.

Haiti is the poorest and most densely populated country in the Western Hemisphere. Poverty, unemployment, and economic inequalities continue to plague all aspects of life for most Haitians. The embargo on most foreign government-to-government aid throughout most of 1989, imposed after disrupted elections in late 1987, further damaged the economy. Economic opportunities remain very limited for most Haitians.

Human rights abuses perpetrated or directed by government leaders were the hallmark of previous Haitian regimes. The Avril Government avoided the egregious violations--massacres and politically motivated killings--characteristic of its predecessors. Also, despite some exceptions, the Avril Government in 1989 generally did not target political and human rights activists nor repress basic civil liberties, such as freedom of expression and freedom of the press. However, in late January, 1990, the Avril Government imposed a state of siege which suspended basic civil liberties, including freedom of the press, and arrested, beat, and deported a number of prominent opposition politicians. This action posed serious questions about the intent of the Avril Government to stand by its commitment to a transition to democracy. Avril continued in 1989 an extensive housecleaning of the military and police, retiring or otherwise removing over 100 officers and enlisted men suspected of corruption or narcotics trafficking. Following an attempted coup d'etat in April, Avril dissolved the Dessalines Battalion, which was a source of numerous human rights violations in the past.

Nonetheless, serious human rights violations persisted in 1989. There were numerous reports of brutality and arbitrary arrest. In many cases, both in the capital and in the provinces, the inefficient and often corrupt judicial system failed to provide a speedy and fair trial to those accused of crimes. With the notable exception of former Macoute Augustin Majeure, who was sentenced in Gonaives in September to hard labor for life, perpetrators of past heinous crimes have not been charged, arrested or tried. Few army personnel or Section Chiefs were punished for abuses committed in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political killings clearly sanctioned by high-ranking government officials, such as the massacres and assassinations of political activists that took place under the previous post-Duvalier governments in 1987 and 1988, did not occur in 1989. In November unknown assailants murdered three political activists who were writing graffiti advocating the return of former President Manigat, but there was no substantiated evidence linking these apparently politically motivated killings to government forces. Nonetheless, as in previous years, individual soldiers and rural Section Chiefs committed a number of extrajudicial killings, either for personal reasons, at the behest of private patrons, or in clear abuse of their official powers. The Government announced disciplinary actions against several dozen soldiers and Section Chiefs charged with abuses; one, Lt. Antoine Metellus, was court-martialed and sentenced to a prison term, while others were transferred or relieved of their duties. However, Haitian human rights organizations report that the individuals implicated in the following incidents, chosen for their illustrative and not inclusive nature, have not been arrested or tried:

On May 15, a group of soldiers from the St. Marc barracks accompanied a wealthy landowner, Chardieu Joseph, on a raid against a group of peasants in Grand-Bois, killing one, Registre Charlot. A group of peasants then took revenge by murdering Joseph's mother. The soldiers and Joseph responded with a further attack on the peasant village.

On June 4, the Section Chief of Grande Saline killed two peasants and wounded five others who had been participants in a longstanding land dispute.

On July 11, a group of soldiers from Petite-Riviere-de-l'Artibonite illegally entered the home of a peasant, Joannis Malvoisin, and killed him. Malvoisin had been involved in a land dispute with a wealthy landowner.

On August 25, Port-au-Prince police officer Claudy Joachim shot and killed a man who was leaving the civil courthouse after responding to a lawsuit filed against him by a creditor. Joachim's motive is unknown.

On November 17, three members of the party of former President Leslie Manigat were murdered, allegedly as they were putting up political posters. No perpetrators have been identified, although the Government has opened an investigation.

The phenomenon of "popular justice" continued in 1989. Crowds summarily killed a number of individuals suspected of being criminals or former Macoutes.

Many Haitians criticized the Government for failing to control a growing problem of common crime in Port-au-Prince, some of which involved murders and robberies. There were charges that either military or rightwing elements were sponsoring criminal gangs for the purpose of creating a climate of fear and insecurity, thereby justifying continued military rule and repression of civil liberties. Although soldiers were suspected in some of these crimes, the perpetrators were usually unidentified. In an attempt to collect illegally held arms, the Government published lists of former civilian "attaches" of the Dessalines Battalion, many of whom were suspected of being henchmen of rightwing elements within the Army, and summoned them to Army headquarters to turn over their weapons. According to the Government, hundreds of illegal weapons had been collected by the end of the year.

b. Disappearance

There were no credible reports of disappearances in Haiti in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution specifically prohibits physical brutality during interrogation and provides for the right of the accused to have a lawyer and witness present during questioning. In practice, however, beatings and other physical abuse of prisoners remain common in Haiti, despite official admonitions to soldiers and Section Chiefs. The following illustrative cases were well documented:

On January 9, soldiers in the Carrefour barracks beat Ernst Louisdor, who had been accused by a sergeant of being a thief. Louisdor was subsequently hospitalized for internal bleeding.

On June 17, Army officers ordered the beating of four members of the Popular Literacy Movement, fracturing the arm of one of them and damaging another's eye.

On August 1, police in Cap Haitien tied up and beat National Popular Assembly (APN) activists Patrick Casimir and Jean-Robert Lalanne following a demonstration.

In late August, police in Port-au-Prince severely beat Jacquet Douyon, a member of a church youth group.

On November 2, three political activists were arrested and beaten. Jean-Auguste Mesyeux, Evans Paul, and Etienne Marineau were battered in appearance when they were paraded on a government broadcast. At year's end, the state prosecutor was preparing to try the trio for attempting to assassinate the President.

None of the perpetrators of the above abuses were disciplined for these abuses, so far as is known.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Haitian law, a person may be arrested or detained if apprehended during the commission of a crime or pursuant to a judicial warrant based on evidence justifying the arrest. All detainees must be brought before a judge within 48 hours to determine the legality of continued detention, according to the law. If the judge determines that a legal basis for the arrest exists, the person may be held for further legal process; otherwise the detainee must be released.

HAITI

In practice, a poorly organized and sometimes corrupt legal system more often than not fails to adhere to the law's requirements. Arrests are frequently made without a judicial warrant, and most detainees are held for periods in excess of 48 hours before being brought before a judge. Some detainees are never given the opportunity to challenge the legality of their imprisonment.

Haitian law requires that a suspect be formally charged at least 2 weeks prior to trial, and that the accused be permitted to meet with an attorney before trial. In fact, the absence of a public defender often deprives suspects of this right. There is no legal procedure for posting bail in Haiti. Judges, however, can and sometimes do grant provisional liberty to a prisoner.

Numerous arbitrary arrests, i.e., illegal arrests without judicial warrant, were ordered by Section Chiefs or carried out by rural soldiers who became involved in personal quarrels or land disputes. In a few cases, illegal arrests appeared to be directed against individuals for political reasons, usually after being accused by local authorities of having participated in "Communist" or "disruptive" activities. In each of these cases, the detainees were released after periods ranging from 1 day to 3 weeks. The following cases were among the arbitrary arrests reported by human rights groups during 1989:

On February 6-7, Port-au-Prince police arrested, without judicial warrant, Rockefeller Guerre and Sylvan Jolibois, two opposition figures accused by the Government of participating in a bombing on February 5 during carnival.

On August 14, the Section Chief of Jean-Rabel, Anovil St. Vil, arrested four members of the "Tet Kole" peasant group and incarcerated them in the prison at Port-de-Paix, allegedly for planning violence aimed at avenging the victims of a massacre at Jean-Rabel in 1987.

On August 16-17, soldiers in Champagne arrested 23 members of a militant opposition group, the National Popular Assembly (APN), allegedly for "Communist activities."

On August 20, soldiers in Labaret arrested three members of the Labadie Youth Movement (MJL) during a concert. On July 10, the police had arrested four persons accused of being members of that organization.

On November 22, the Army arrested 13 members of the League of Former Haitian Political Prisoners (LAPPH) in Anse-A-Pitres, allegedly for "disruptive activities" such as inciting the population to join a hunger strike in support of three imprisoned activists. Eleven were released about a week later; one was still held by the Army, and one was in the hospital due to injuries inflicted by army interrogators. Three other LAPPH members, including its Secretary-General, Gaston Jean-Baptiste, were also detained for several days in November.

The Constitution prohibits deportation or forced exile of Haitian citizens. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

HAITI

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution establishes an independent judicial branch of government and provides for the right to a fair public trial, but chronic weaknesses in the judicial system, and sometimes interference by elements of the executive branch, can deny this right in practice. Many cases never reach the trial stage, and cases that do go to trial are often unfair because of corrupt or incompetent judges and the absence of defense attorneys. The Minister of Justice has been instructed to prepare an in-depth reform of the judicial system. In September he signed a contract with a private organization to provide education for the public and local judicial officials on their legal rights and responsibilities. The Government acknowledges that Haitian prisons have long held and continue to hold numerous detainees who were never publicly tried or convicted of any crime. The Minister of Justice ordered the release of 82 such prisoners from the National Penitentiary in May.

Arraignments and trials are held in public and sometimes receive extensive media coverage. By law, defendants have the right to be represented by a lawyer. Lengthy delays and outside influence on judges and other judicial officials, however, often effectively limit the accused person's exercise of the right to a fair trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

During 1989 there continued to be incidents in which police or Section Chiefs entered private homes without the required judicial warrant in search of suspects or illegal arms. Soldiers or members of the Presidential Guard searched homes without warrants looking for an ex-Sergeant allegedly involved in coup plotting. The home of Human Rights League president Joseph Maxi was searched on November 1 and 3 (Maxi himself went underground on the second occasion), and the home and offices of a peasant leader were searched on November 9. Although such searches continued despite legal sanction, systematic invasions of privacy, family, or correspondence did not occur in Haiti in 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of expression for all citizens is provided for by the Constitution. There are several privately owned newspapers and radio stations, including influential stations owned and operated by the Protestant and Catholic Churches. A privately owned cable television system also operates independently. The Government operates a newspaper and a national radio and television station.

Privately owned print and broadcast media in 1989 often expressed editorial views critical of the Government and freely reported the activities and declarations of government opponents. The Government imposed no censorship of the media. Several incidents of harassment of journalists by soldiers took place. There was no evidence that these incidents were part of any systematic effort to intimidate the free press; on the other hand, there was no known instance of soldiers being punished for such abuses.

HAITI

During the attempted coup d'etat in April, soldiers of the Presidential Guard were reported to have severely damaged four radio station transmitter facilities in Port-au-Prince. President Avril subsequently apologized to the owners of these radio stations but denied that the incident occurred under official orders.

On February 15, soldiers from the Dessalines Battalion, apparently out of the control of their officers, struck several journalists who were covering a youth group demonstration in Port-au-Prince and confiscated some of their cameras and tape recorders.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of peaceful assembly and association. Numerous political, human rights, and socioprofessional organizations were active in Haiti in 1989, and most operated without interference from the Government. Some rural military officials and Section Chiefs attempted to prevent peasant groups from holding meetings without obtaining advance permission from local authorities. In the village of Labadie, for example, local military officials insisted on being present at MJL meetings, citing security concerns as the justification for this policy. Human rights organizations contend that this practice represented an attempt by the local authorities to monitor and intimidate the group. Various human rights groups claim that the military or Section Chiefs continue to deter citizens from speaking out against the Government.

Mass demonstrations were few in 1989. Several proposed demonstrations, such as an anti-imperialist march called by the APN in Port-au-Prince on July 28, failed to materialize due to poor attendance. Police dispersed some demonstrations, including those protesting anticontraband measures in January, but other rallies and meetings took place unhindered, such as an antigovernment rally of human rights and political groups in the National Theater on April 26.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religion is an integral part of Haitian life and culture and is practiced widely without interference from the Government. Roman Catholicism is embraced in varying degrees by about 75 percent of the population. Voodoo, a mixture of African animism and Christianity, is also practiced by a majority of Haitians. Various Protestant denominations and foreign missionary groups openly proselytize in Haiti. There are no government restrictions on missionary activities, affiliations with overseas coreligionists, or religious instruction and publishing.

Attacks on churches, a series of which took place under the Namphy Government in 1988, did not recur in 1989.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Although the Government does not normally restrict domestic travel of citizens or foreigners, an irregular network of military checkpoints operates across Haiti. On occasion, additional vehicle checkpoints are established, generally to check for possession of weapons or for vehicle and driver documentation. There are no restrictions on persons changing their residences or places of employment. Every Haitian citizen is eligible for a passport, and travel documents are neither issued nor denied on the basis of political considerations.

Migrants continue to leave Haiti bound for destinations in more prosperous areas of the Caribbean or North America. Pursuant to a 1981 agreement with the Government of Haiti on the interdiction of undocumented migrants, approximately 4,300 would-be illegal migrants to the United States were repatriated to Haiti from international waters by the U.S. Coast Guard in 1989. U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service officers on board the Coast Guard vessels interviewed those interdicted to determine if any were potential applicants for political asylum. The overwhelming majority expressed only economic reasons for seeking to leave Haiti.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution provides for the right of citizens to change their government through elections, but, in practice, Haitians did not, in 1989, enjoy this right. Following the 1986 overthrow of the Duvalier dictatorship, violence and coups d'etat disrupted the electoral process in 1987 and 1988. President Avril has promised to restore elections and, as a first step, in February convened a forum, in which representatives of 28 political and labor groups participated, to determine the composition of an independent electoral council. The Council was subsequently created in accordance with the forum's recommendations. In September the Provisional Electoral Council (CEP), after consulting with groups and individuals across Haiti, announced an electoral calendar for local, legislative, and presidential elections during the period from April through November 1990. The Avril Government endorsed the schedule and has promised to abide by it.

According to the 1987 Constitution, all male and female citizens 18 years of age or older have the right to vote. Voting is not mandatory but is noted in the Constitution as a citizen's duty. A secret ballot is not explicitly required. The Constitution provides for a 5-year presidential term as well as checks and balances between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government.

In March President Avril restored 262 of the 298 articles of the Constitution. The entire Constitution had been effectively set aside by the previous military government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Several local human rights groups operated in Haiti in 1989. The Government does not generally restrict their activities, which include monitoring of violations, providing legal assistance to victims, and holding seminars to educate the population on human rights. Two of these groups published and distributed monthly newsletters detailing human rights violations. However, the Army detained some 16 members of the LAPPH. One of them was hospitalized after being beaten during an interrogation. The Army's action reportedly was to prevent the human rights group from opening an office in southeastern Haiti.

During 1989 Haiti received visits from a U.N. Special Rapporteur on human rights, a representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross, and a delegation from Americas Watch and the National Coalition for Haitian Refugees. They met with government officials and numerous private sources.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Ninety-five percent of Haitians are descendants of African slaves who gained their independence from France through a revolution ending in 1804. Most of the rest are mulatto or of European or Middle Eastern descent. Under Haitian law, no distinctions are made with regard to race. Nonetheless, there are longstanding social, economic, and political tensions between blacks and mulattos which date back to Haiti's revolutionary period.

Haiti has two official languages, French and Creole. Virtually all Haitians speak Creole. Approximately 20 percent of the population, mostly members of the educated class, speak French. There is no official discrimination on the basis of language, but some social class divisions are drawn along linguistic lines. Although most printed matter is in French, written media increasingly carry articles in Creole. Creole is the dominant language in radio and television broadcasts.

The Haitian Constitution makes no distinction between civil and political rights of men and women. The role of women in Haiti is limited by tradition, but there is no official discrimination between the sexes. Women enjoy legal rights in education, property, and voting.

Violence against women occurs with some frequency although a lack of statistical data makes it impossible to determine its true extent. Such abuse is not sanctioned by the Government. Haitian law does not differentiate between domestic violence and general assault. Due to societal traditions, victims of such domestic violence as wife beating often are unwilling to press charges, thus leading to the likelihood that this abuse is significantly underreported. Human rights groups do not consider violence against women to be one of their primary concerns.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides workers, including civil servants and public sector employees, the right to form unions. Workers do not need government authorization to establish and join trade unions. A union, which must have a minimum of 10 members, is required to register with the Ministry of Social Affairs within 60 days of its establishment. Unions are relatively free to organize but, according to Article 242 of the labor code, they may not engage in commercial activities or concern themselves with matters unconnected with the defense of worker rights. The Government would ultimately decide what constitutes worker rights. As far as is known, it has not challenged any unions or would-be unions on these grounds. If it were to deny recognition to a union, the union would be denied access to labor courts.

It is estimated that there are fewer than 10,000 full-time employed members who belong to local unions. In practice, attempts to form trade unions are generally frustrated by employers who prefer the status quo.

There are four major labor federations in Haiti: the Autonomous Central of Haitian Workers (CATH), the Federation of Unionized Workers, the Confederation of Haitian Workers (CTH) (formerly CATH/CLAT), and the Independent General Organization of Haitian Workers. All have contact with international labor organizations. For example, FOS is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and its Latin American group, the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers; and CTH with the World Confederation of Labor.

Shortly after taking office, President Avril met with the leaders of three of the major labor federations to revive the tripartite (labor, management, and government) negotiations on an amended labor code. In mid-1989 provisional agreement was reached on the various issues which divided labor and management. Labor representatives have since proposed additional changes, however, and then boycotted subsequent commission meetings pending resolution of another issue not directly connected to the revised code negotiations. At year's end the new code had not been issued.

Chapter VI of the existing labor code recognizes the right to strike, although it restricts the duration of certain types of strikes. Strikes are not uncommon, but their legality is usually contested by the employer. Government employees in several cities staged protests, walkouts, and strikes, generally over arrears in pay. In almost all cases the workers eventually received their back pay, although some were subsequently dismissed because agencies' funds were not sufficient for their continued employment. The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations has alleged that workers fired in past years by their public and private sector employers for engaging in legitimate union activities still have not been accorded justice in the courts.

Haiti's compliance with International Labor Organization (ILO) standards has been reviewed by a number of ILO supervisory bodies in recent years. In February 1989 the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA), reviewing allegations of government and employer reprisals against the CATH after a 2-day strike in 1987, noted that despite revoking the dissolution of the CATH and releasing detained trade unionists the Namphy Government did not compensate mistreated workers for their medical expenses or make full restitution of assets seized. The CFA also called on the Government to be more vigorous in seeking reinstatement of dismissed workers for their involvement in legitimate trade union activities. In 1989 the ILO's Committee of Experts (COE) expressed hope that Haiti's new draft labor code would correct discrepancies between the present code and ILO Convention 87, which Haiti has ratified, regarding freedom of association.

HAITI

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Haitian labor unions remain weak; forbidden under the Duvaliers until 1981, they were then allowed to operate only within strictly circumscribed limits. It was not until after Jean-Claude Duvalier's departure in February 1986 that unions were allowed to organize freely.

Formal union contracts do not yet exist; rather, informal, unofficial, mostly unwritten agreements, and in some cases, tacit acceptance, allow the presence of unions in plants. Although unions have become relatively more active in grievance negotiations, formal management recognition of unions as bargaining agents is not yet the norm. Even with no government interference, the relatively new phenomenon of trade unionism has developed erratically in Haiti, where unemployment is estimated to affect 50 percent or more of the available work force, and where many employers still question the legitimacy of unions.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The labor code prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and there were no charges of such practices in 1989.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for factory employment is 12 years. Fierce adult competition for jobs ensures that child labor is not a factor in the industrial sector. In both rural and urban areas, children often work at odd jobs to help supplement the family income.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The labor code (last revised in 1984 and now in the process of being liberalized) governs individual employment contracts, protects apprentices and women, and establishes minimum health and safety standards, particularly for hazardous occupations. The code sets the normal workday at 8 hours, and the workweek at 48 hours, with 24 hours' rest on Sunday. The code provides for paid annual leave of at least 15 consecutive working days. Workers may take up to 15 days' annual sick leave. The current daily minimum wage prescribed by law is $3.00 in Port-au-Prince and $2.64 in the rest of the country. The majority of the Haitian population subsists on much less than the minimum wage. According to a number of labor representatives from Haiti as well as from the United States, the Government has not systematically enforced labor laws regarding wages and minimum safety regulations, but the industrial sector generally adheres to at least minimum standards. The latter sector tends to be concentrated more heavily in the Port-au-Prince area and is more accessible to outside scrutiny. Economic factors in this sector render adherence to minimum standards relatively affordable as well.

HONDURAS

Honduras is a constitutional democracy with a President and bicameral Congress elected every 4 years. Free and fair elections held on November 26 resulted in the election of National Party candidate Rafael Leonardo Callejas as President. His party won 71 seats in the 128-member legislature. The institutionalization of democratic reforms is still incomplete; in particular, the civilian government has yet to demonstrate that it can ensure the disciplining of those members of the military who commit human rights abuses.

Domestic security is the responsibility of the armed forces, including its police branch, the Public Security Force (FUSEP). The Armed Forces are constitutionally responsible to the President of the Republic but in practice operate with a great deal of institutional autonomy. In previous years both the police and members of the armed forces were involved in human rights abuses; there are allegations that this behavior continued to some extent in 1989. However, in 1989 FUSEP began to demonstrate a willingness to punish some abusers. Other branches of the armed forces appear to have tightened internal controls to reduce the possibility of abuse, although the military's resistance to making public what punitive actions, if any, are taken against human rights offenders makes it difficult to evaluate their efforts.

Honduras is one of the poorest countries in the Western Hemisphere. Per capita income was officially estimated at $917 in 1988, but a realistic valuation of the lempira would yield a per capita income of about $600. While its agricultural-based economy has registered modest increases during the last several years, the rapidly growing Honduran population has resulted in persistently high levels of unemployment and underemployment. The current high fiscal deficit, combined with an overvalued exchange rate, has inhibited private sector expansion, and the large trade deficit has frustrated attempts to service the rapidly growing external debt arrears and to attract net inflows of capital.

The high rates of criminal violence recorded over the past several years continued in 1989, due in part to the economic problems noted above. As in past years, there are credible reports of extrajudicial killings of suspected criminals by security forces. Leftwing violence included the probable assassinations of four persons, bank robberies, and several violent attacks on U.S. military personnel which injured several persons. The Anti-Communist Action Alliance (AAA) continued a sporadic graffiti campaign and telephone death threats directed against leftist leaders, but by year's end its activities had all but ceased.

Principal human rights concerns in 1989 included political and other extrajudicial killings by political extremists and members of the security forces. The most common human rights violations committed by FUSEP continued to be physical abuse of detainees and prisoners, and incommunicado detention. Individual members of the security forces also were involved in killings arising from use of excessive force, sometimes for personal motives. However, FUSEP in 1989 demonstrated a new sensitivity to public concerns, announcing a number of punitive actions taken against agents guilty of human rights abuses. Most of those involved in abuses were turned over for hearings before a military tribunal, while others were dishonorably discharged and sent for trial in nonmilitary courts.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were seven assassinations in 1989 that apparently had political motives. Four were likely committed by the armed left (three were publicly claimed by leftwing groups). Although there was some immediate public speculation that the military may have been involved in the remaining three cases, these remain unsolved. Conclusive evidence was lacking in all three cases.

On January 7, several unidentified assailants ambushed Adan Rugama, a military commander of the Nicaraguan Resistance Army (ERN) and aide-de-camp to Enrique Bermudez, ERN Commander-in-Chief. Speculation that the highly professional assassination was carried out by members of the Cinchonero guerrilla organization, in collaboration with the Nicaraguan Embassy, has never been confirmed.

The leftwing Popular Liberation Movement-Cinchoneros claimed responsibility for the ambush on January 25 in a residential neighborhood of Tegucigalpa in which former Commander-in-Chief of the Honduran Armed Forces General Gustavo Alvarez Martinez and his chauffeur were killed. Although it is assumed that the Cinchonero claim of responsibility is genuine, the identities of the individual assailants have never been established.

The fourth victim of an attack presumed to have been committed by leftists was Pablo Flores Garcia, a former member of the Cinchoneros. Flores Garcia deserted the guerrilla group in 1986 and provided information to the Armed Forces which reportedly led to the deaths of several high-ranking guerrilla commanders. Unknown assailants shot and killed Flores Garcia on July 22 near his home outside of La Lima, Cortes Department, and draped his body with the Cinchonero flag.

The fifth victim in 1989 of possible politically-motivated violence was Edgardo Herrera, an activist in the leftist Student Union University Revolutionary Front (FRU) and head of his San Pedro Sula Residential Community Organization, who was shot to death on July 4 by three unidentified men. There was an immediate public suspicion that he had been killed by the military in retaliation for his activities in the FRU, but there was no evidence to support this contention by year's end.

On July 6, Salomon Vallecillo, President of the Honduran Tobacco Workers Union, while waiting at a bus stop in San Pedro Sula was gunned down by two men dressed as private security guards. Again, some public speculation centered on the military as possibly involved in this assassination, but the identity of the assassins and the motive for the murder remained unknown at year's end.

Also on July 6, Jose Danilo Martinez, a union member, was shot and killed by a drunken police agent. The agent was given a dishonorable discharge and imprisoned pending trial in a nonmilitary court.

HONDURAS

With the left organizing demonstrations against the assassinations and the Armed Forces denying involvement, a third killing occurred on July 11. Roberto Ramon Garay, a conservative political activist, an attorney, and the head of the Northern Regional University's Extension Program, was shot to death by two men as he and his family arrived at their home in a San Pedro Sula neighborhood. With the exception of the case of Danilo Martinez, no identification was made by year's end of any of the people involved in the killings.

There was also no progress in identifying the perpetrators of the double assassination in January 1988 of Miguel Angel Pavon and Moises Landaverde. In late 1988 and again in early 1989, Fausto Reyes Caballero gave press interviews in the United States in which he claimed to have been a collaborator with Battalion 3-16 of the Armed Forces and stated that Battalion members carried out the killings. Reyes Caballero said his information on the Pavon-Landaverde and other unsolved human rights cases was obtained through his own alleged ties to Battalion 3-16 and his work as a Honduran transit policeman in San Pedro Sula until August 10, 1989. On that day, according to Reyes Caballero, he was forced suddenly to flee Honduras because of an assassination attempt against him by several of his Battalion 3-16 "colleagues."

An investigation by Honduran and U.S. authorities showed Reyes Caballero's testimony was fabricated. Documents indicate that he was dishonorably discharged from the Honduran police in March 1984 on charges of theft and corruption, that he had departed Honduras for the United States in June 1984, and that he had lived and worked illegally in Miami since that time, returning to Honduras only for two brief visits.

There was a definite increase in 1989 in the number of violent and unsolved deaths. As of December 17, 263 such cases had been reported in the press, compared to 185 for all of 1988. Of those cases reported through that date, the vast majority appear to have been cases of common crime. Fourteen deaths, however, were possible or probable cases of extrajudicial killings of criminals by the police. Three victims of almost certain extrajudicial killings were Pompilio Cruz Cuevas, Gloria Espinal Godoy, and Olga Marina Ventura Salgado. Cruz Cuevas was an oft-convicted criminal and the latter two were convicted prostitutes. All were reportedly detained by agents of the National Department of Investigation (DNI) on the night of June 20. The following day, their bodies were found on the outskirts of Tegucigalpa, each having been shot. In the remaining cases, the possibility of police involvement is far less substantial, most often resting only on the fact that the victim had or was believed to have had a criminal record.

The police publicly accepted responsibility for another five killings--one a case of mistaken identity. In four cases, the police attempted to justify the killings by asserting that the victims had attempted to escape from custody. The lack of credibility of those claims was best illustrated in the case of Luis Norberto Flores, accused of heading a gang of thieves. Flores was arrested by the DNI on March 31. For several days, his wife brought him food, although she apparently did not see him personally. On April 3, she was told that Flores was not and never had been held at the jail. Earlier that day, Flores had been taken from his cell and into the city, shot four times, and left for dead. Flores managed to get to a hospital, but the following day two DNI lieutenants arrived and removed him by force. Flores' body was later found, now with twelve bullet wounds, on a city street. In response to public pressure, the police finally admitted having killed Flores, but offered the improbable story that on both occasions he was leading police to his colleagues in crime when he tried to escape. In this, as in other cases involving the killings of criminals, no known action was taken against the police agents involved. In a case in which the police accepted responsibility for the killing of the "wrong" suspected subversive, the five agents involved were imprisoned pending trial before a military tribunal. At year's end they were still awaiting trial.

In contrast to the apparently tacit official approval of the killing of repeat offenders, other agents involved in wrongful deaths or deaths under questionable circumstances were dealt with more severely. The majority of such cases related to deliberate and unjustified use of lethal force, negligent homicide, or killing for personal motives by individual members of the police. In many instances of such killings, perpetrators could not be identified by witnesses or the suspected assailants had fled to avoid arrest. Police agents identified as having been involved in 15 of approximately 22 cases in which killings were personally motivated, unjustified, or due to negligence were either arrested and bound over for trials or hearings, or were the subjects of arrest warrants. In one case a FUSEP soldier was surreptitiously photographed when he shot and killed an unarmed suspect. He was dishonorably discharged and was awaiting trial at year's end. In the remaining seven cases, it is unknown what, if any, action was taken against those responsible.

The willingness of FUSEP to punish abusers and to publicize such punishment first became apparent in April, after which the agents involved in controversial cases were almost without exception bound over for trial or hearings. While the majority of such officials continue to be held under military jurisdiction, those responsible in a number of the more egregious cases were dishonorably discharged and imprisoned pending trials in ordinary criminal courts.

In July FUSEP announced that 16 agents, 3 sergeants, and a corporal had been turned over to the courts charged with abuses, and that 43 soldiers and 3 officers had been dealt with similarly. Unlike FUSEP, the other military branches continue to resist making public what punitive actions, if any, are taken against human rights offenders. One of the few exceptions during the year was a highly controversial case in which two youths were shot and killed near a military base. Following a public outcry against the killings, the Armed Forces announced the names of the three soldiers involved and said that all had been charged with murder and were being held for trial before a military tribunal. Altogether, proceedings were begun between January 1 and October 11 against 28 members of the military charged with murder, with another 9 members awaiting trial for other abuses leading to injury.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances in 1989. The disappearance of Jose Leonel Suazo Castillo, while not politically motivated, appears to have been a deliberate criminal act of vengeance by a member of the military with the concurrence of his superiors. Suazo was a member of the Conservative National Party, although not politically active. According to his mother, Suazo had gotten into a fistfight with a police official at a bar in the early morning hours of January 29 and the official had threatened him. Men identifying themselves as agents of "military intelligence" began an active search for Suazo. On the night of February 2, Suazo told a friend that a car appeared to be following them. Initial press reports were that Suazo "disappeared" after leaving his companion. However, the victim's mother subsequently received information that her son was actually detained and handcuffed in view of eyewitnesses and taken away in the car that had been following him. On May 2, during her second visit to query authorities at the seventh region FUSEP headquarters, Suazo's mother claims to have glimpsed her son in the courtyard of what she later learned was a FUSEP intelligence detention facility. It appeared he was being taken under escort from the building housing the cells to a vehicle. Since that time, Mrs. Suazo alleges, she has received detailed information from highly credible sources confirming her son's detention. Nevertheless, police authorities continue to deny any knowledge of Suazo's whereabouts.

The Honduran commission responsible for oversight of the demarcation of the Honduran-Salvadoran border reported in 1989 that three Honduran farmers were kidnaped by Salvadoran guerrillas and never seen again.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The use of torture is prohibited under the Constitution, and FUSEP has officially adopted a United Nations-approved code of conduct for law enforcement agencies which reiterates that prohibition and commits the police force actively to oppose violations. Nonetheless, the physical abuse of detainees and prisoners continues to be common. The most routine form of abuse is beating, sometimes severe, although accusations of more sophisticated forms of torture occasionally arise. Several persons in prison for arms trafficking to the Salvadoran guerrillas, for example, claim to have been subjected to electric shocks and to have been beaten on the soles of the feet during incommunicado detention, prior to being turned over to the courts.

Abuse of prisoners appears to be fairly routine, but it is difficult to assess the extent to which torture occurs. Under the law, a confession obtained under torture is null and void; as a result, most prisoners brought before the courts automatically claim such torture and their own innocence. However, the Supreme Court's Department of Forensic Medicine is required to provide physical examinations of persons claiming to have been tortured in order to determine the validity of the charge. The Department's detailed documentation indicates that, of the 142 persons examined between January and mid-September, 39 showed evidence of abuse other than bruising from handcuffs or that sustained on the arms at the time of arrest. The most common abuse claimed by the prisoners was kicking and blows from various blunt instruments such as billy clubs, rifle butts, and sticks.

There were three claims (one confirmed) of electric shock and one unconfirmed claim of burning by cigarettes. Six confirmed cases involved gunshot wounds and one involved sodomy. The Department's statistics hold DNI agents responsible in 30 of the 39 confirmed cases of abuse. FUSEP agents, other members of the military, penitentiary guards, and private security guards were involved in the remaining confirmed cases. It is not known what, if any, punishment was given to those responsible.

Beatings of detainees or prisoners resulted in two deaths in 1989. Jose Martinez Mendez, a prisoner at the La Ceiba Penal Farm, died August 31 of injuries sustained in a beating administered after a failed escape attempt several days earlier. There has been no information released concerning action taken against the responsible prison guards. Melvin Efren Mata Garcia died the day after DNI agents, on September 29, detained him on suspicion of selling fraudulent passports and beat him severely. On October 4, FUSEP announced that the two responsible agents had been dishonorably discharged and were being held in the Central Penitentiary pending trial in a nonmilitary court.

The total number of security agents held for trial on charges of physical abuse of detainees or prisoners is unavailable. Press reports, however, reveal that at least some offenders are being held. Two FUSEP sergeants accused of torture of civilian detainees in Olancho Department were both turned over for hearings before the Military Tribunal, and the superior officer of one of the offenders was also disciplined for failure to supervise the actions of his subordinates. In another case, a special forces officer, who shot and injured a civilian for refusing to take off military trousers he was wearing, was given a dishonorable discharge and turned over for trial in a nonmilitary court. There were other similar cases reported throughout the year. Approximately 20 police agents are currently serving sentences in the Central Penitentiary for human rights abuses.

After the military took over administration of the Central Penitentiary in February, a move prompted by charges of massive corruption and organized criminal activity involving both prison officials and inmates, there were many charges of torture. Many believe that the complaints of torture came essentially from those whose interests were compromised by the change in the prison's management. In May, in response to continuing controversy, the Government turned the penitentiary back to civilian control, leading to an immediate cessation in accusations of torture.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the law, a person may be arrested only with specific court authorization in the form of an Order of Arrest and must be informed clearly of the grounds of arrest. The suspect may be held no longer than 24 hours by security forces before being turned over to the court, where evidence supporting legal processing is reviewed. Within 6 days, the court is obligated to order either the release of the detainee or his remission to a penal center pending trial. Bail is both available and widely used.

Despite these legal provisions, the police and other elements of the security forces carried out an undetermined number of detentions without judicial order in 1989. In addition, the police appear frequently to violate the 24-hour rule, often holding detainees for questioning well beyond the legal period. Other than cases involving terrorism and/or subversion, generally handled by the military, most of the violations of the laws and regulations governing arrest and detention are committed by agents of FUSEP and, most particularly, of the DNI. The length of incommunicado detention varied from several hours to several weeks. Detainees, in many instances, are simply released at the end of their illegal detention, rather than turned over to the courts.

Continuing violations of the laws of detention and arrest have raised understandable concerns about other related abuses, including possible extrajudicial killing of suspected criminals. According to press reports, the DNI arrested Miguel Antonio Ramos on May 25 and his two colleagues, Felipe Amador and Juan Ramon Avila, on June 5, on suspicion of murder. The families have reportedly been unable to determine their whereabouts.

Although incommunicado detention and failure to comply with writs of habeas corpus do not seem to be widespread, there continue to be credible reports of such violations. Compliance with writs of habeas corpus is occasionally evaded by the transfer of detainees from one detention facility to another.

There have been no cases of forced exile. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

All nonmilitary trials in Honduras are public; there are neither secret tribunals nor political prisoners. The law provides for a fair trial of accused persons. Persons accused of a crime have the right to an initial hearing by a judge to assess the merits of the charges, to bail, and to an attorney, provided by the State if necessary. The defendant also has the right to an appeal and is considered innocent until proven guilty. The Armed Forces maintains a separate judicial system of military tribunals for cases involving military personnel. Proceedings in these forums are not open to the public.

Despite legal guarantees of fair trial, in practice this right is often abridged. Acute shortages of both human and material resources has impeded improvements, and the judiciary remains the least effective branch of government in Honduras.

The most serious inequity of the judiciary has been the absence of a public defender system to handle cases of indigent persons, most of whom consequently have failed to receive a timely adjudication of their cases. A 1987 government order for the courts to provide state-hired attorneys for the poor was not implemented in 1988 for lack of funding, although private organizations volunteered some legal services for the indigent. In May, with assistance from the U.S. Agency for International Development (A.I.D.), the Government established a Public Defendants Office (PDO). As of September 30, the PDO had 240 cases in its dockets, in which 58 defendants were at the plenary stage and 30 had been sentenced or set free.

In January 1989, the Government announced that 84 percent of the country's prisoners had not been sentenced. That figure represented only a slight improvement over the 85 percent figure given in mid-1988 and the 88 percent cited in mid-1987. Records indicated that, regardless of the court, a prison stay of 2 or 3 years pending sentencing is by no means uncommon. Much of the delay in sentencing was attributable to backlogs in judicial processing, understaffing in the courts, or the poor quality of judges in the lower courts. For example, a judge in El Progreso, Yoro, issued only two decisions in the 126 cases pending at the start of the year. Another factor that has contributed to the backlog, according to many judges, is the lack of a judicial investigative system that would assist in and expedite decisions. The judicial branch has yet to receive resources equal to the constitutionally mandated 3 percent of the total annual budget of the Honduran Government. Under an A.I.D.-funded program, justices of the peace are gradually being replaced with legally qualified personnel chosen on the basis of merit. Twenty-seven law school graduates were chosen in 1988 and 27 more in 1989 through a competitive examination to fill vacancies in the same number of courts. This merit system will continue until all justices of the peace are both educationally qualified and proven competent in practice. In addition to upgrading the quality of judicial services, the new system offers the nominees unlimited tenure, with removal permitted only for due cause, a major step toward curtailing political influence in judicial decisions.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government respects the constitutionally protected rights to personal and family privacy and the inviolability of the home and private communications. Telephonic and written correspondence is generally free from monitoring, although, as provided by law, official review of such communications may be authorized by judicial order for specific purposes, such as criminal investigations or national security. Similarly, private homes may be searched only on the basis of a judicial order, with the exception of "urgent cases" in order to "impede the commission of crimes or avoid grave harm to persons or property." There were no known violations of these rights during 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, and those rights are normally respected in practice. A wide range of political opinions are carried in the print media as well as in television and radio broadcasting. With the exception of one government-owned radio station, all of the communications media--newspapers, over 100 radio, and 4 television stations--are privately owned. Criticism of the Government and the Armed Forces is routine. Despite occasional sharp exchanges between the media and government authorities, there are normally no efforts by the authorities to suppress expression of opinion. However, the Armed Forces did begin legal proceedings in January against the editor of a major daily newspaper for two editorials considered defamatory to the military. The suit was subsequently allowed to lapse in the courts.

Academic freedom is respected in Honduras. Academic and political organizations abound in the university and secondary schools, and many are well to the left-of-center or affiliated with radical left groups. On-campus discipline of these sometimes violent groups was left to academic administrators in 1989.

HONDURAS

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to peaceful assembly for political, religious, or other purposes is clearly provided for by the Constitution. No prior authorization or permit is necessary, although open-air assemblies may require a permit for "the sole purpose of guaranteeing public order." Antigovernment and other demonstrations were carried out on a routine basis without impediment throughout the year.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although predominantly Roman Catholic, Honduras has no state religion. All forms of religious expression are constitutionally protected, and foreign missionaries operate in many parts of the country. The Constitution contains an express provision that no clergyman of any religion may hold public office or engage in political propaganda based on religious motives or beliefs. There is no attempt to control or impede the free expression of religious beliefs or proselytization in Honduras.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens are normally unimpeded in entry into or exit from Honduras, and travel freely within the country's national borders. In locations near the border with El Salvador, security concerns related to the movement of Salvadoran guerrillas have led to the imposition of a 9:00 p.m. curfew. There are also limited security-related travel restrictions along the Nicaraguan border. There are no permanent travel restrictions for Hondurans or resident foreigners, although national security concerns have led to increased police checks for personal identification. Exit visas are required to leave Honduras but are not denied on political grounds.

Hondurans returning from Communist or Arab nations have been questioned at length about their travels, and citizens of all Communist and most Arab nations need special permission to enter Honduras.

Although not a party to the U.N. Convention on Refugees, Honduras has maintained a generous policy with regard to refugees from neighboring countries. Despite increased popular resentment of the refugees and the perceived costs for Honduran citizens, the policy has remained unchanged to date.

There were few new additions to the officially documented refugee population during 1989, with the exception of the Nicaraguan camps, which added between 100 and 150 new entries per month. Most of the new entrants arrived directly from Nicaragua, a change from 1988 when the new arrivals came largely from unofficial refugee settlements within the country. At the end of October, the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) was caring for 12,137 Salvadorans, 23,636 Nicaraguans (9,000 of those Miskito and Sumo Indians), and 441 Guatemalans.

Refugee repatriations began in earnest in 1988 and continued in 1989. Through the end of October 1,441 Salvadorans, 5 Guatemalans, 480 Nicaraguan Ladinos, and 1,479 Nicaraguan Indians had taken advantage of voluntary repatriation. Repatriations from the Salvadoran camps were suspended by the Government of El Salvador for a short time in September to allow the newly installed Government to review repatriation procedures. By the end of the year, however, several large-scale repatriations had taken place, including the orderly departure of 1,180 refugees from the Mesa Grande camp. Scheduled repatriations from Colomonagua and San Antonio camps in November and December, however, were called off when approximately 1,200 refugees from Colomonagua staged an unauthorized walkout of the camp on November 18. The "spontaneous" repatriation (apparently pre-arranged to coincide with the FMLN offensive in El Salvador) violated an agreement between the refugees and the Government of El Salvador that all those returning would cooperate with documentation prior to departure from the camps. The returnees entered El Salvador at the Las Flores border post, in territory that is under control of the Salvadoran guerrillas. On December 9, the Colomonagua refugees staged a second, similar repatriation in which approximately 500 persons participated. Those repatriations brought the officially documented Salvadoran refugee population in Honduras down to 10,437 by mid-December. However, the refusal to cooperate with the Salvadoran authorities in documentation prevented the expected and much larger repatriation of some 10,000 Salvadoran refugees by early 1990. The UNHCR provided no assistance in these unilateral repatriations undertaken without the consent of the country-of-origin Government.

HONDURAS

Fewer problems of refugee abuse were reported than in 1988. The repressive control exercised by guerrilla-affiliated camp coordinators in the Salvadoran settlements was responsible for much of the outflow of refugees from Colomonagua and Mesa Grande camps in the first half of 1989. Refugees took advantage of UNHCR offers of third-country resettlement to leave the camps, despite the objections of coordinating committees. Once outside of the camps, these refugees offered first-hand details of serious abuses committed against "dissidents" by the coordinating committees. In addition, the female official of an international organization was forcibly stripped at the orders of camp coordinators at San Antonio in retaliation for having delivered mail to refugees against the wishes of the coordinators.

Honduran handling of Nicaraguan refugees was less positive than in the past. There were credible reports of cases of forced repatriation as well as incidents of arbitrary detention of officially documented refugees, who were removed from the camps and held for sometimes lengthy periods.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Hondurans have and exercise the right to change their government through democratic means. National and municipal governments are chosen by free, secret, direct, and obligatory balloting every 4 years. A president may serve only one term; any vice president (there are three) who serves, even on an interim basis, as acting president is prohibited from running for the office of president. All Honduran-born citizens have the right to hold office, except for members of the clergy and the Armed Forces.

All four legal political parties participated in the third consecutive national election that took place on November 26,

HONDURAS

1989 in which the President, all members of the National Congress, and all elected officials at the municipal level were selected. The two major parties, the National and the Liberal, received 94 percent of the votes cast. Rafael Leonardo Callejas of the opposition National Party won the presidential election with 51 percent of the vote to 43 percent for Carlos Flores Facusse of the ruling Liberal Party. The National Party also won a majority of the seats in the unicameral legislature (71 seats to 55 seats for the Liberals and 2 seats for the PINU-Social Democrats). Complaints from the then-ruling party that the National Elections Tribunal and the National Registry of Persons were manipulated to its detriment led to calls for major reforms of both those bodies.

Organizers of a new party must present a petition of 10,000 signatures of members to obtain legal status. If a party fails to gain that same minimum number of votes in any election in which it participates, it loses legal status. Given the deep historical affiliations with the two major parties, it has proven very difficult for new parties to gain sufficient popular support to qualify for legal status.

There were complaints during the pre-election period that the major parties had manipulated electoral laws and mechanics to block the inscription of an independent candidate. The leaders of the two smaller parties complained that such action has denied them equal advantage under the electoral system. Each of the small parties received less than 2 percent of the total national vote in the election.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government cooperates with local and international human rights organizations, and the President frequently met with visiting delegations of human rights monitors and activists from abroad. The governmental Inter-Institutional Commission on Human Rights handles both domestic and international inquiries concerning human rights and has been responsive to inquiries.

Honduras was condemned in 1988 in the first two cases of disappearance ever tried in the Inter-American Human Rights Court (IAHRC) in San Jose, Costa Rica. The Court ordered Honduras to pay an undetermined indemnity to the families involved, the sums of which were to be negotiated between the relatives of the victims and the Government. When the negotiations reached an impasse in 1989 the Court itself established a sum per family equivalent to approximately $200,000 at the actual, as opposed to the official, rate of exchange. The Government of Honduras took strong exception to the court ruling, arguing that it violated an agreement reached previously with court representatives concerning the factors to be used in arriving at a fair settlement. In late 1989 the President sent to the Congress draft legislation authorizing payment, but the Congress failed to approve the legislation before recessing in December.

In the final case before the IAHRC, the Court found insufficient evidence to find Honduras responsible for the disappearances of two Costa Ricans in 1981.

HONDURAS

In September 1989, a representative of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights visited Honduras at the invitation of the Government. The main purpose of the visit was to investigate the use of torture. To that end, the U.N. representative was given full liberty to inspect courts and prisons, speak with inmates, and meet with any groups and persons of interest. He issued no findings prior to his departure, but indicated a full report would be issued following his return to Geneva.

The best-known of the nongovernmental human rights organizations is the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights in Honduras (CODEH) and its Central American-wide affiliate, CODEHUCA. Despite a number of genuine efforts on behalf of human rights, CODEH's charges frequently have been exaggerated and ill-documented, and in some cases false. Many observers in Honduras consider the group to be highly politicized and partisan. Although CODEH in the past routinely published its findings in the Honduran press, allowing a detailed study of its claims, no CODEH reports were so issued in 1989. Nevertheless, CODEH presented various statistics during the year, and a comparison of those documents revealed serious discrepancies.

A new human rights organization, the Authentic Committee for the Defense of Human Rights in Honduras (CODEH-A), was established in 1989. The group was founded by Hector Orlando Vasquez, whose public dispute with CODEH President Ramon Custodio allegedly led to threats against Vasquez' life.

The Constitution expressly prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex, race, class, or any other basis. Education is equally available to both males and females, but in practice women are limited in some careers because of strongly held cultural values and attitudes, despite the absence of any overt impediment. Ethnic minorities, while enjoying full equality under the law, continue to be the object of some social discrimination.

Physical abuse of women, particularly in the home, is a common feature of life in Honduras, and reflects the country's male-dominant culture. Although Honduran law offers remedy to the victims, few women avail themselves of the legal process. There are credible reports that women held in the country's jails are sometimes raped or pressured into providing sexual favors in return for their release, but charges of such abuse have been brought to court in only a few instances.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers are free to organize themselves into labor unions. Labor unions have been active in Honduras over the past 36 years and continue to exert considerable influence, both economically and politically.

The right to strike, along with a wide range of other basic labor rights, is provided for by the Constitution and honored in practice. Even though the civil service code stipulates that public workers do not have the right to strike, neither public nor private sector strikes were not declared illegal in 1989. There were several major strikes, including a 9-day walkout by health workers. The longest strike in Honduran history, the 81-day walkout of the Teachers' Pension Fund, ended when the President agreed that workers' wages lost during the strike would be paid.

Honduras' trade union movement maintains close ties with international trade union organizations. The largest union group, the Confederation of Honduran Workers, is an affiliate of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). The second largest, the General Workers Central, is affiliated with the World Confederation of Labor. The third major organization, the Unitary Federation of Honduran Workers, is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. The three labor organizations claim to represent about 20 percent of all Honduran workers, including a substantial number of peasants and rural laborers.

A number of private firms have instituted labor/management "solidarity" associations. Organized labor, including the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) and the ICFTU, expressed strong opposition to these associations on the grounds that they do not permit strikes and have inadequate grievance procedures. Nevertheless, the membership of such associations has increased in the last few years from 2,000 to approximately 10,000. Solidarity organizations are not formally recognized by the Ministry of Labor.

In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) renewed its request to the Government to bring certain provisions of its legislation into conformance with Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, including provisions which: place a numerical restriction on the right to organize; limit to one the number of unions per enterprise; require that union officers must be engaged in the work of the workers they represent; require that two-thirds of the membership present must approve a strike action; grant the Government broad powers to prohibit, or require lengthy procedures for, strikes in certain industries. Also in 1989, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) expressed satisfaction with the Government's action granting legal recognition to union federation.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and to bargain collectively are protected by law and observed in practice. Retribution by employers for trade union activity is not uncommon, in spite of a specific provision in the labor code against such activity. There were two killings of trade unionists, one of which may have been politically motivated (see Section 1.a.). On November 15 unidentified persons exploded a bomb at a residence occupied by the leader of the electrical workers' union. There were no personal injuries and no group has claimed responsibility for the incident. However, these rights and guarantees are jealously guarded by the powerful union movement which does not hesitate to make use of the legal system to enforce their observance. The prevalence of unionized labor in the workplace and its political influence act as a further defense against antiunion discrimination or pressures. The free trade zones are governed by the same labor regulations as the rest of private industry, and conditions in these export processing plants is generally considered to be superior to the national average.

HONDURAS

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor in Honduras; such practices are prohibited by law and by the Constitution.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Constitution and the Labor Code prohibit the employment of children under the age of 16 years. Violations of the labor code frequently occur in rural areas or in small companies. High unemployment and underemployment have resulted in many children supplementing the family income by working in small family farms or as street vendors. The Government does not have the capability to enforce child labor laws in these situations.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Constitution and the labor code require that all labor be fairly paid; minimum wages, working hours, vacations, and occupational safety are all regulated by law. The minimum wage, revised as of January 1, 1990, varies by occupation and ranges from $3 to $5 dollars per day. It is doubtful that the new minimum wage is sufficient to provide a decent standard of living. Many households will need to pool family members' salaries to survive. The minimum wage is expected to be raised again in the near future.

The standard workday is 8 hours; a standard workweek is 44 hours. The Labor Code provides for a paid vacation of 10 workdays after 1 year, and 20 workdays after 4 years. The regulations are frequently ignored in practice as a result of the high level of unemployment and underemployment.

An ILO technical expert investigated allegations by labor of improper use of pesticides in the banana industry. A U.S.-owned company agreed to make the recommended changes in production, but small independent banana producers reportedly disregard safety in the use of pesticide. There have also been verified instances where Miskito scuba divers have died or suffered injuries by improper diving procedures in the unregulated lobster fishing industry. In December the Government prohibited the use of scuba divers in the lobster-fishing industry. Boat owners and Miskito Indians protested the prohibition because of lost income to the large number of divers and the lobster fishing industry. A motion to cancel the prohibition was pending before the courts at year's end.

JAMAICA

Jamaica, a member of the Commonwealth of Nations, is a constitutional parliamentary democracy. A Governor General, appointed by the Crown on the advice of the Prime Minister, represents the Queen as Head of State, while the elected Prime Minister, the leader of the majority party in Parliament, is the country's chief executive. The Parliament is comprised of an elected House of Representatives and a Senate appointed by the Governor General.

Two major political parties have alternated in power since the first elections under universal suffrage in 1944. The maximum length of a parliament is 5 years, and the Constitution requires that a general election be held no more than 3 months after the dissolution of Parliament. The last election, held in February 1989, resulted in Michael Manley's People's National Party (PNP) winning 45 of the 60 seats in the House of Representatives. The opposition Jamaica Labor Party (JLP), which formed the government from 1980 to 1989, holds the remaining 15 seats.

The security forces are directed by the Ministry of National Security and consist of the Jamaica Constabulary Force (JCF-police), the Jamaica Special Constabulary Force (JSCF-an auxiliary police force), and the Jamaica Defense Force (JDF). Since 1974 the JDF has been authorized to conduct joint operations with the JCF to maintain peace and order under the Suppression of Crime Act.

Jamaica has a mixed economy emphasizing the private sector and based on tourism, bauxite and alumina production, light manufacturing, and agriculture. The Manley Government is pursuing policies which promote private investment, both domestic and foreign, in order to stimulate economic growth and modernization.

In 1989 human rights were generally respected in Jamaica, but there continued to be credible reports that the police rely excessively on the use of lethal force, particularly in dealing with criminal suspects. This continues to be the country's most persistent human rights problem.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Officially sanctioned murder of political opponents does not occur in Jamaica. However, some violent crime has political overtones. Both major parties, as well as the Communist Workers Party of Jamaica, have some supporters who occasionally resort to violence to prevent supporters of rival parties from engaging in legitimate political activities, such as holding rallies or voting, and to punish those believed to have harmed their party's interests. The legal system has often been ineffective in dealing with cases of presumed politically motivated killing because of a code of silence adhered to by suspects, victims, and witnesses alike. Intimidation of witnesses and jurors also complicates efforts to prosecute offenders.

Violence aimed at disrupting the political process is heightened during elections. As a step toward reducing election-related violence, the two major political parties in 1988 engaged in talks aimed at defusing tensions between the parties and between JLP and PNP partisans. On August 26, 1988, the two party leaders signed a "political code of conduct" intended to reduce election-related violence. An Ombudsman was appointed to monitor compliance with the agreement and to report violations. As a result of these efforts, the electoral campaign of 1988-89 was relatively peaceful, and the number of persons killed decreased from several hundred in the previous contested national election to 12 in the most recent one.

The incidence of violent crime remains high in Jamaica. There continue to be credible reports of excessive use of lethal force by the police in dealing with suspected criminals. According to police statistics, officers killed 91 persons and wounded 63 in shooting incidents through the end of August 1989. Eight police officers were killed and 22 wounded in the line of duty during the same period. The disparity between the ratio of persons killed by police to those wounded has led several human rights groups to charge that some officers are engaging in summary executions of suspects.

Both local and international human rights groups have criticized the fact that the JCF itself is responsible for investigating police abuses. In July, National Security Minister K.D. Knight announced plans to establish an independent body to review complaints against members of the force, but as of the end of the year no action had yet been taken.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence of abduction, hostage-taking, or disappearances perpetrated by the security forces. Using the power granted under the Suppression of Crime Act to take persons into custody without an arrest warrant, however, the JCF has on occasion held incommunicado for varying periods persons suspected of criminal activities. In nearly all these cases, the detainee was released once relatives or associates protested.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and other abuse of prisoners and detainees is prohibited by law. Nonetheless, suspected criminals are often beaten or mistreated by police while being held in local stations. In 1989 there were numerous complaints of police brutality, including reports of beatings by guards and security personnel of inmates held in prisons. Figures on human rights abuses by police are unavailable. As of October, 92 police officers had been placed on administrative leave pending resolution of criminal conduct cases, many of which involved minor offenses. A number of policemen were convicted and punished. To address identified shortcomings in police performance, the JCF is receiving training in police investigative techniques from the U.S. Justice Department's International Criminal Investigative Training Program, and is engaged in a law enforcement accreditation program.

In past years, some persons have brought suit successfully against the police for unlawful actions, and the Government has been required to pay damages. According to police statistics, 200 complaints were filed against police between January and August of 1989, of which more than half alleged assault by JCF officers. Almost $200,000 was paid out in damages following successful lawsuits against police during that period.

Violence in the prisons is commonplace, with both prisoners and guards subject to assault. Prison guards allegedly beat to death two inmates during disturbances following a July hunger strike at the Kingston General Penitentiary. Government investigations into the incident had not been completed by year's end. At the St. Catherine District Prison, where 200 death row inmates are housed in cells built for 60, guards temporarily stopped feeding inmates in August, following a series of attacks by heavily armed prisoners.

Commercial guard forces, which have proliferated in recent years due to the high crime rate, continue to be the subject of complaints, especially concerning the use of excessive force. According to the Jamaica Council for Human Rights (JCHR), private security guards killed 40 persons in 1988; figures were not available for 1989 at year's end. There are currently more than 200 private security firms in Jamaica, and many often hire less qualified applicants than the police and provide less training. Some guard company recruits have been found to have criminal records. Licensing for commercial guard forces is the subject of draft legislation being considered by the Government.

Lynching of individuals accused of theft of goods, livestock or crops, housebreaking, or rape occurs with some frequency in Jamaica. Such incidents are reported in the media, but prosecutions of vigilantes remains rare.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Suppression of Crime Act, which has been regularly extended at 6-month intervals since its adoption in 1974, security forces do not need a warrant to detain persons "reasonably" suspected of having committed a crime. Although the Act was conceived as an extraordinary measure, security forces have come to rely on it extensively. Detention of suspects without a warrant occurs regularly, particularly in poor neighborhoods.

In July the Government lifted the Act in 7 of Jamaica's 14 parishes. However, government officials warned that it could be reintroduced in those areas if there is a significant increase in crime. In areas where the Act has been lifted, reports indicate that police are relying on blank, presigned warrants to meet the new legal requirements.

Police must record detentions and are responsible for ensuring that detainees appear before a member of the judiciary within 24 hours of detention. Most detainees are held for 3 to 5 days. However, there have been instances of detainees being held for several weeks without being brought before a judicial officer. Many detainees are unaware of their right to timely judicial review of the grounds for their detention. The JCHR indicates that 90 percent of its caseload involves assisting people attempting to locate and gain the release of detained family members. The JCHR reports that supervisory police officers have been more cooperative in recent years in providing information about detained persons.

For suspects charged with a crime, there is a functioning bail system. Bail is set by the local police supervisor in minor cases. A judicial officer sets bail for those charged with more serious crimes. Persons unable to make bail while waiting for a judicial hearing are often detained for long periods. Outsiders are permitted access to the accused. There are no political prisoners.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Persons who have been charged with criminal offenses have access to legal representation, and legal counsel is provided to indigents in criminal cases. The Court of Appeal and the Parliament may refer cases to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the United Kingdom. The judicial system, though independent, is overburdened and operates with inadequate resources. Budgetary shortfalls have resulted in a steady attrition of trained personnel, causing further delays. Some cases take years to come to trial, and others have had to be dismissed because case files could not be located. In August 120 prisoners at the Kingston General Penitentiary went on a short hunger strike to protest long delays in processing their cases. Some of these prisoners had been held for more than 4 years awaiting trial or decisions on their appeals. The Chief Justice in an October speech called attention to the shortage of court reporters, clerks of the court, and lawyers prepared to work for the Government. A labor action by court employees in late 1989 further exacerbated difficulties in processing cases rapidly.

A special Gun Court, established in 1974, considers all cases involving the illegal use or possession of firearms and ammunition. Public attendance is restricted, and less stringent rules of evidence are used. In capital cases, hearings before the Gun Court serve as preliminaries to jury trials under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

According to the JCHR, one of the weakest areas of Jamaican justice is the inability of the police to provide witnesses with proper protection. Intimidation, even murder, of witnesses is a chronic problem hampering criminal prosecutions, and jurors are sometimes threatened by associates of criminal defendants. The parliamentary Ombudsman has reported instances in which similar threats and intimidation are directed against witnesses and jurors in criminal cases where the accused is a policeman. Some convictions have been obtained for such attempts to subvert the judicial system. In August the Government announced plans to implement a protective custody program for threatened witnesses. By year's end the program had not yet been implemented.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary intrusion by the State into the private life of the individual. Under the Suppression of Crime Act, however, search warrants are not required to enter homes or businesses believed to be occupied by persons "reasonably" suspected of having committed a crime, and this authority is sometimes abused by the police. In July the Act was declared no longer applicable in 7 of Jamaica's 14 parishes (see Section 1.d.). Regulations approved by Parliament in 1980 require that every effort be made by security forces to have the owner or occupant of the premises present during any search.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are provided for in the Constitution and are observed in practice within the broad limits of libel laws and the State Secrets Act. Jamaica's largest privately owned newspaper, The Daily Gleaner, has been critical of Jamaican governments through the years. A new national daily, The Record, appeared in 1988 and has followed this tradition. Several smaller newspapers and magazines are also published, and foreign publications are widely available. The government-owned Jamaica Broadcasting Company (JBC) operates two radio stations and the island's only television channel. JBC typically has been accused of bias in favor of the Government, by whichever party is in opposition. Radio Jamaica (RJR) is a privately owned broadcasting company. Although the Government has a 25-percent equity holding in RJR, the company is independent, and its broadcasts are often critical of government policies. A new privately owned FM radio station began broadcasting in 1989.

The previous JLP Government granted three licenses to new regional radio stations in 1988, as part of a long-planned divestiture program. Two of the three regional stations were on the air at year's end; the third was expected to begin broadcasting in early 1990. The Government's Broadcast Commission retains the right to regulate programming during emergencies. In July Prime Minister Manley announced that the Government would retain JBC, while allowing private concerns to operate a new television channel and an island-wide radio station, but these plans have not yet been implemented. There are now more than 13,000 satellite antennas on the island, and many Jamaicans watch foreign television broadcasts without any government restriction.

There is no censorship or interference in academic institutions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association. Large numbers and varieties of professional, business, service, social, and cultural associations function freely. Public rallies are staged by all political parties. Such events require a police permit, which is normally granted. The PNP and JLP held rallies and meetings throughout the island during the last election campaign.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for by the Constitution and is well established in Jamaica. More than 80 percent of the population belongs to various Christian denominations, and religious groups of all kinds operate freely. Evangelical Christian movements have gained a significant following, and foreign evangelists regularly visit.

JAMAICA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides Jamaican citizens freedom of movement and immunity from expulsion from the country. There are no restrictions on foreign travel or emigration. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

Those who apply for refugee status are handled on a case-by-case basis. The country does not often accept asylum seekers, primarily for domestic economic reasons. Jamaica is a party to the 1951 U.N. Convention and the 1967 Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens have, and freely exercise, the right to change their government. The Constitution requires that, except under defined emergency circumstances, an election be held not later than 5 years after the first sitting of the preceding Parliament, but the Prime Minister may call national elections any time within that period.

The 1989 general election, in which the PNP replaced the JLP, was relatively peaceful by the standard of previous Jamaican elections. Twelve persons were killed in election-related violence. Both parties worked during the electoral campaign to keep violence under control.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no restrictions on human rights organizations in Jamaica. The Jamaica Council for Human Rights, the country's only human rights organization, has vigorously protested abuses by the police and has called for corrective reforms. The Council's work continues to be hampered by a lack of adequate resources. An Americas Watch representative visited Jamaica in 1989 and met with government officials and human rights activists.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Jamaican women are accorded full equality under the Constitution, and the 1975 Employment Act requires equal pay for equal work. In practice, because of cultural and social traditions, women often still suffer economic discrimination, which is frequently evidenced in hiring practices.

Violence against women occurs with some frequency in Jamaica. The new Government has established a Bureau of Women's Affairs within the Ministry of Labor, Welfare and Sports. Several nongovernmental organizations exist to help victims cope with the effects of domestic violence, such as wife beating. According to officials at a crisis center, police are frequently unwilling to assist battered women in taking legal steps against their assailants. Furthermore, Jamaican law does not differentiate between domestic violence and general assault cases. Women are, therefore, often reluctant to bring charges under the General Offenses Against the Person Act, under which the only sanction available is the incarceration of the offender.

JAMAICA

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Article 23 of the Constitution specifically provides for the right to form or join a trade union, and other, more general articles obligate the Government to protect the person and property of trade unionists. In Jamaica, labor unions, like professional groups and private associations, function freely. The Labor Relations and Industrial Disputes Act (LRIDA) codifies regulations of workers' rights.

Unions draft their own constitutions and rules, elect officers, determine objectives, affiliate with national or international groups, and select delegates to conferences. Some Jamaican unions have joined democratic international trade secretariats, such as the Caribbean Congress of Labor and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The third largest labor union is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions, and the World Confederation of Labor has attracted one Jamaican adherent.

Jamaican law neither prohibits strikes nor provides a right to strike, but in practice unions and workers use the strike as a tool. Striking workers can interrupt work without criminal liability but cannot be assured of keeping their jobs. In 1989 there were several work slowdowns as well as an 11-day strike involving 500 workers at an alumina plant brought about by a breakdown in contract negotiations. The LRIDA and other laws provide that certain categories of essential service workers (usually government-employed) do not have the right to strike. In its 1989 report, the Committee of Experts (COE) of the International Labor Organization (ILO) cited the laws' broad definition of essential services in which strikes are prohibited as restricting the right to strike provided by the ILO's Convention 87 (Freedom of Association).

About 25 percent of the work force belongs to unions, and union influence is felt in all important economic sectors. The two largest unions, the Bustamante Industrial Trade Union and the National Workers Union, have organizational and leadership ties to the two major political parties, the JLP and the PNP, respectively. Both unions maintain their independence and sometimes take positions different from those of their respective parties. The third largest Jamaican union, the University and Allied Workers Union, is linked with the (Communist) Workers Party of Jamaica, whose leadership maintains direct control over the union.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Constitution provides for the right to organize and belong to labor unions, and LRIDA provisions include guidelines for labor, management, and government on issues such as organizing work sites, negotiating agreements, and conflict resolution. However, in 1989, the COE cited the labor law's requirement of 40-percent membership in order to negotiate an agreement as inconsistent with the ILO's Convention 98 (the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining). Employees may not be fired solely because they are union officers. On the other hand, union affiliation may not be a prerequisite for employment. The Government rarely interferes with union organization efforts, and judicial and police authorities effectively enforce the LRIDA and other labor regulations.

JAMAICA

Labor, management, and the Government remain firmly committed by law and in practice to collective bargaining in contract negotiations and conflict resolution. Collective bargaining is widely used, even in some nonunionized firms. When labor and management fail to reach an agreement, cases may be referred to the Ministry of Labor for arbitration or mediation. An Independent Industrial Disputes Tribunal (IDT) forms the first appeal level above the Ministry. Any cases not resolved by the IDT pass to the civil courts. This system has proved effective. However, unions and some employers continue to believe that the collective bargaining process is undermined by a 1986 LRIDA amendment which permits the Minister of Labor unilaterally to refer cases involving the national interest to the IDT.

Domestic labor laws apply to Jamaican export free trade zones. Ministry of Labor officers cite a need for more compliance verification, especially in the free zones, but believe that most employers obey legal requirements. While domestic manufacturing companies are predominantly unionized, only 2 of the 18 factories in the Kingston Free Zone have union representation. The two unionized firms were unionized before they began operations in the Free Zone. Resistance by employers (all foreign), difficulty in unionizing female employees (who represent a majority of the work force in the free zones), and inconsistent organizing efforts are the reasons generally cited for the lack of additional unionization in the free zones. The Government is aware of the strong employer opposition to unions in the free zones; it neither discourages nor encourages unionization. Jamaica's second largest union has indicated its intention to organize workers in zone factories. During 1989 nonunionized workers in some free zone plants conducted short work stoppages to protest working conditions.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution does not specifically address the matter of forced or compulsory labor. However, Jamaica is a party to the ILO Convention which prohibits compulsory labor, and there have been no allegations that this practice exists in Jamaica.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Juvenile Act provides that children under the age of 12 years shall not be employed except by parents or guardians, and that such employment may be only in domestic, agricultural, or horticultural work. Children under 12 years of age may not be employed at night or at industrial sites. The Educational Act stipulates that all children aged 6 to 11 must attend elementary school. Industrial safety, police, and truant officers are charged with enforcing the law. Enforcement is erratic, however, and children under 12 are sometimes seen peddling goods or services on city streets. There is no evidence of widespread illegal employment of children in other sectors of the economy.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The LRIDA establishes some basic conditions of work. The Factory Act stipulates that all factories be registered and approved by the Labor Ministry before they can begin operating. The Ministry's Industrial Safety Division is required to make annual inspections of all factories, but budget constraints reduce the number of inspections actually made. The Ministry maintains records on industrial accident victims. If a private-sector work site does not meet the definition of a "factory," the Ministry does not have the authority to inspect it.

In accordance with International Monetary Fund guidelines, government wage policy aims to keep maximum annual wage and fringe benefit increases to 10 percent or less to help contain inflation. Most wage settlements have followed this guideline, but exceptions have been made for workers with a history of inadequate pay. In a two-step process that began in June 1988, the Government increased minimum wage levels to approximately $75 per month, effective January 1, 1989. Higher minimum wages apply to skilled workers, depending on their specialty. Most salaried workers are paid more than the legal minimum wage. For a worker with a family of five or less, the minimum wage represents a bare subsistence level. This level is more supportable in rural areas than in urban locations. The minimum wage law also provides for a 42-hour standard workweek and overtime pay. The Ministries of Labor, Finance, the Public Service, and National Security enforce labor laws and regulations.

MEXICO

Mexico is a Federal Republic which has been dominated by the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) since its founding in 1929. Periodic political reforms have expanded the opposition's role and stake in the political system; never more so than in the 1988 presidential election year. Nevertheless, the PRI has maintained its preponderant political control throughout the Republic by a combination of voting strength, organizational power, and, the principal opposition parties and other observers charge, electoral fraud. The 1917 Constitution stipulates that power be divided among a bicameral legislature, a judiciary, and an executive. The President's powers, however, far outweigh those of the other branches in Mexico's highly centralized system.

The principal law enforcement organization in Mexico is the Federal Judicial Police, which is controlled by the Attorney General. The General Directorate of Investigations and National Security under the control of the Secretariat of Government is responsible for investigations involving national security. Despite the tendency toward centralization of authority, municipal, state, and Federal police exercise authority in their respective areas of jurisdiction. Local police forces, often controlled by political bosses and landowners, have been involved in human rights abuses, and the Federal police have been responsible for deaths of detainees in their custody. There is no evidence, however, that these abuses are the result of policies favored or directed by the Mexican Government.

Mexico has a mixed economy, which combines elements of domestic market capitalism with state ownership of major industries. Through a program of divestiture of some state-owned firms, principally those operating in "nonstrategic" sectors, the Government is increasing the role of the private sector in the economy. Notable examples of the privatization policy which were announced or implemented in 1989 include the major airlines and the public telephone company.
